LAW OF Nature and Nations.

Eight BOOKS.

Written in Latin by the Baron
PUFENDORF, Counsellor of State to His late SWEDISH Majesty, and to the present King of PRUSSIA.

Translated into ENGLISH.

The Second Edition carefully Corrected, and Compared with Mr. Barbeyrac's French Translation; With the Addition of his Notes, and Two Tables; the One of the Names of the Authors, the Other of the most Material Things, that are contained either in the

RIGHT HONOURABLE
Sir Nathan Wright, Knt.
LORD-KEEPER

One of the LORDS of Her MAJESTY's most Honourable PRIVY-COUNCIL, &c.

My Lord,

THE Author and Subject, here Presented to Your Lordship, have, in Themselves, the best of Claims to so Great a Protection: For, neither can He, whose known Capacity, Industry and Integrity, render'd Him the Ornament of His own Profession, and of His Prince's Council, apply Himself with more Success, than to One, who has risen, by the same Steps, to a Nobler Eminence of Honour and Employment; nor ought any other, than the Guardian and Dispenser of Publick Equity, be Acknowledg'd as the Patron of the Law of Nature and Nations. But the Ambition of this Address was alike needful, in respect of the Translators; as an Occasion of acknowledging the Influence, which they feel from Your Lordships Authority, with regard both to their Function and their Studies: Your Lordship esteeming it no less worthy a Part of Your Character and Office, to Support the most Primitive Church, and the most Regular Universities; than to Preside over the Justice of the Wisest State, or to Direct the Policy of the Happiest Reign. I am,

With all Duty and Respect,

Your Lordships most Obliged

P R E F A C E.

IT is a Dilemma frequently urged against Versions of this kind, that when a Subject lies remote from Vulgar Consideration, Persons of Learning will pursue the Knowledge of it in the Learned Languages, while Others must remain equally Strangers to it in all. Which yet abates, proportionably, of its Force, according as either the Original Performance has been less fortunate in Style; or as the Improvements of a Modern Tongue have been able to extend themselves to the abstrusest Reasonings, and to speak even of Philosophy with the Advantages of Eloquence. As there is a Concurrence, of these two Conditions, to justify the present Attempt; so the second of them, which, thro' Personal Inability, may have been impair'd, seems yet to be recompens'd, by a peculiar Weight and Prevalency in the first. For the Commendation of our Author's Judgment hath scarce been more Universal, than the Censure of his Composition; which tho', by All, acknowledg'd to be expressive, yet to most appears so difficult and discouraging, that they sometimes fancy the Sense to have broken its way thro' the Phrase, and to have left these Irregularities, as the Tokens of its Violence. It is true, He has not fail'd in the very Entrance of His Work, to apologize for this Defect of Ornament; but the Plea He offers is, what may better excuse the necessary Roughness of a Subject, than the particular Unhappiness of a Writer. Another visible Disadvantage there was, which call'd for Relief. Our Author having publish'd the first Draught of this great Undertaking in the Year MDCLX, with the Title of Elementa Jurisprudentiæ, having also employ'd the Labour and Collections of Twelve Years, in bringing it to its present Method and Name, was not content to have drawn together all Assistances, which were of direct and immediate Use, from the Stores of Morality, Politicks and Law; but engaged Himself in a longer and wider Search, running thro' the whole Circle of Philological Authors, Ancient and Modern, and disposing, under the Heads of His Work, the most remote Examples, and Illustrations. Hence every Page came to be loaded, not only with numerous Citations at large, but with disorderly Marks of Addition, Reference, Comparison, and the like: as if the Confusion of a swelling Margin had run over, and discharg'd it self upon the Text. Thus the Periods were frequently disjointed, the Argument interrupted or obscured, and the greatest part of the main Body thrown into the disagreeable Figure of a Common-Place.

THE PREFACE.

Some Endeavours have been here applied towards the lessening of both these Imperfections. In respect of Style, it is hoped, that the Mettal, how rude soever and incapable of being polish'd to exact Beauty, yet after a second melting, may appear less deform'd, and may pass into more General Use. But 'tis beyond Doubt, that the other Inequality has been farther rectified, by our casting under the Page the needless and mis-shapen mass of Foreign Supplies: which it might have been no unpardonable boldness utterly to have pared away; but that we ought to be cautious of practising upon an Author, and to take care, least by cutting off an Excrescency, we should endanger the Life of a Design.

Custom has not so far prevail'd over Decency, as to engage the Translators in proclaiming the Justice of their Choice, and Merit of their Author. Much less would they ground his Character on the invidious Argument of Comparison. To contend with the admired Names of Grotius, Selden, and the Right Reverend the present Lord Bishop of Peterborough, is what He ought to decline in point of Modesty, if not of Safety. Yet this seems to have fallen out to his Advantage, that no One of those great Men attempted a compleat Body of Moral, or Political Doctrine. The First chose rather to insist on Authorities, taken from the Historians, Civilians and Canonists, than on Philosophical Deductions, from the Nature of Men, and the Reasons of Things. The Second entred no farther into this Subject, than as the Jewish Institutions directed His View. My Lord of Peterborough, having overthrow'n the deceitful Fabrick of a late Treacherous Builder, and settled the Science of Morality, on its truest and deepest Foundations, left the Superstructure to be rais'd by Inferior Hands. Thus, while each had a particular Boundary to his own Enquiries, All contributed to the Perfection of our Author's System: in which, as He abstains not from grateful Remembrances of these, and other Learned Benefactors, so He now teaches the Publisher of this Translation most gladly to acknowledge the Favour and Assistance of his Friends; of whom Two especially, the Reverend Mr. Percivale, and the Reverend Mr. Itchiner, by entirely rendring the Fifth and Eighth Books, have, with the same Kindness, accepted a Part in his Burthen, and allow'd him a Share in their Reputation and Success.

C H A P. I.

Of the Origine and the Variety of MORAL ENTITIES.

IT was the Business of the First and Highest Philosophy (1), and that by which alone it could fully answer the Design of its Name, and Institution, to deliver the most Comprehensive Definitions of Things, and to rank them agreeably under their proper Classes, subjoining the General Nature and Condition of every sort of Beings. Now as the Series of Natural Things hath been fairly enough regulated by those, who have hitherto apply'd themselves to the adorning of that Science, so it is evident, that Men have not been equally solicitous about constituting the Entia Moralia, or Moral Entities, nor treated them with that Respect which their Dignity requir'd. Many Authors seem never so much as to have thought on them; others only touch them lightly over, as idle Fictions of no use or moment in the World. When, at the same time, it was highly expedient, that they should be fully understood by Mankind, who are endu'd with the Power of producing them, and through whose whole Lives and Conducts their Force and Activity is diffus'd. This Reflection obligeth us to premise somewhat on a part of Knowledge generally neglected; so far as shall seem requisite to illustrate our Principal Undertaking. Especially least our Definitions of Moral Things should, either upon account of their Obscurity, or of their Novelty, prove a Stop to the Reader, who perhaps in Common Treatises hath rarely met with the like Terms. And here, if those who have been bred up in the nicer Delicacies of Letters, shall disdain our Endeavours of this kind, and cast a censorious Frown on Words unknown to Ancient Eloquence; we only petition them for this Favour, that as we often pardon the Impertinencies of their over-scrupulous Exactness, so they would be pleas'd to grant us the like Toleration, whilst we profess a closer regard to the (2) strict Severity of Things, than to the exterior Ornaments of Speech. For how to express our selves with more Advantage about these Matters we are yet to seek; unless by tedious Circumlocutions we would leave them more obscure and more perplex'd than we found them. Against the Charge of Novelty Tully himself will be our Advocate: New Names (says (a) he) are to be apply'd to new Things: nor is this to be wonder'd at by any Man of ordinary Knowledge, when he considers, that in every Art and Craft, not vulgarly understood, there is a variety of Terms coin'd for that particular Subject. And then giving Examples in the Liberal and Mechanick Arts, he concludes; A Philosopher of all Men hath an especial Right to this Priviledge; for Philosophy is the Art of Life, and he that would undertake to explain its Rules, cannot, from the common Currency of words, find Stock enough to answer his Occasions (a). But he that can upon no account digest such Harshness of Style, is left at his Liberty to turn out of these rougher Tracts, and to pass immediately to a Field of more Smoothness and Pleasure.

(1) The Metaphysics, which is called the first Philosophy, because most other Sciences depend upon it, and borrow their general principles from it: And the highest, in respect of its Object, since it treats about God, Angels, and the separate Soul, &c.

(2) Cicero de Finib. l. 3. c. 5. Whatever is spoken of weighty Matters clearly and plainly, is well said: but to study to set off such things by an ornamental way of speaking, is childish.

II. All the Beings which compose this Universe, as they consist of such Principles as were by the most Wise Creator temper'd and fitted for the producing of each particular Essence; so they have every one of them their proper Affections, arising from the Disposition and Aptitude of their Substance, and exerting themselves in agreeable Actions, according to that Portion of strength which their Divine Author and Founder hath imprinted on them. These Affections we now usually call Natural, since the term Nature hath been extended so far as to denote, not only the General Mass of Things, but also the Modes and Acts flowing from the internal Force of their Constitution, by which is produc'd that infinite Variety of Motions which turns and manages all the Business of our World. Those Things which exercise their Operations, either without any Sense at all, or with pure down-right Sense, or with such as is assisted by very imperfect Reflection, are guided by the sole Instinct of Nature, and are unable to govern their Actions by any Rules or Modes of their own Invention. But Man, who besides his excellent Form and most accurate Contexture of Body, fitting him for the noblest and the quickest Offices of Life and Motion, is endu'd with a singular Light of Understanding, by the help of which he is able most exactly to comprehend and to compare Things, to gather the Knowledge of Obscurities from Points already settled, and to judge of the Agreement which Matters bear to each other; and hath also the Liberty of exerting, suspending, or moderating his Actions, without being confin'd to any necessary Course and Method: Man, we say, is farther invested with the Priviledge of inventing and applying new Helps to each Faculty, for the more easy Regulation of its Proceedings. To consider what numberless Modes and Notions have been introduc'd for the Assistance of the Understanding, and for preventing the Confusion which might arise from the undistinguish'd Vastness of its Objects, is the Province of another sort of Enquirers. Our Business is to declare, how, chiefly for the Direction of the Will, a certain kind of Attributes have been impos'd on Natural Things and Motions; whence there springs up a peculiar Agreement and Conveniency in the Actions of Mankind, a grateful Order and Comeliness for the Ornament of Human Life. And these Attributes are call'd Moral Entities, because the Manners and the Actions of Men are judg'd and temper'd with relation to them; and do hence assume a Face and Habit different from the horrid Stupidity of the dumb Creation.

III. We may define our Moral Entities to be Certain Modes superadded to Natural Things and Motions, by Understanding Beings; chiefly for the guiding and tempering the Freedom of Voluntary Actions, and for the procuring of a decent Regularity in the Method of Life. We call them Modes, because we conceive Ens, or Being in general, to be more conveniently divided at large, into Substance and Mode, than into Substance and Accident. And as Mode is contradistinguish'd to Substance, so it is manifest, that Moral Entities have no self-subsistence, but are founded in Substances and in their Motions, and do only affect them after a certain manner. Of Modes, (1) some flow as it were naturally from the things themselves, (2) others are superadded by the Intervention of an Intelligent Power. For whatever is endu'd with Understanding, can from the reflex Knowledge of Things, and from comparing them with one another, form such Notions as may prove very serviceable in the Direction of an agreeable and consistent Faculty. Moral Entities are of this kind; the Original of which is justly to be referr'd to Almighty GOD, who would not that Men should pass their Life like Beasts, without Culture and without Rule; but that they and their Actions should be moderated by settled Maxims and Principles; which could not be effected without the Application of such Terms and Notions. But the greatest part of them were afterwards added at the Pleasure of Men, as they found it expedient to bring them in, for the polishing and the methodizing of Common Life. And from hence the End of them is plainly to be discover'd, which is not, like that of Natural Beings, the Perfection of the Universe, but the particular Perfection of

(a) We find Manilius using the like Excuse: Lib. III. V. 39. &c.

Mr. Creech.

Contingat: dabiturque licentia sumpta pudenter.*

(1) For Instance, The Figure of a Body, which is really inherent in it; and therefore called an Internal Mode.

(2) Such are Moral Entities, which are not in the things themselves, but depend upon the Operation of the Mind; and are therefore called External Modes.

Human

Human Conduct, as Superior to Brutal, in being capable of regular Beauty and Grace: that thus in so inconstant a Subject, as the Motions of Men's Minds, an agreeable Elegance and Harmony might be produc'd.

IV. As the Original way of producing Natural Entities is by Creation, so the manner of framing Moral Entities cannot be better express'd than by the Term of Imposition. For these do not proceed from Principles ingrafted in the Substance of Things, but are added, at the Pleasure of Intelligent Creatures, to Beings already perfect in a Natural Sense, and to the real Productions of those Beings; and consequently obtain their whole Existence from the Determination of their Authors. The same Power assigns them such and such Effects, which when it sees convenient, it can destroy without causing any Natural Alteration in the Subject to which they were apply'd (1). Hence, their Force and Ability of Operation doth not consist in this, that they can by their internal Efficacy produce any Natural Motion or Change in Things, without the Intervention of other Causes; but, partly in shewing Men, how they ought to govern their Freedom of Action, and chiefly in making them capable of receiving Benefit or Injury, and of exercising several Works towards other Persons, with some peculiar Effect. And the Efficacy of Moral Entities, produc'd by Almighty God, flows from this Principle, that he, by his Right of Creation, hath the Power of circumscribing, within proper Limits, that Liberty of Will with which he indulg'd Mankind, and when it grows refractory, of turning it which way soever he pleaseth, by the Force of some threatned Evil: Men likewise were empower'd to give a Force to their Inventions of the same kind; by threatening some Inconvenience, which their Strength was able to make good, against those who should not act conformably to them.

V. Since then Moral Entities were instituted for the Regulation of Men's Lives, to which End it is necessary, that those who are to observe this Rule should bear some settled Relations to one another, should govern their Actions by a fixt Method; and, lastly, should act with determinate Respects and Titles about such Goods and Possessions as the Occasions of Life require; we may hence conceive them to be principally inherent, 1st, in Men; 2<sup>ly</sup>, in the Actions of Men; and 3<sup>ly</sup>, after a sort (2), in Things; which Nature, either by her own Strength, or with the Assistance of Human Industry may produce. But though it would be no Absurdity to state their Division according to these three Heads or Subjects, yet it seems a more exact Method to make the Classes of Natural Entities our Patterns in digesting the Moral. Not only because the former have more engag'd the Studies of Philosophical Men, and being compar'd with the latter, cast a considerable share of their own Light and Evidence upon them; but likewise because our Understandings are so immers'd in Corporeal Images, as to be hardly capable of apprehending such Moral Beings any otherwise than by their Analogy to those of Nature.

VI. Now though Moral Entities do not subsist of themselves, and for that reason ought not, in general, to be rank'd under the Clats of Substances, but of Modes; yet we find many of them to be conceiv'd in the manner of Substances, because other Moral Things seem to be immediately founded in them, just as Quantities and Qualities inhere in the real Substance of Bodies. Farther, as Natural Substances suppose some kind of Space, in which they fix their Existence, and exercise their Motions; so in Allusion to these, Moral Persons are especially said to be in some State, which in like manner contains them, and in which they perform their Operations. Hence a State may not improperly be defin'd a Moral Entity, fram'd and taken up, on account of the Analogy it bears to Space. And as Space seems no Principal and Original Being, but is devis'd, to be, as it were, spread under other Things, to hold and to sustain them in some particular manner; so the several States were not introduc'd for their own sakes, but to make a Field for Moral Persons to exist in. Yet there is indeed this difference between State and Space, that the latter is a kind of immoveable Substance, extended primarily, and of it self, and which might still subsist if all the Natural Things, which now fill it, were remov'd: But States, (and all other Moral Beings, consider'd formally as such) obtain no higher Condition than that of Modes or Attributes; so that upon taking away the Persons suppos'd to be in such a State, the State it self is in manifest Danger of losing its own Existence.

VII. There are two sorts of Spaces, one according to which things are said to be in a place, which the Logicians call Ubi, as here, there, &c. and another according to which they are pronounc'd to be in time, which they call Quando, as Yesterday, to Day, to Morrow, &c. In the same manner we may conceive a double Notion of State, one which denotes a Moral Ubi, and bears an Analogy to Place; another which includes a Respect to Time, signifying the Application of some Moral Effect to Persons existing in such a Time. The former State, which hath a Relation to Place, may be consider'd either Undeterminately, as it results only from (3) Moral Qualities; or Determinately, as it supposeth a Dependance on (3) Moral Quantities, and on Comparison. The State of Man consider'd undeterminately, is either Natural or Adventitious. We use the word Natural, not because such a State flows from the internal Principles of Human Essence, antecedent to the Power of Imposition, but because it was impos'd by GOD himself, not by Man, and affects us immediately upon our Nativity. We are wont to consider the Natural State of Man, either absolutely, or with relation to other Men. The former Notion, 'till we can find a more convenient Term, we may express by the word Humanity, importing that Condition in which Man is plac'd by his Creator, who hath been pleas'd to endue him with Excellencies and Advantages in a high Degree above all other Animate Beings (a). Of which State this Principle is a direct Consequence, that Man ought to be a Creature acknowledging and worshipping his Divine Author, and Admiring his Works; and that 'tis expected that he should maintain a Course of Life far different from that of Brutes. To this State is oppos'd the Life and the Condition of Irrational Animals.

(1) See the last Section of this Chapter.

(2) See what the Author says Section 16.

(3) From the 17. to the 23. Section of this Chapter, the Author shews what he means by Moral Qualities and Quantities.

Since then the very being a Man is a State, obliging to certain Duties, and giving a Title to certain Rights, it cannot be out of the way to consider the precise point of Time, at which particular Persons may be said to enter on such a State. And this we conceive ought to be fix'd on the very first Moment, when any one may be truly call'd a Man, though he as yet want those Perfections which will follow his Nature in a longer Course: that is, whensoever he begins to enjoy Life and Sense, though his Mother hath not yet deliver'd him into the World. Now because the Obligations cannot be fulfill'd by him, without he understand his own Nature and the Ways of Working, they for that Reason do not actually exert their force, 'till he is able to square his Actions by some Rule, and to distinguish them by their proper Differences. But the Rights, on the contrary, date their Validity from the very beginning of our Being, in as much as they engage other Persons, already arriv'd at the full use of Reason, to such and such Performances towards us, and may turn to our Benefit, even whilst we are incapable of apprehending the Favour. Hence, it being a general Right and Privilege of all Men not to be Hurt by Others, if the Body of a Fœtus in the Womb should suffer any unlawful Violence, the Injury is not only done to the Parents, but to the Child; who, we suppose, may in his own Name demand Justice on that score, when he is grown up to Knowledge of the Action. But before the Imperfect Materials have acquir'd an Human Form in the Womb, if any one should dissipate or destroy them, he can't properly be term'd Injurious with regard to that senseless Mass; though he hath indeed broken the Law of Nature, by intercepting a Member of Human Society, and hath done an Injury to the Commonwealth, and to the Parents, by depriving them of their promis'd Citizen and Off-spring.

The Natural State of Man, consider'd with relation to other Men, is that which affects us upon the bare account of an Universal Kindred, resulting from the Similitude of our Nature, antecedent to any Human Act or Covenant, by which One Man is render'd peculiarly obnoxious to the power of Another. According to which Sense, those Persons are said to live in a State of Nature, who neither obey one Common Master, nor are at all subject one to the other, nor have any acquaintance by the means of Benefits, or of Injuries. To which may be added a third Notion of a Natural State, as it abstracts from all Inventions and Institutions brought in, either by Human Industry, or by Divine Revelation, for the Grace and the Conveniency of Life.

The Adventitious State is that which obligeth Men at, or after their Birth, by the Authority of some Human Constitution; the Divisions of which will be better settled hereafter.

But we ought to observe, by the way, that there's no Reason why People should imagine a State of Nature in the Sense, but now deliver'd, to be a thing that never was, or can be in the World; because there was never any Set of Men joyn'd together barely by that Similitude of Nature, as it abstracts from Consanguinity; Eve being knit to Adam in the Conjugal Tie, and all their numerous Descendants being closely united and ally'd by the Communion of Blood and Race. For we must know, that the Bond arising from nearness of Birth, doth by degrees wear out, amongst Persons remov'd at a great distance from the Common Stock, nor is esteem'd of any farther force, when once got beyond the reach of those several Appellations and Terms which Mankind have invented to express it by. And therefore such a State, though it did not appear at the Commencement of Human Race, arose afterwards in a longer Tract of Time, when the Memory of the Universal Root, and the Sense of the Relation springing from it, were sunk out of the Thoughts and Minds of Men.

VIII. But although every State supposeth, in the Person whom it affects, a respect and disposition towards others, in as much as it is attended with some Right, or some Obligation, neither of which we can conceive without an Object to imploy their force upon; yet some kinds of States do more expressly include and denote a relation towards other Men, whilst they signify the manner and process by which the Mutual Business of Mortals is on both sides manag'd and transacted. Of this sort the most signal and material are Peace and War, which two States, Libanius says, comprehend all the Affairs, and all the Conduct of Life, Peace is that State by which Men live quietly together, without the disturbance of Violence or Injuries, and voluntarily discharge their Mutual Duties, as Matters of necessary Obligation. War, on the other hand, is a State of Men mutually engag'd in offering and repelling Injuries, or endeavouring forcibly to recover their Dues. Peace may be divided into Common and Particular; the former such as is maintain'd amongst Men by Duties flowing purely from the Law of Nature; (1) the latter such as derives its force from express Covenants and Leagues, binding both sides to agreeable Performances: This again is branched into Internal and Ex- ternal, the one between Members of the same Commonwealth, the other regarding Persons of different Countries and Governments, whether as Common Friends, or as Special Confederates and Allies. A Common or Universal War engaging all Mankind at the same time, is an impossible Supposition; this being a direct Consequence of the state of Beasts. Particular War is either Internal and Civil, or External; that between Members of the same, this between those of different Communities. When the Acts of War are suspended, though the State still continue, such a Cessation is call'd a Truce (1).

(a) Cicero Off. 1. c. 28. Nature hath given us a Person and Character to sustain, in a Degree of Excellence far above any other Creatures.

IX. States are said to be consider'd determinately, when we measure them according to the high or low degree of Esteem which attends them, or accounting as they are reckon'd more or less honourable. For since peculiar Rights and Obligations accompany each State, every one obtains a larger share of Splendor and Credit, either as its Rights are more numerous and more forcible; or as its Obligations are directed towards the performance of such Works as require a singular ability of Parts and Wit. On the other hand, those which demand only dull Pains and Labour of Body, are in very little Value and Repute.

X. The latter sort of State, which, in our General Division, we settled with relation to Time, in conjunction with some Moral Effect, may be divided, first, into Seniority and Juniority; both which are consider'd, either with respect to the duration of Human Existence, and are then call'd Age, the degrees of which are Infancy, Childhood, Puberty, Youth, Manhood, fix'd Age, Declining, Old, and Decrepit Age: or, with regard to some adventitious State, according as a Man hath continued a longer, or a shorter time in it. Secondly, Into Plen-age (2), when One is presum'd able by his own Strength and Discretion to manage his Affairs; and Non-age, when a Person hath need of a Tutor, or Guardian, because he is suppos'd, upon the account of weakness of Judgment, incapable of dextrously prosecuting his own business. The limits of this State are different, according to the various Constitutions and Customs of Nations.

Different from Non-age, is what we may call an Age capable of mediated Guile; the bounds of which it is likewise impossible to assign. Alian in his Various History (a) relates a very remarkable way of discovering such an early Deceit. A Boy, having taken up a Golden Plate, dropt out of Diana's Crown, was indicted in Court: The Judges order'd a pack of trifling Play-things to be laid upon the Board, and amongst these a Plate of Gold, and bid the Boy chuse which he lik'd best; who again laying hands on the Gold, was condemn'd as guilty of the former Sacrilege.

XI. Before we proceed to other Matters, it seems necessary for us to observe, that, through

Scarcity of words we are frequently compell'd to express by the same term, the State it self, and the Attribute proper to such a State; though they are really distinct, and form different Conceptions in our Minds (b). Thus, to give an instance, Liberty is us'd as well for a State with analogy to Space, as for a faculty of working with resemblance to an Active Quality. And so Nobility, sometimes expresseth a State, sometimes an Attribute, or Affection of the Person in such a State, in the manner of a Passive Quality. So likewise the word Truce denotes both the State of Peace, and the Manner of Settling it.

Nor must we forget to hint, that as one Person may be at the same time engag'd in several States, provided that the Obligations of those States do not interfere with one another, so the Obligations adhering to one particular State, may, according to different Parts, be deriv'd from different Principles. And therefore he that only collects the Obligations flowing from a single Principle, and omitts the rest, doth not presently form a distinct State incapable of other Obligations, besides those which he hath taken notice of. Thus he that gathers several parts of the Office of Priests purely from the Holy Scriptures, doth not in the least deny, but that they are likewise bound to such Performances as the Constitutions of particular Governments shall farther enjoyn. So we that profess in this Work to treat only of those Duties of Men, which the Light of Reason shews to be necessary, do not at all pretend that there ever was, or now is, or ought to be, such a State in which those Obligations only should prevail, exclusive of all others. Nay, it would be almost a needless Disquisition to search, whether such a State of Men was once so much as likely to have been in the World. For the Assertion, which some so confidently lay down, could never yet be clearly made out, That if Man had continued in his Primitive Holiness, the Law of Nature alone, as it govern'd him at first, so should have continued its sway, except that one or two Positive Commands might probably have been added to it. We may justly question, whether Mankind, although untainted with Sin, should have always pass'd their Time in the Compass of a single Garden, sustaining themselves with the Fruits of Spontaneous growth, and not have cultivated and adorn'd their ways of living, by Industrious Management, and by Variety of Arts and Inventions. For what prejudice could it have been to their Original Innocence and Integrity, if upon the Multiplication of Human Race, they had divided into separate Societies in the forms of Commonwealths? And what Notion can we frame of such Societies, without the Addition of Positive Laws and Constitutions?

XII. Moral Entities, fram'd with Analogy to

(1) Vide Grot. de Jur. B. & P. l. 3. c. 21. (2) Vide l. III. c. IV. f. 5. (a) Lib. 5. cap. 16.

(b) Senec. de Benef. l. 2. c. 34. There is a vast multitude of things which have no peculiar words fix'd upon them; and these we express not by proper, but by foreign and borrow'd Names.

Substances; are call'd Moral Persons (1); which are either particular Men, or several joyn'd in one Body by some Moral Tie, consider'd with the State and Office which they maintain in Common Life. Moral Persons are either Simple, or Compound. The Simple, according to the difference of their Posts and Employments, are either Publick, or Private; as their Duty is immediately apply'd, either to the Benefit of Civil Society, or to the particular Advantage of every Private Member. Publick Persons, by the general Custom of the Christian World, are divided into Civil and Ecclesiastical. The former are either Principal, or Inferior. Of Principal Persons, some administer Affairs with a Supreme Power; others either execute some part of the Administration by Commission from the Supreme Power, who are properly call'd Magistrates, or else assist with their Advice and Counsel in the Management of the Commonwealth. The Inferior perform a less Noble Service to the Community, and act under the Magistrates, with respect to their Publick Capacity. In War the Officers, whether of higher or lower Commissions, answer to Magistrates, and are assisted, in Subordination, by the Common Soldiers. We reckon Men of that Profession amongst Publick Persons, in as much as they are authoriz'd by the Supreme Power, either immediately or mediately, to bear Arms in the Service of the Commonwealth.

There is likewise a peculiar Species of Politick Persons, which we may stile Representatives, because they sustain the Character of other Persons: such as, being invested with the power and authority of acting by Another, do in his room transact Business with the same force and validity, as if he himself had manag'd it. Of this kind are Legates, Vicars, Burgesses, &c.

A new distinction hath been brought in of late, between Ministers of a Representative Character, who are Ambassadors properly so call'd; and Ministers of the second Order, as Envoys, or Residents, who do not, like the former, express the full Power and Grandeur of their Masters (a).

With resemblance to these Publick Representatives, Tutors and Guardians are concern'd for Private Persons, as they manage Affairs in behalf of the Pupils or Minors given them in charge.

On this Point Mr. Hobbes (b) is mistaken, when he will have it frequently to happen in Communities, that a Man shall bear the Person of an Inanimate Thing, which therefore is it self not properly a Person; as suppose of a Church, a Hospital, a Bridge, &c. For there appears no Necessity of introducing a Fiction of Law, to constitute Persons by whom any of these should be represented. It being more Natural to say in plain Terms, that particular Men are impower'd by the Community, to collect the Revenue, settled for the preserving of such Places, or Things; and to carry on and sustain any Suits that shall arise on those Accounts.

The Variety and Division of Ecclesiastical Persons is obvious to every Man, according to the particular Religion in which he hath been bred up. Nor can any Man of Letters be at a loss to apprehend what kinds of Persons are founded in the Management of Schools.

Private Persons are of a vast latitude and extent; yet their principal differences may be taken first from their Business, Craft, or Trade, which employs their Pains, and exhibits their Livelihood: and these are, either Creditable and Genteel, or such as seem to carry in them more Baseness, or Drudgery. Secondly, From the Condition, or, as we may say, the Moral Situation which any one obtains in a Community; in which respect one is a Citizen, with more or less Privileges; Another a Sojourner, and a third a Stranger. Thirdly, From the Place in a Family, upon which account one is said to be a Householder, which may comprehend the Person of a Husband, a Father, and a Master; another is call'd a Wife, another a Son, another a Servant: These may pass for the ordinary Members of a Family; the extraordinary are Guests and Lodgers. Fourthly, Upon account of Race and Birth; whence arise Nobles, (divided into different degrees in different Countries) and Plebeians. Fifthly, From Sex and Age, whence come the differences of Men and Women, and the distinctions founded in Childhood, Youth, Manhood, and Old-Age. For though the diversity of Sex, and Number of Years, are not of external Imposition, yet in the method of a Social Life, they involve some kind of Moral Notion; in as much as different Actions are becoming in different Sexes, and Persons of various Ages require a various Treatment and Application.

XIII. A Compound Moral Person is then constituted, when several Individual Men are so united together, that what they will or act by virtue of that Union, is esteem'd a single Will, and a single Act, and no more. And this is suppos'd to be done, when the particular Members submit their Wills to the Will of one Man, or of one Council, in such a manner as to acknowledge, and to desire others to acknowledge, for the Common Act and Determination of them All, whatever that Man, or that Council shall decree or perform, in Matters which properly concern such an Union, and are agreeable to the end and the intention of it. Hence it comes to pass, that whereas in other Cases, when many Men will or act any thing, we conceive so many distinct Wills and Acts as there are in number Natural Persons, or Human Individuals; yet when they close, and form a Compound Person, they are suppos'd to have but a single Will, and every Action which they perform is construed as one only, although a number of Natural Individuals concur in its production. And hence such a Compound Person doth and ought to ob-

(1) The Roman Lawyers ordinarily restrain'd the word Person to those that were Free: Hence it was that they ranked their Slaves amongst the Goods they possess'd.

(b) Leviath. cap. 16.

tain some particular Goods and Rights which none of the Members, in their private and separate quality, can claim or arrogate to themselves.

Here also we must remark, that as Natural Bodies continue the same, although in length of Time, by slow and silent degrees they receive a considerable alteration from the various accessions and desertions of their Particles; so by the particular Succession of Individuals, the Identity of the Compound Person is not injur'd: unless at one and the same time such a Change should arrive, as would entirely take away the Nature and Constitution of that United Body. On which Point we shall be more large in another part of our Work.

Compound Moral Persons, or Societies, may, after the manner of single Persons, be divided into Publick and Private. And the former again are subdivided into Sacred and Civil. Of the Sacred, some we may call General, as is the Catholic Church, and likewise any particular Church, whether comprehended within the Bounds of such a Nation, or distinguish'd from others by Publick Forms of Confession. Others peculiar, as are Councils, Synods, Consistories, Presbyteries, &c. Civil Societies are also either General, as a Commonwealth, of which there are many Species, as Simple, Compound, Regular and Irregular; or particular, as a Senate, an Order of Knights, a Tribe, a Parliament, &c. Armies may be called Military Societies, and consist of Legions, or Regiments, Troops, Cohorts, Companies, &c.

Amongst Private Societies we do not only reckon Families, but all the Colleges, or Corporations in a Kingdom, or a City, as those of the Merchants, of the Artificers, and the like. To make a minute Catalogue of every Species we think unnecessary to our present Design.

XIV. Concerning the Nature of simple Moral Persons, we have this farther to observe, That as one and the same Man may be in several States together, provided they do not clash with each other, so he may sustain several Persons together, upon Supposition that the Duties attending those Persons may be perform'd together by him. For though upon a natural account One cannot be both a Husband and a Wife, both a Son and a Daughter; nor in a Moral Consideration, at the same time, a Master and a Servant, a Judge and a Prisoner, a Party and Witness;

yet nothing hinders why the same Man may not be, (for Example) at home a Householder, a Senator in Parliament, an Advocate in the Halls of Justice, and a Counsellor at Court. In as much as those particular Offices do not require and engage the whole Man; but may, at different times, be all conveniently administr'd (a). And upon this Principle the wiser Heathens undertook to defend Polytheism (b), which they knew well enough was contrary to Reason: for their Excuse was, they only conceiv'd such a Number of Persons in the same Supreme Being, as might answer the Variety of Operations which proceeded from his Essence and Nature (c).

It's very plain from the Name and the Notion of Imposition, that when a Man enters on the Capacity of a new Person, there is no Natural Change produc'd in him, no Generation of new Natural Qualities, no Augmentation of old ones: but whatever accrues to him from this Relation, is comprehended within the Sphere of Moral Things. So when a Man's declar'd Consul, he is made ne'er the Wiser, nor when he lays down his Office doth he lay down any of his Parts with it. Though some have observ'd, that the Splendor of Men's Dignity hath frequently a strong Influence on their Actions, and that many Men have made very different Figures in a Publick, and in a Private Station. But we may reckon these Fancies amongst the common Deceptions of Sight, occasion'd by gaudy Pomp and Show. The Case being much the same, as when Country People imagine the Name and Title of Doctor to have some share in the Force and the Success of a Prescription (d). Except indeed, that some kinds of Parts and Dispositions are rouz'd and enliven'd by Business; and on the contrary, lye dormant in a State of Ease (e). Yet there is no Question to be made, but that when God Almighty imposeth a peculiar Charge and Person on any Man, he can, and often doth induce him with extraordinary Qualities, beyond the Measure of Moral Acquirements; as is evident from the Holy Scriptures (f).

From what hath been offer'd on this Subject it appears, that the Jews heretofore attributed too large Effects to their Regeneration, by which the new Person of a Profelyte of Justice was impos'd on a Gentile: as when they affirm'd, that there was no force remaining in his former Kindred; that he ought not to esteem, or use as Relations, his Brethren, Sisters, or Parents; nor his

I. c. 30. *We must understand, that we are by Nature invested, as it were, with two Persons, or Capacities, one Common to Mankind, on account of our being partakers of Reason, and of that Excellence by which we surpass the Beasts: the other proper to particular Men. Children begotten in his first Condition (a). The Cause of this Error was their absurd Belief, that a new Soul was infus'd into the Profelyte.

XV. It may not be amiss, in the last place, to observe, that Men sometimes frame a kind of Shadows, or Images of Moral Persons, for the representing of them in Sport and Jest. Whence it came to pass, that the term of Person hath been peculiarly challeng'd by the Stage. The Effence of a Feigned Person consists in this, that the Habit, Gesture, and Speech of another real Person be handsomly express'd: Thus the whole Procedure bears only a Countenance of Mirth, and whatever such a fictitious Actor says or does, leaves no Moral Effect behind it, and is valu'd only according to the Dexterity and Artifice of the Performance. For which Reason we may, by the way, justly wonder, why Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, approv'd of the Baptism which Athanasius, when a little Boy, had administred to one of his Play-fellows (b).

But the Imposition, which produceth true Moral Persons, is allow'd no such Liberty; but ought always to presuppose such Qualities as may contribute to the solid Use and real Benefit of Human Life: And he that in constituting Persons hath not a regard to these Endowments, is to be esteem'd an extravagant Buffoon, and a vain Insulter over Mankind. Thus Caligula might have made a Consul of the most Wicked, or of the most Senseless Wretch in Rome, provided the Man had been a free Citizen, and could at least have perform'd the Common and Formal Part of that Office: But to design his Horse Incitatus the same Honour, was a Pitch of Madness, and of insipid Raillery: nor a less Impudence than when he set him up for a Master of a Family, and gave him a House and Furniture; where there was good Entertainment provided for Guests invited in the Name of the Beast (c). An equal Madness was it, as well as a horrid Impiety, that many of the Ancients, to flatter their Princes, their Founders of States, and other Worthies, rank'd them after their Death in the number of the Gods (d). And what to think of the Canonization amongst the Modern Papists, no Man of Sense is at a loss.

XVI. As to Things consider'd as they are the Object of Law (1), there seems to be no occasion of ranking them under the Head of Moral Entities. For though Men are conceiv'd as different Persons, upon account of their different State or Office, yet Things do not raise such distinct Notions in us, with reference to their Owners, whether Our selves or Others, or whether the Propriety be yet uncertain. When at first some things fell under particular Right and Dominion, and others were left exempt, we must not fancy, that they themselves acquir'd any new Qualities; it seems rather, that upon introducing this Propriety of Things, a Moral Quality arose amongst Men, of which the Men were the Subjects, and the Things only the Terms: For, as during the Primitive Communion of Goods, any Man had a Right of applying to his proper Use, what equally belong'd to All; so when once Masters or Owners were constituted, there sprung up a Right in each particular Master of disposing how he pleas'd of his Own, and an Obligation in all other Masters to abstain from his Possessions. But the Things themselves obtain'd nothing hence, but an extrinsecal denomination, as they make the Object of such a Right, and of such an Obligation. So when certain Things are said to be Holy or Sacred, no Moral Quality of Holiness inheres in the Things; only, an Obligation is laid upon Men to treat them in such a particular manner: and when that Obligation ceaseth, they are suppos'd to fall again into promiscuous and ordinary Use. Yet if, still, any Man will positively maintain, that there are some Things, as well as Persons, which should be call'd Moral, he must take care so to explain himself, that he may be understood to attribute this Morality to the Things not formally, as if it were inherent, but only objectively, as it is terminated in them.

XVII. Thus much of those Moral Entities which are conceiv'd with Analogy to Substance. We are now to enquire about those that are really and formally Modes, and pass in our Notion as such. Modes may be conveniently enough divided into Modes of Affection, and Modes of Estimation: According to the former, we suppose Persons to be affected in such and such a manner; according to the latter, both Things and Persons may be rated and valu'd. The former fall under the Name of Quality, the latter of Quantity; if we take both those Terms in the most extended Sense. Qualities, so far as concerns our Business, may be divided into Formal and Operative. Formal Qualities are such as do not tend, nor are directed towards any Act or Work, but agree and are joyn'd with the Subject, in the manner of pure and naked Forms: whence we may likewise call them Simple Attributes. Operative Qualities are, either Primitive, or Derivative. By the Primitive a Thing is conceiv'd fit and able for such an Act: they are divided into Internal, and External, and may be term'd Moral Passive Qualities. The Derivative are those which proceed from the Primitive, and are the Acts themselves, as the former were the Powers.

XVIII. Among Moral Attributes, Titles have a considerable place, which are apply'd for the distinction of Persons in Civil Life, with reference to their State and their Esteem. They are chiefly of two sorts. Some directly signify the degree of the Rate and Value, which Persons bear in common Account, together with the Qualities peculiar to Men of that Rank: but the State it self they only denote indirectly and by the by, and that either more clearly, or more obscurely, according as such a Title is usually attributed to fewer, or to more States. Of this kind are those Honorary Epithets, commonly prefixed to the Names of Great Persons, as Marks of General Respect: as, the most Serene, the most Eminent, the most Illustrious: the signification of which rises higher, or falls lower, according to the Condition of the Substantive to which they are joyn'd. Other Titles directly signifie some particular State, or some peculiar Seat and Place in a State, but indirectly denote that degree of Value and Repute which usually accompanies such a State: as are the Names of Moral Persons, of those especially who fill any Post of Honour. Now these Titles are not consider'd, as they are only Notions representing to one Man's Understanding the State and Office of another, but as by virtue or human Imposition they declare the Power and Authority of the Person that enjoys them. So that 'tis not a vain Contention about empty Ceremonies, when Men frequently have such hot Disputes and Quarrels about Titles: because upon the denial of a Title, we are suppos'd at the same time to deny the State, the Office, the Power and the Rights, which such a Title generally expresses or includes. But here we must be sure to observe, that the Imposition of most Titles is not perpetual and uniform; but in different Countries, and in the same Country at different times admits of very large alterations. Thus the Titles of the first kind which we mention'd, (or the Honorary Epithets) made use of by our Ancestors, how mean and little do they sound to the Ears of our own Age: while what was thought heretofore a worthy Mark for the Greatest of Mortal Men, shall now be despis'd by an Inferiour Scribler? For which reason the increase of such Titles does not always argue the increase of Dignity; but when the Titles swell higher while the thing it self maintains its first condition, their Value and Price is supposed to be considerably debated. Sometimes also a certain Title is affix'd by way of Elogy and Complement to some particular Order, because the quality or thing meant by that Title, is or ought to be conspicuous in the generality of the Members belonging to such an Order. And hence those Members, who are not really possess'd of the thing, do however enjoy the Title. Thus in Order of Men of Letters, many Persons are saluted with the Appellation of most Famous, and most Learned, who are as much any thing else in the World as what those terms signifie. And so too, an idle unactive Nobleman must have Industry and Strength and Valour applied to Him in our Addresses. It happens likewise very commonly, that Private Men or others, either advance or diminish the Titles of Persons, as they judge it convenient for the present Condition of their Affairs to flatter and caress, or to despise and vilifie them. And even in the latter sort of Ti-

ties, as we above divided them, it frequently falls out that the Title may continue, tho' the Thing it self, or the Dignity and Right be in a high manner either better'd or impair'd. And farther 'tis very usual, that in different Countries the same Word shall express very different Degrees of Honour. And therefore it would argue a very unskilful Head, to place in the same Class all those who bear the same Title all over the World (1). It must not be forgot, that sometimes a bare Title is attributed to a Man without the Thing, or without the Offices and the Profits which used to attend such a Title; only to this intent, that he may hence obtain the External Ensigns and Badges of the Honour, and may acquire a more creditable Place and Seat in the Community of which he is a Member. Lastly, It is worth remarking, that chiefly in the Titles of the Principal Houses of Europe, the same Title sometimes imports both the Family, and the Possession of the mention'd Territory; sometimes the Family only, without the Possession, yet with the Right of succeeding to it according to the due Course, and Order of Inheritance.

XIX. Moral Operative Qualities are either Active or Passive. Of the former the most noble Species are Power, Right, and Obligation. Power is that by which a Man is enabled to do a thing lawfully and with a Moral Effect: which Effect is, that the Person exercising this Power, shall lay an Obligation on others to perform some certain Business which he requires, or to admit some Action of his as Valid, or not to stop and hinder it; or that he shall confer on others a Licence of doing or possessing something, which Licence they did not before enjoy. Whence appears how wide this Quality runs, and how very diffusive it is of it self. Power, with respect to its Efficacy, is divided into perfect, and imperfect. The former is that, the Exercise of which may be asserted even by Force, against those who endeavour unlawfully to lett and oppose it. Now Force is chiefly applied, within the Bounds of the same Community by an Action at Law, and without those Bounds by a War. The latter, or imperfect Power is that, the Exercise of which if any Man is unlawfully prohibited, he may be said indeed to be inhumanly dealt with, yet he has no Right to defend it either by Process of a Court, or by the Force of Arms, unless this Inefficacy or Imperfection is supplied with absolute Necessity. With respect to its Subject, Power is further divided into Personal, and Communicable. The former is such as one Man cannot lawfully transfer to another. But then this must be consider'd under several Differences. For some Powers are so closely united with the Person, that the Acts belonging to them cannot rightly be exercised by Another. Such is the Power of the Husband over the Body of his Wife, which no Laws allow him to discharge by a Deputy. In some again, tho' we cannot transfer the Possession, yet we may by Delegacy commit the Acts to the Administration of others; but in such a manner, that the whole strength of their Authority must be deriv'd from him, in whom those Powers are originally seated. Of this kind is the Power of such Kings as are constituted by the Will of the People. For they cannot transfer the Right of Reigning to Another, and yet they may use the Service of Ministers for the Performance of the Acts belonging to that Right. Communicable Power is such as may be lawfully devolv'd upon Others; and that either at the Pleasure of the Person so devolving it, or by the Authority or the Consent of a Superiour.

Lastly, In respect of the Objects, the Generality of Powers may be reduced to four Heads. For they regard either Persons or Things; and both these as they are either our own, or other Mens. A Power over our own Persons and Actions is called Liberty; the different Acceptations of which word shall be hereafter discuss'd. This must not be conceiv'd as a distinct Principle from him who enjoys it, or as an Authority of constraining himself to any thing which is oppos'd by his Inclinations (a): But as a Licence to dispose of himself and of his Actions, according to his free Pleasure; which at the same time includes a Negation of any Impediment, proceeding from a Superiour Power. A Power over our own Things or Goods, is called Property. A Power over the Persons of other Men is properly Empire or Command: A Power over other Men's Things, is what the Civilians term Service.

XX. Right (b) is that Moral Quality by which we justly obtain either the Government of Persons, or the Possession of Things, or by the Force of which we may claim somewhat as due to us. There seems to be this Difference between the Terms of Power and Right, that the first does more expressly import the Presence of the said Quality, and does but obscurely denote the manner how any one acquir'd it. Whereas the word Right does properly and clearly shew, that the Quality was fairly got, and is now fairly possess'd. We place Right in the Class of Active Qualities, as by Virtue of it any thing may be requir'd of Others. It may likewise be rank'd in the number of Passive Qualities, as it impowers us lawfully to receive any thing from Others. For Moral Passive Qualities are those by which we are said to do or suffer somewhat, or to admit and receive it. Of these there be three Kinds. One according to which we rightly indeed admit something, but in such manner, that neither we our selves have any Power of exacting it, nor others any Obligation to give it: Such is the Ability of receiving a Gift purely under the Notion of a Gratuity. And that this Quality is not meer Fancy and Fiction is evident from this one Consideration, that it may be restrain'd by a Law: A Judge, for Example, may be debarr'd the Liberty of taking a Gift from Parties engag'd in a Suit, under what Colour or Pretence soever. A second Species is such as puts us in a Capacity of receiving something from Another, not so, that we can force it from him against his will, unless in Cases of Necessity; yet so, that he is oblig'd by some Moral Vertue to pay or perform it. This Grotius (1) calls Aptitude or Desert. The third Species is that by which we are enabled to compel another to some Performance even against his Will, to which Performance he is likewise fully oblig'd by the Force of some Law ordaining a Penalty upon his Default. Here 'tis worth our remembring, that many Things in common reckoning pass under the Notion of Rights, which, if we would speak accurately, we should rather call Compositions made up of Power and Right in the strict Sense of those words: at the same time involving, or supposing, some Obligation, some Honour, or the like. Thus the Right or Privilege of being a Citizen, contains both the Power of exercising with full Vertue all Acts peculiar to the Members of that City, and also a Right of enjoying the Benefits proper to it, supposing in the Person an Obligation toward the Corporation. So, for Example, the Honours and Degrees of Learned Men include both the Power of performing certain Actions proper to such a Dignity, and the Right of sharing in the Profits of their Order; to which Notion there is further added the height of Esteem and Respect, which accompanies their Place and Title.

XXI. An Obligation is that by which a Man is bound under a Moral Necessity to perform, or admit, or undergo any thing. The several kinds of Obligations will be hereafter insisted on at large (2).

There are also a sort of Moral Patible Qualities, which are conceiv'd to affect the Understandings of Men in some certain manner: as in Natural Qualities, those have obtain'd the name of Patible which affect the Faculty of Sensation. Of this Order, are Honour, Ignominy, Authority, Gravity, Fame, Obscurity, and the like.

XXII. It remains that we subjoin something about the Modes of Estimation, or the Moral Quantities. For 'tis evident in common Life, that Persons and Things are rated, not only according to the Extension of their Natural Substance, or according to the Intenseness of their Motion, and their other Natural Qualities, considered as they flow from the Principles of their Essence; but likewise according to another kind of Quantity different both from Physical and Mathematical: and this Quantity arises from the Imposition and Determination of a Rational Power. Now Moral Quantity is met with first in Things, where it is called Price; secondly in Persons, where we term it Esteem; both which were included in the Notion of Value; and thirdly in Actions, where it has not yet acquired a peculiar Name. Of each Species we shall treat in its proper place (3). What we have hitherto insisted on about the Variety and

(b) The Latin word Jus is a very wide and ambiguous Term: besides the Signification here used, it is taken for Law, and for a System or Body of Municipal Laws or Constitutions, and likewise for a Sentence pronounc'd by a Judge.

Distinction of Moral Entities, may seem sufficient to our present Design.

XXIII. We will only add this general Remark, That, as Moral Entities owe their Original to Imposition, so they draw their Continuance and their Changes from the same Cause, and when that once ceases, they immediately vanish, just as when we put out the Light, the Shadow instantly disappears. Those which are made by Divine Imposition, are not dissolv'd but by the Divine Pleasure. Those which are fram'd at the Will of Men, are destroy'd by the same Power, without the least Alteration in the Persons or Things, as to their Natural Substance. For tho' it implies a Contradiction in the Nature of Things, that what has been done already should be made not to have been done; as that a Man, who has been Consul, should not have been Consul; yet we find every day how easie 'tis to cause a Man not to be for the future, what he has already been: and we see at the same time all the Moral Entities that inher'd in such a Man, entirely defac'd, and leaving no real Footsteps behind. For 'tis impossible that a Moral Entity should ever grow up to the Strength and Force of a Natural Quality. Whence 'tis a very weak thing to believe, that, when a Man is constituted such or such a Person, an indelible Character is imprinted on him barely by vertue of that Moral Imposition. For thus, when a Commoner is created a Nobleman, he only acquires new Right, but does not at all change his Substance, or the Qualities founded in it: And if a Nobleman be degraded, he only forfeits the Rights of his Order, but the Benefits he holds from Nature, remain perfect and unimpair'd.

CHAP. II.

Of the Certainty of MORAL SCIENCE.

IT has been an establish'd Perswasion among the Generality of Learned Men, that Moral Knowledge is destitute of that Certainty, which is so Famous in other Parts of Philosophy, and especially in the Mathematicks. The foundation of their Notion is this: they take Morality to be incapable of Demonstration, from whence only true Science, and free from the fear of Error, can proceed, but imagine that all its evidence rises no higher than a Probable Opinion. An unhappines that has been prodigiously injurious to the most noble Disciplines, and the most necessary to Humane Life. For hence it came to pass, that Men of Wisdom and Parts were afraid of spending too much labour in cultivating Notions which depended on so weak a bottom. And the same Principle furnish'd those, who were entirely idle and negligent about these Studies, with a fair excuse; while they might alledge, that there was no firm and demonstrative assurance to be had in such Disquisitions, but that they could only be prosecuted in a rude and unaccurate manner. To which Aristotle contributed not a little, who in the common Judgment of the World, has arriv'd at the highest pitch of Mortal Attainments, and left no farther field for the succeeding Industry and Wit of Men. Aristotle then, as to the truth of Ethicks, in his Treatise on that Subject, address'd to Nicomachus (1), delivers himself in the following Propositions. It must not be expected, that all kinds of things should be explain'd with the same accuracy. Honesty and Justice, which fell under the consideration of Civil Knowledge, have so many different faces, and are liable to so many mistakes, that they seem to be only instituted by Law, and not originally decreed by Nature. We shall therefore think it sufficient, when we discourse on such Heads, or when we argue from them, to shew the Truth in a ruder man- ner, and under a kind of Shadow and Figure. It becomes a Man well Instituted to require such proof and such explication of any matter, as the nature of the thing will bear. For it seems equally absurd, to demand Demonstrations from an Orator, and to let a Mathematician satisfy us with Probabilities. We, for our part, as we are not at all influenc'd by the Name of a single Philosopher; so we intend to enquire what Answers are to be return'd to the Principal Arguments urg'd by Him, and Others, so soon as we shall have premis'd a word or two concerning the Nature of Demonstration in general.

II. To demonstrate then, as we apprehend it, is Syllogistically to deduce the necessary certainty of any Matter propos'd from such Principles as being its Causes, must needs make it known beyond doubt and dispute. Now tho' 'tis manifest that there is such a thing as we here define, and we see Instances of it every day in Mathematical Operations, to which no Man in his Wits ever denied the Art and Power of Demonstrating; yet from the false Exposition of two or three words, it has happen'd that the greatest Number of Philosophers have committed a wretched oversight in the point, and have rashly excluded this noble way of proof from many parts of Knowledge, which had a just title to its possession. The chief occasion of the Error was this; They found it laid down for a Rule, that the Subject of a Demonstration ought to be necessary, which they interpreted, as if in a demonstrative Syllogism the Subject of the Conclusion, to which the Predicate was applied, ought always to be a thing necessarily existent; as for example, in that thread-bare Instance, Man is Rational and therefore Risible, the Subject of the Demonstration is Man, who must be own'd for a Necessary Being. But in reality the Subject of Demonstration is not any one single term, but some entire Proposition, the necessary truth of which is from settled Principles syllogistically infer'd. Where it signifies little, whether or no the Subject of this demonstrable Proposition necessarily exist, but 'tis sufficient, if granting its existence such certain affections necessarily agree to it, and if it can be made out, that they do thus agree to it, by undoubted Principles. Thus a Mathematician never troubles himself to enquire whether a Triangle be necessary or contingent, so long as he can demonstrate all the Angles of it to be equal to two Right ones. And therefore the Subject of Demonstration is only call'd necessary upon account of the necessary Connexion by which the Predicate cleaves to it in Conclusions of that Nature.

III. But what kind of Propositions those ought to be which we are to use in Demonstration, will appear from the consideration of its end and effect. That then, which we require by Demonstration, is Science, or a clear and certain Knowledge, every way, and at all times constant to itself, and plac'd beyond the fear of mistake. What we have Science of (says Aristotle) we imagine under an impossibility of being otherwise.

Therefore 'tis necessary the Propositions should be true, really and absolutely, and not upon Concession or Supposition. For tho' from a Supposition laid down, a long Chain of Conclusions may be drawn, yet 'tis impossible that, being deriv'd from a precarious Principle, the Streams should not relish of the Fountain. And tho' we should make the two most contradictory Suppositions in nature, one of which must of necessity be true; yet we can by this means only prove for certain τὸ ὄν, as the Logicians call it, or that the matter is really so: for τὸ δῖον, or the reason why it is so, requires, as an indispensable condition, the firmness of the precedent Hypothesis. The Propositions of Demonstration must likewise be the first and the highest that can be, so as to want no farther proof, but to deserve credit upon their own evidence; or however, so as to be at last reducible to some first Truth. For as some Propositions are plac'd at a less, and some at a greater distance from the first Principles; so we must not imagine that every Demonstration can be finish'd in a single Syllogism, but we must carry on the Argument from the Proposition to be demonstrated, till we arrive at the first Principle, on which it depends. For they are not the only Masters of Reasoning, who are so very quick and expert at their quicquid, their atqui, and their ergo, but those also, who beginning at evident Principles, understand how to frame an Argument, by a just train of necessary Consequences. Another Requisite in such Propositions is, that they be immediate, that is, that they flow immediately from one another without any gap or interruption. For a demonstrative Argument should be work'd up in the manner of a Chain, the Propositions being knit within one another, like so many Rings, so that if any one Link breaks, or proves deficient, the whole frame must dissolve and fall in Pieces. Lastly, 'tis necessary that the Propositions in Demonstration be the Causes of the Conclusion, as containing the reason why in such a Conclusion the Predicate necessarily agrees to the Subject (a).

IV. This being premis'd, it is farther observable, that tho' 'tis a thing common to all Moral Disciples, not to take up with a bare Theory, but to pass into Use and Practice, yet there is a vast difference to be discover'd between the two Principal of them; of which one is concern'd about the rectitude of Human Actions in order to Laws; the other, about the dextrous government of our own, and of other Men's Actions, for the Security and the Benefit of our selves, and more especially of the Publick. For this latter part of Ethicks ought to be rank'd under the name of Prudence, which Aristotle (b) defines; A Habit, active according to reason, about the Good and Evil that can happen to a Man. Whence he thus settles the Duty of a Prudent Person: It seems to me to be the Property of a Man of Prudence, to take right Consultations about those things which are Good for him, and of universal Use in well living. And these Opinions he builds upon Axioms drawn from the accurate observation and comparison of Human Manners and Events. But those Axioms do not appear so very firm and evident, as to be the ground of infallible Demonstration, as well upon account of the wonderful frailness and inconstancy, that occurs in the Wits and Tempers of Men, as because the Events of Affairs are frequently turn'd in a little moment, and driven to a Result quite contrary to our Intentions and Expectations (c). Nor is Human Subtlety in the applications of these Rules and Maxims baffled only by such unlook'd for Accidents and Occurrences, but the Divine Wisdom is pleas'd often to interpose, and to elude the craftiest Stratagems, and the best contriv'd Plots of Mortal Designs. And therefore the ablest Managers of Affairs aspire not to act always with strict demonstration of Success, but when they have apply'd the most sage circumspection, and the most piercing forecast, they commit the Issue to Providence and Fate. (d) For tho' generally we may know what can possibly happen, tho' we may compare these possible Events together, tho' we may determine for certain, not only which of two Possibilities is of greater, and which of lesser value, supposing them now to exist, but also what Effect can proceed from more, what from fewer Causes, either now in being or hereafter to be: and tho' we may conclude that Effect, which can be produc'd by most Causes and Ways, to have the highest degree of Probability, and therefore best to deserve our hopes and expectations (e); yet all Possibilities do not occur to the mind at all times and places, or, if they do, are not always rightly weigh'd and consider'd: and by reason of strange and sudden Accidents, which could scarcely have been foreseen, many things which we at first thought to be most possible, or the most likely to fall out, when we come to the point, appear quite otherwise than we before imagin'd them. Hence in Prudential Managements most Men think it sufficient to follow that Rule of Aristotle (a): We ought no less to hearken to the undemonstrated Declarations and Opinions of Skilful, of Ancient, or of Wise Men, than to Demonstration it self: for such Persons found their sight of things on Experience, and so look into the very Principles of Action. But let others fight out this Prize. As for the former and more noble Species, which we assign'd to Moral Discipline, that which considers what is Right, and what Wrong in Human Actions, the best share of which will be illustrated in our present Attempt; this is built altogether on so sure grounds, that we thence draw genuine Demonstrations, able to produce true and solid Science. Or, in other words, its Decrees may be in such a manner deriv'd from certain Principles, as to leave no Room, no Excuse for Doubt (b). This Assertion will be more clearly made out, if we in the first place consider and examine the Arguments usually alledg'd to the contrary. But, by the way we acknowledge Mr. Hobbs (c) to have been extremely mistaken, when he contends that 'Ethicks and Politicks are therefore capable of a Demonstration à priori (1), because we our selves are the Authors of the Principles of Justice and Injustice, of Right and Wrong, by making those Laws and Compacts whence the Measures of Justice are to be taken: since before any such Laws or Compacts were instituted, there was no such thing as Justice or Injustice, Publick Good or Evil, among Men, any more than among Beasts. The absolute Falseness of which Position we shall hereafter (2) have Occasion to demonstrate; as there is also a Fallacy lurking under the word Publick.

(a) Vide Erbard. Weigl. in Analyf. Aristolec. ex Euclid restitut. An Author who hath handled this Point with great Judgment and Accuracy. This Weigel (Professor of Math. at Jena) first put Pufendorf upon this Work, and was very assisting to him in it. (b) Ethic. l. 6. c. 5. (c) 'Tis not barely the Event of Things (says Fabius in Livy, l. 22.) which communicates this Knowledge, for that is only as the Instructor of Fools: but it is the same Immutable Reason which was and will be so long as the World continues in its present Condition. (d) Vide 2 Sam. X. 12. (e) Vide D. Cumberland de. L. Nat. c. 4. f. 4. n. 4.

V. To proceed therefore to the Objections; Some affirm Moral Things in general to be uncertain and unstable; and no Science can be of a more firm and settled Nature than the Object about which it is employ'd. To which it may be answered; That tho' Moral Entities owe their Original to Imposition, and therefore cannot be call'd Necessary in an absolute Sense; yet they do not proceed from such loose and wandring Principles, as that on this account all Knowledge about them should be weak and uncertain. For the very Nature of Man, assign'd him by the Wisdom and Goodness of the Almighty Creator, requir'd the Institution of the chief part of them; and these at least cannot be said to be unsettled and uncertain. This will appear beyond Dispute, when we come to enquire into the Origine of the Law of Nature. Besides, Human Actions are chiefly on this account call'd Moral, because they are not necessary but free; yet from hence it does not follow, that upon the laying down of certain Principles, such Affections may agree to these Actions, as may be undoubtedly demonstrated concerning them. For 'tis evident, that the Acts which fall under the Conduct of the Law of Nature, do in themselves contain an intrinsic Force and Power directing towards a Social Life, tho' the actual Exercise of them depends on the Free-will of Man. While we deliberate, we are properly said to be free, and the Effects which are to proceed from our Actions are, with respect to the Freedom, rightly term'd Contingent: but when we have once determin'd which way to act, the Connection between our Actions and the depending Effects is necessary and natural, and consequently capable of Demonstration. Neither do they argue any thing to the Purpose, who deny the Possibility of passing a clear Judgment on Human Deeds, upon account of the great Variety of Circumstances, any one of which seems to put a new Face and a new Quality on the Action; whence it happens that Legislators can seldom frame such a Law, as shall admit of no Exception, and where there shall not be frequent Occasion to neglect the Letter of the Statute, and to have Recourse to Equity for Relief. Because indeed there are establish'd Principles, by which it may be shown how much Weight and Force any Circumstance bears in affecting or varying any Action. And these very Principles are the Occasion, that Law-givers are frequently less Anxious about excepting from their Decrees some particular Cases involv'd in extraordinary Circumstances, but proceed with more Security in the Use of General Words. For they take it for granted, that the Judges whose Duty it is to examine particular Actions by the Rule of the Law, will be very able to understand what Power any Circumstance has over any Fact (d). But hence it cannot be inferr'd, that constant and perpetual Decrees sometimes fail; but we ought rather to conclude, that 'tis not worth while for Legislators in their written Laws to prescribe any thing about Cases that very rarely happen, since such may be easily determin'd by the Judges out of the Principles of the Law of Nature (e).

VI. But to make the Knowledge of the Law of Nature, of which we are now Treating, and which includes all Moral and Civil Doctrines that are genuine and solid, to make this Knowledge, we say, fully come up to the Measure and Perfection of Science, we do not think it necessary to assert with some Writers, that there are several things Honest or Vile of themselves, and Antecedent to all Imposition, and so to make these things the Object of our Natural and Perpetual Law, in Opposition to Positive Laws, where matters are right or wrong, just as the Lawgiver was pleas'd to make them either. For since Honesty (or Moral Necessity) and Turpitude are Affections of Human Deeds, arising from their Agreeableness or Disagreeableness to a Rule or a Law, and since a Law is the Command of a Superior, it does not appear how we can conceive any Goodness or Turpitude before all Law, and without the Imposition of a Superior (a). And truly, as for those who would establish an Eternal Rule for Morality of the Actions, without respect to the Divine Injunction and Constitution, the Result of their Endeavours seems to us to be the joining with GOD Almighty some Coeval Extrinsic Principle, which he was oblig'd to follow, in assigning the Forms and Essences of Things. Besides, 'tis acknowledg'd on all hands that GOD created Man, as well as every thing else, according to his own Free-will. From whence it evidently follows, that it must needs have been his Power and Pleasure to indue this Creature with whatever kind of Nature his Wisdom thought fit. And how then should it come to pass, that the Actions of Mankind should be vested with any Affection or Quality proceeding from intrinsic and absolute Necessity, without regard to the Institution, and to the Good Pleasure of the Creator? So that in reality all the Motions and Actions of Men, upon setting aside all Law, both Divine and Human, are perfectly indifferent: And some of them are therefore only said to be Naturally Honest or Dishonest, because that Condition of Nature, which God has freely bestow'd on Man, strictly enjoins the Performance or the Omission of them. Not that any Morality inheres of it self, and without all Law, in the bare Motion, or the meer Application of Natural Power (b): And therefore we see Beasts every day doing such things without Fault or Sin, in committing which Man would have been guilty of the highest Wickedness. Yet are not the Natural Motions of Men, and of Beasts in themselves different, but some Actions of Men are by the Authority of a Law invested with a Moral Quality, which does not at all touch or affect the Proceedings of Brutes.

Nor will it be to the Purpose for any one to object, that since Men are indu'd with Reason, which is wanting in Beasts, therefore there must be a Natural Difference between Human and Brutal Actions. For if we consider Reason, as uninform'd with the Knowledge and Sense of Law, or of some Moral Rule, it might perhaps even in this Condition, furnish Man with the Faculty of acting more Expeditiously and more Accurately than Beasts, and might assist the Natural Powers by an additional Shrewdness or Subtlety. But that it should be able to discover any Morality in Human Actions, without reflecting on some Law, is equally impossible as that a Man born Blind should make a Judgment on the Distinction of Colours.

Another Argument in Favour of our Opinion is suggested by Osiander, in his Notes on Grotius, de Jure Belli & Pacis (c). If (says he) there were any such thing as Moral Good or Evil before all Law, how could there be any Obligation to make such a Difference in our Actions, since all Obligation proceeds from the Command of a Superior? For Moral Good or Evil involve a Respect to a Person acting either of those ways; and if that Person be determin'd by no Obligation, he cannot be said properly to Act well or ill.

But here we desire it should be well observ'd, That this Indifference of the Natural Motion in Human Actions is by us maintain'd and establish'd only in respect to Morality. For otherwise Actions enjoin'd by the Law of Nature, have from the Determination of the first Cause a native Force in themselves of producing Effects good and useful to Mankind; as Actions forbidden by the same Law are productive of contrary Effects. But this Goodness and Illness which an Action bears naturally and of it self, can never constitute any new thing in Morals, which are quite beyond its Reach and Concern. For there are many things highly conducing to the Happiness and Advantage of a Man, which are not morally Good, as neither being Voluntary Deeds, nor Performances of any Law (1); and many Actions which contribute to Human Welfare, do in the same manner promote the Benefit of Beasts, in whom certainly they cannot bear any Moral Quality. Thus the abstaining from mutual Hurt, the moderate Use of Meat and Drink, the Care of Progeny or Off-spring, are equally Serviceable in the Preservation of Rational and of Irrational Kinds; and yet Beasts are never said to perform Actions morally Good (d). So tho' all Human Actions, falling under the Guidance of the Law of Nature, may be finally resolv'd into that natural Strength and Force which they bear in advancing the Profit or the Harm of Men, consider'd either in a single or in an united State; yet it does not follow on the other hand, that whatever thing is indu'd with a Natural Power of doing Good or Harm to any Species of Animals, is therefore the Object of the same Law.

Another Objection against the Doctrines we are now establishing, is taken from that Passage in Aristotle's Ethicks (e): Every Action and every Affection does not admit a Mediocrity: For there are some Affections which involve a kind of Pravity in their very Name, as Malice, Impudence and Envy, and ἐμψυχησία, or Rejoicing at another Man's Misfortune, and likewise some Actions, as Adultery, Theft and Murder. Now these and the like being Evil directly and in their own Natures, are not called Vices with Relation to any Excess or Defect; for absolutely, and without any Degrees, to be guilty of them, is to commit Sin.

(a) Selden de J. N. & G. l. 1. c. 4. (b) Plato in Sympos. This is the Nature of every Action, to be in it self neither Good nor Vicious; as what we are now doing, Drinking, Singing, Arguing. Neither of these, consider'd by it self, honest or dishonest; but the manner of performing it gives every Action its proper Denomination. For what is done right, we call Good, and what is done wrong, Evil or Indecent. The same Rule the Philosopher afterwards applies to Love. (c) P. 60.

(1) Such are a quick Apprehension, Knowledge, Memory, &c.

But 'tis by no means a Good Consequence, that because we have some Names of Actions or Affections, which of themselves, and without any Excess or Defect, imply Vice; therefore there are some Actions and Affections bad in themselves without respect to any Law. Because these Terms or Names do not signify bare Natural Motions and Acts, but such entire Moral Motions and Acts as are Repugnant to some Law, and so take in and express the whole Compass of a Moral Deed. For why, for Example, are Envy and its vile Consequents, which we but now mention'd under the Greek Name of ζηλοφροσύνη, reputed evil Affections, but because the Law of Nature ordains, that a Man should never be a Stranger to his own Kind, but should bear a part in the Pleasures and in the Sorrows of his Neighbours: to which Rule it is an open Contradiction, to receive any Joy from the Calamity of others, and to repine at their Happiness and Success (a)? And so what else is Impudence, but a wicked Firmness and Hardiness of Mind in the Commission of such things as the Law bids him be ashamed of? for not to be ashamed, or not to blush, can never be a Fault, when we are not by some Law suppos'd and enjoin'd to do otherwise. After the same manner, Adultery is the Pollution of another Man's Wife, whom the Laws appropriate to her Husband. Theft is the taking away of another Man's Goods against the Consent of the Owner, who by the Law is made the sole Disposer of them. Murder is the Killing of a Person in his Innocence, and against the Laws. Incest is a Conjunction with such a Person, as the Laws oblige us to abstain from, upon account of the Reverence which Men are by Law likewise taught to pay to Nearness of Blood. And the same Judgment is to be made of other Vices. But now, if from all these you take away the Respect to the Law, and the Morality inherent in such Actions, the bare Natural Fact will involve no Absurdity or Contradiction. For in a natural and absolute Sense, these are altogether indifferent Things; to have Conjunction with your nearest Relation, or with the same Woman who is enjoy'd by another, supposing he has no peculiar Right to her as he cannot have without Law; to take away the Life of a Creature of the same Species with your self; to take a thing which another Man had design'd for his Use, tho' he had obtain'd no Right by Law to exclude others from their Share in its Possession. And the Reason why so few Persons can conceive and apprehend such a Natural Indifference as we are maintaining, is only this, because from our Infancy we are taught to detest such Practices; and this Abhorrence being imprinted on our tender Minds, seems to grow into a kind of Natural Judgment; so that it seldom enters into Men's Heads to distinguish between the Materiality and the Formality of those Actions, or between our Performance of them as Natural, and our Commission of them as Moral, Agents. Hence it appears that Grotius had not consider'd this matter throughly, when among those things, to which the Power of GOD himself does not extend, because they involve a manifest Contradiction, he reckons (b) the Malignity of some Human Actions. Indeed 'tis impossible that twice two should not make four, because twice two and four are really the same thing, and only differ in Name, and in our manner of conceiving them. But the Contradiction which appears in Actions Repugnant to Nature's Law, is of a much lower Degree, and can never rise to an absolute Impossibility. And upon the same account he derives this Malignity from such Actions, as compar'd with right Reason. For in the very Terms of right Reason, when apply'd to Man, there inheres a respect to the Law of Sociableness enjoin'd to Human Race by the Creator. Thus at the same rate he alleges (c) for a Proof of the Independency of some of Nature's Laws, the necessary Agreement and Disagreement of things to Rational and Social Nature. But Man Obtain'd a Social Nature from the good Pleasure of GOD ALMIGHTY, not from any Immutable Necessity: and consequently the Morality of Actions Agreeable or Disagreeable to him as a Social Creature, must be deriv'd from the same Original and Spring; and must be attributed to Man, not by an absolute, but by an hypothetical Necessity; or upon supposal of that Condition which GOD was pleas'd freely to bestow on Mankind above the Privileges of the Inferior Creation. Nor can this Opinion of Grotius find any Shelter or Protection in those places of Scripture, which he quotes to shew, that GOD Almighty permits himself to be judg'd according to the Original Laws, and therefore they must be absolutely Immutable. For without Doubt GOD declar'd to Mankind from the very Beginning of Things, that he would be a Rewarder of the Good, and an Avenger on the Wicked, Hebr. XI. 6. And that he would render unto every Man according to his Works, Rom. II. 6. From which Declaration his Veracity not permitting him to go back, Abraham had reason to make that Appeal which we find, Gen. 18. 25. Shall not the Judge of all the Earth do right (d)? But how does it follow hence, that Human Actions have any Moral Quality antecedent to the Divine Imposition? Nor does it at all appear how the same Conclusion can be drawn from the Fifth Chapter of Isaiab, where God is pleas'd to refer the Cause between him and his Vineyard to the Judgment of Israel and Judab, and concludes, that he may lawfully neglect the farther Care and Culture of it, since the degenerate Fruit made so ill a return to his Pains. And lastly, from that place in the Sixth of Micah, where God is said to have a Controversy with his People, and to reason with Israel, it seems to be hinted, that Men may by their own Judgment understand the Equity of returning Thanks for Benefits receiv'd; but we cannot thence infer, that, because Men, who have a Sense of Kindness, are oblig'd to be Grateful, therefore this Gratitude is not commanded by any Law, but is of it self before all Law a necessary duty. From all that we have urg'd on this Head, it may appear, that the Sentence,

which is frequently in the Mouths of most Men, That the Precepts of Natural Law are of Eternal Verity, is so far to be restrain'd and limited, that this Eternity ought to reach no farther than the Imposition and Institution of GOD ALMIGHTY, and the Origine of Human Kind. Tho' to say the Truth, the Eternity which we improperly attribute to the Laws of Nature, is only to be rated in Proportion to the Opposition they bear to Possitive Laws, these being subject to frequent Alterations, while those remain fixt and unchangeable.

VII. It may be farther objected, and with some face of Probability among vulgar Judges, That Honesty and Turpitude must needs inhere in some Human Actions of themselves, and by the Force of their own Nature, not by the Power of external Imposition; for this reason, because our very Blood seems to have a natural sense of wicked Deeds, which it expresses by spreading a sudden Redness over the Face, whensoever we are touch'd either with the Memory of them, or with the Reproach. Now they say 'tis very improper to attribute a Natural Effect to a Moral Quality; but on the contrary, that, since such a certain Motion of the Blood raising a Redness in the Face, results in the manner of a natural Effect from an ill Action, that Illness or Pravity must likewise be applied to the Action as a natural and a necessary Affection or Quality. In return to which, in the first place we confess that the most wise Creator has implanted in the Minds of Men the Passion of Shame, to serve as it were for a Guard and Defence to Vertue, and for a Bridle to wicked Designs. And it is likewise probable, that unless GOD had design'd Man for an Agent, who was to frame his Proceedings by a Law, he would never have mingled such a Passion in Human Constitution, since without that Supposition it does not appear to be of any use at all in the World. But indeed, it is no manner of Contradiction, that a Moral Quality owing its Original to Imposition, should produce in Man (tho' not directly and immediately) a natural Effect. For the Soul being united by the closest Ties to the Body, while it self apprehends moral Concerns, and is affected with them, may at the same time easily raise a peculiar Motion in some part of the Body. Besides, we ought to observe, that Shame does not only arise from the Pravity of Actions, but also from any Fact, tho' not morally Evil, which we think will lessen our Character and Esteem. For according to Des Cartes's Definition, it is nothing else but a Species of Sorrow, founded upon Self-love, and proceeding from a Sense or Fear of Disgrace (1): Or, as Aristotle speaks (a), it is a certain Grief and Confusion at things which appear hurtful to our Reputation. For Man is a most ambitious Creature, and highly conceited of his own Excellency, whence he takes an extraordinary Pleasure, if he can find out any Advantage or Perfection in himself, on the Strength of which he may brag, and swell, and carry himself above the Dimensions of his Neighbours. And whenever he apprehends these Talents to be the least impair'd, and to weigh lighter in common Account, he immediately conceives the deepest Regret in his own Mind. Now the Heart, that chief Seat of Human Excellency, being affected with this Passion, presently sends up the Blood to be an outward Sign of it in the Face. But because Man does not only value himself upon account of abstaining from Evil Deeds, but for several other things, which are not endued with any moral Quality, if he suffer in any of these latter Points, he is equally liable to Shame: Thus we see many Persons who cannot forbear Blushing at their Lameness, or Baldness, at a Wen, a Crump-back, or any other Deformity of Body, at some particular Diseases, at Poverty, bad Cloaths, at faultless Ignorance, or at harmless Mistake, and at many other Things, which are by no means morally Evil (b). And among Sins, those especially put a Man to the Blush, which directly argue a Lowness and Dejection of Mind, and which for that reason make us appear more Contemptible (c); nor has the Fear of this Contempt the same general Power, but only when we are in danger of suffering it from those Persons, whose Esteem and good Opinion we are particularly covetous of Enjoying (c). And those desperate Wretches who have once sinned themselves out of all Care of Credit, are not afterwards touch'd with the least Blush upon the Commission of the vilest Wickedness (d). Whatever we have urg'd against the natural, the absolute, and the necessary Goodness or Pravity of Human Deeds, does not at all seem to rob moral Knowledge of its requisite Certainty, for this would remain fixt and unmov'd, tho' the Morality of our Actions depended entirely on Imposition.

VIII. But if this Doctrine be true, which we have asserted, what will become of that Moral Latitude, which is so much talk'd of, and so frequently oppos'd to Mathematical Strictness? Do's not that seem to detract somewhat from the Certainty which we maintain? This Doubt will be clearly solv'd, if it be consider'd how far we affirm Demonstration to prevail in these Notions, and in what things this Latitude is to be found. Demonstrations therefore are here chiefly employ'd about Moral Qualities, so far as those Qualities appear for certain to agree to such Actions or Persons: When we enquire (for example) whether such an Action be just or unjust, whether such a Right, or such an Obligation, accrue to such a Person, consider'd in general, or as that personal Capacity is common to others with him. Now all these kinds of Truths we maintain to be so clearly and certainly deducible from their genuine Principles and Causes, that no Man, in his right Wits, can entertain a Doubt concerning them. And tho' we should discover some little latitude, or something analogous to latitude, in the Questions, yet that would not be able to prejudice the Certainty of them in it self. As for the Goodness or Pravity of Actions, as they denote their agreeableness or repugnancy to the Rule of the Law, in this respect they seem capable of no manner of Latitude, but whatever declines from Good must immediately be pronounc'd Evil. Yet under other Considerations, at least with respect to Men, they admit of something like Latitude; Latitude, properly speaking, being applicable only to Quantity. And first, because in Laws the force and power of obliging Men is not always of the same tenour and degree, but appears more strict in commanding and forbidding some Actions, and more loose about others. Whence it comes to pass that we are forc'd to distinguish between Law and Equity, or between what's rigorously and exactly just, and what's equal and fair to be done. The difference between which things is this, we lye under a more necessary Duty of performing the former, but the latter engage our Obedience with a gentler tie, and with an inferiour obligation. Yet these last have a wider Object than the first; the offices of other Vertues being extended much farther than those of Justice. It happens likewise very commonly, that among Men, and in Human Courts, smaller Deviations from the Law, scarce fall under consideration or animadversion. Many things too are ordain'd and commanded in so weak and indifferent a manner, that they seem to engage Men rather by affecting their Modesty than their Honesty: so that those who perform them deserve commendation, those who omit them are not obnoxious to Reprehension. And among these Matters Grotius (a) seems to reckon Concubinage, Divorce, and Polygamy, before they were forbidden by the Law of GOD: These (saith he) are such things as Reason it self tells us it is more honest to abstain from; yet not so, as that (setting aside the Divine Precept) they include any grievous fault.

But of these we shall treat in their proper place (1). Hither likewise is to be referr'd that passage of Aristotle (b); He that declines but a little from right dealing, whether to the excess or to the defect, is not charg'd with guilt, but he that transgresses in a larger measure; because his faultiness discovers and betrays it self by its bulk. It may happen too that a thing in it self shall be unobliging and indifferent, and yet the performance or the omission of it shall either always, or however at some certain juncture, be more for our advantage and use. To this Case belong those passages of St. Paul in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, Chap. VI. vers. 12. Chap. VII. vers. 6, 7, 8, 9. Chap. X. vers. 23. And that observation of Grotius (c), That sometimes by an abuse of words, those things which Reason shows to be Honest, or better than the contrary, tho' they are not enjoyn'd, yet shall be call'd Dictates or Ordinances of the Law of Nature. From all that has been said, we may understand whether, and in what manner there may be said to be Degrees of Good. If then we consider Good in a strict fence for a Congruity to the Law, 'tis as impossible there should be any thing better than what is Good, as that there should be any thing straighter than what is properly straight. Yet one Good may be pronounced better than another, according to the different Degrees of Necessity which are found in both, and upon account, of which, if they cannot be both perform'd, one of them manifestly gives place to the other. To this purpose see Matthew VIII. 21. and 22. where it was a good thing to bury a dead Father, but a better to follow our Saviour: Acts VI. 2. where it was a good thing to Minister to the Poor, but a better to Preach the Gospel: On which point we shall be larger hereafter (2). Lastly, when Actions, in themselves lawful and indifferent, are measur'd and rated according to their usefulness or expedience, one of them is declar'd better than another, as it is more advantageous to the present Circumstance or Occasion.

IX. According to our Doctrine already deliver'd, must that place of Grotius (d) be explain'd, about the Causes of Doubt in Moral Actions; where he says, There is not an equal Certainty to be met with in Morals and Mathematicks: which therefore happens, because Mathematical Sciences treat of Forms, as distinct and abstracted from all sorts of Matter, and because the Forms themselves are generally such as will admit of no Medium, as we can find nothing which is not either crooked or straight. But in Morals the least Circumstance alters the Matter; and the Forms, of which they treat, have commonly some intervenient Latitude, by reason of which they sometimes approach nearer to one Extream, and sometimes to the other. Thus between things absolutely commanded, and absolutely forbidden, there are some things left indifferent; but this Medium of Indifference sometimes inclines nearer to the Injunction, sometimes to the Prohibition. Whence frequently arises an Ambiguity, somewhat like what we meet with in Twilight, or in Water not perfectly hot. As to this Assertion, we must confess, that, as about other Actions, so especially about making War, a Doubt may probably arise either because the Fact which occasions the War is not yet fully made out, or whether it be of so great Consequence, as to deserve a Prosecution by Arms, where the Cause is so desperate, and where the attending Miseries are so numerous; or whether in the present Juncture and Condition of the Commonwealth, it be a Moot Case, which Course ought to be taken, either to return the Injury in a Hostile manner, or rather conceal the Affront, and defer the Satisfaction, lest an untimely pursuit of Revenge should draw greater Misfortunes on the State. But that the Causes of doubting in such Cases proceed from the uncertainty of Moral Matters, this we absolutely deny. The reason why the Demonstrations in Mathematicks are so very accurate, is not the Abstraction from Matter, but another, that we shall produce by and by. That in Morals the least Circumstance alters the Matter, is an ambiguous expression. If this be the sense of it, that the least Circumstance alters the Quality of an Action, that is, turns it from Good to Evil, this Variation does not at all injure the Certitude of Moral Knowledge. For a Line that recedes never so little from straightness degenerates into crookedness, and yet no uncertainty arises hence in Geometrical Operations. But if this be the meaning of the phrase, that the least Circumstance either raises or lessens the Quantity of an Action; this, at least in Human regard, is not always true; for trifling Accidents and Punctilio's seldom weigh any thing in the Sentence of a Moral Judge. Yet if we grant this Supposition, it will not in the least diminish the certainty of Morality; since even in Mathematicks, the smallest accession, or the most inconsiderable loss, varies the Quantity. Lawful or Indifferent Things, which compose the Medium between Commands and Prohibitions, we have already observ'd only in this respect to incline sometimes more to one hand, sometimes to the other, as it appears more expedient and useful sometimes to perform them, sometime to omit them. Yet even hence nothing of Uncertainty can arise, nor is any such Medium form'd as we can clearly understand either to be Good or Ill. So that those Examples and Instances of Twilight and Lukewarm-water, are improperly applied to the present Case; they being of that kind of Media we call Media Participationis, as Lukewarm-water partakes of hot and cold together. But those Media which we call Media Negationis, as are Indifferent and Lawful Matters, possess not the least share of either of the Extreams, but equally deny them both. For we say in the same manner, Good is not Indifferent, and Evil is not Indifferent; and it does not appear, how a Medium of this Nature can prove a Cause and an Occasion of Uncertainty.

X. Yet as to the Quantities which are used in Morality, they, we confess, are capable of some Latitude, and it's chiefly on this account, that Mathematical Knowledge is esteem'd to have so much higher Degrees of Nicety and Exactness than Moral. The reason of all this depends on the different Constitutions of Natural and of Moral Quantity. For Natural or Physical Quantities may be accurately compared, and measured and divided into the most equal parts; because they are represented as the Affections of Material Things, which are the Objects of our Senses. Whence we may precisely determine, what Rule and Proportion they bear to one another; especially if we employ the assistance of Numbers, by the application of which all Questions of this kind are most exquisitely solv'd. And besides, those Quantities are the effect of Nature, and consequently immoveable and permanent. On the other hand, Moral Quantities proceed from the Impositions and the Estimation of intelligent and free Agents, whose Judgment and Pleasure not falling under natural Dimensions, the Quantities which they thus conceive and determine, cannot be circumscribed by any such measure, but retain as it were somewhat of the looseness and liberty of their Original. Nor indeed did the ends, for which Moral Quantities were first introduced, require any such punctual Minuteness; but it was sufficient for the use of Human Life, that Persons, Things, and Actions, should be more grossly rated and compar'd together. Thus we discover a Latitude in the value or esteem of Persons; by which tho' we understand that one Person is to be preferr'd to another, yet we cannot exactly determine whether he exceeds him in a double, or treble, or quadruple proportion of Worth. The like Latitude occurs in the valuation of different Things, and of Actions belonging to Commerce; on the account of which we can scarcely fix any settled Price on any other things besides those, which the Civilians call res fungibiles, (1) Consumeable Goods, that is, such as we borrow for our present use, upon condition of repaying them in the same quantity and quality: As to the rest, we esteem them equal and indifferent, and to be determin'd by the private Bargains and Agreements of particular Men. And so likewise the proportion between many Faults and Punishments is adjusted with some Latitude: For who, for Example, can tell precisely how many Lashes; and how smartly laid on, comes just up to the guilt of some particular piece of Thievery? But in such Cases we assign what proportion we think fit, with great looseness and security. We find too a very remarkable Latitude in many Businesses and Affairs of Life: Human Lawgivers are not us'd to cut every thing to the quick (2). The Laws, and the Philosophers (says (a) Tully) clear Subtleties in a different manner: The Laws no otherwise than as Things may be felt and handled, by reason of their grossness, but the Philosophers, as they may be discern'd by Reason and Understanding. And in the Decision of Causes, 'tis a Maxim vulgarly known, That the Judge does not concern himself with every petty Circumstance. And so when such a number of Honest Men are appointed Arbitrators of any Controversie, there is fair room for Latitude in their Judgment and Sentence (b). Farther, in executing Vindictive Justice, there is an Indulgence made of a convenient Latitude, not only on the part of Clemency, but of Severity too. To which purpose is that saying of Tacitus (c); All great Examples have somewhat of Injustice; but the Injury they do to particular Persons is recompenc'd by the common Advantage they bring to the Publick: And that of Jason in Plutarch (d); 'Tis necessary that those should act unjustly in small Matters, who intend to maintain Justice in the grand

(1) To understand what is meant by these Terms, See B. 5. c. 7. f. 1. (2) To this purpose, Vid. Senec. De Ira. l. 11. c. 27. (a) Off. III. c. 17. (b) Add. L. 105. f. de Solution. (c) Annal. 4. c. 44. (d) De Sanitat. tuend. & Præcept. Reipub. gerend.

and the chief Concerns. Most Vertues likewise, besides Justice, admit a free Loofness and Latitude in the Exercise of them; as for Example, Pity, Liberality, Gratitude, Equity, and Charity. And so, in common Life, we apply the Names of Habits under a Latitude of Signification. Thus we call him a Just Man, who commits (tho' deliberately) but a few pieces of Injustice. Lastly, we may observe, that if in Moral Consideration some Quantities are brought to an exact Standard, and a punctual Measure, as the Price of some Commodities, the Periods of Time settled by Law, and the like; yet this precise Determination do's not so much proceed from the Things themselves, or from the Times, as from the Institution and Will of Men (a). From all these Remarks we conceive the Difference between Mathematical and Moral Demonstrations to appear very Clear and Evident; and it is no more than this, that the former are chiefly employ'd about Quantity, which is in its own Nature dispos'd for the nicest Division and Determination; whereas the latter endeavour nothing farther than to prove for certain such a Quality of such a Subject, leaving the Decision of Moral Quantities to the larger Scope and Range of Human Will.

XI. But we must take heed of confounding this Moral Certitude which we have been so long establishing, with that which is so often apply'd to Matters of Fact; as when we declare (for Example) such a thing to be Morally Certain, because it has been confirm'd by creditable Witnesses. For this latter sort of Moral Certitude is nothing else but a strong Presumption grounded on Probable Reasons, and which very seldom fails and deceives us. Ziegler in his Notes on Grotius (b), has not sufficiently distinguish'd this inferior Certainty from the former and the more noble kind, while, tho' he grants the more general Precepts of Ethicks to bear an equal Evidence with the Propositions of any Science properly so call'd, yet he affirms, That the particular Conclusions have a much shorter Degree of Certitude, and are often involv'd in dark Obscurities, by reason that the things themselves, concerning which such Conclusions are form'd, are many ways changeable and contingent: And the Example he brings is this; We have Moral Certitude and Evidence, that an honest and serious Person, when he takes an Oath, swears truly. And yet this Evidence is not Absolutely such, but Conditionally, because it is not directly Impossible, but that a Man of these good Qualities, may forswear himself, since he may fall from his Vertue and Integrity. But now that Certitude, by which we know Perjury to be an Evil, is very different from that by which we believe a good Man is not guilty of Perjury; nor is the latter Proposition deduced fairly as a Conclusion from the former. Thus in the same manner the Faith we give to Historians is reckon'd Morally certain, when they testify a thing vastly remote from our Memory and Knowledge, and of which there is no real and demonstrative Proof now extant; and especially if many agree in the Relation: Because it is not Probable that many Persons should join together by Compact in putting a Trick on Posterity, or should entertain any hopes, that the Lie would not in time be discover'd. And yet for all this, if occasion were, we could produce Examples of many popular Fables, that have pass'd through several Ages, under the Colour and Character of Truth.

CHAP. III.

Of the Understanding of Man, as it concurs to MORAL ACTIONS.

SINCE that part of Knowledge which we have undertaken to explain, is chiefly employ'd in demonstrating what's Right and what's Wrong, what's Good and what's Evil, what's Just and what's Unjust, in Human Actions; in the first place we are oblig'd to consider and examine the Principles and the Affections of these Actions, and to show how by the Help of Imputation, they are conceiv'd to be Morally joyn'd and connected to the Authors of them: in this respect then, the Excellency of Man chiefly outshines the Condition of Brute Creatures, that he is endow'd with a most noble and exalted Soul, which exerts it self not only with a singular Light as to the Knowing and Judging of Things, but also with a prodigious Quickness and Activity, as to the Embracing or Rejecting them. So that on this Score the Actions of Mankind ought to be rank'd in a much higher Class than the Motions of Beasts, which proceed purely from the Spurs of Senses, without the precedent help of Reflexion, whatever Charon (c) has alledg'd to the contrary. That Power of the Human Soul which it bears as a Light for its Guidance and Direction, we commonly call the Understanding, and in this, as it is concern'd about voluntary Actions, we conceive Two Faculties (1): One is that by which as by a kind of Mirror, the Object is shewn to the Will, with a general and confus'd Notice whether it be Agreeable or Disagreeable, Good or Evil. The Other is that by which the Reasons of Good and Evil, which in several Objects offer themselves numerously on both sides, are weigh'd and compar'd, and Judgment is given; what, when, and in what manner we are to act; and Consultation taken about the most proper Means for the Accomplishment of the propos'd End. And here it must be observ'd, that the Beginning of a voluntary Act should regularly proceed from the Understanding, whence arises the vulgar Maxim,

————— Ignoti nulla Cupido,

Objects unknown can never move Desire:

Although this Knowledge which precedes the Acts of Volition, is not always distinct, because a confus'd Notion is sufficient to make the Will bestir it self. And thus when we have not a tolerable Knowledge of a thing, we cannot be said properly and fully to desire it; yet we may desire to make Trial of it.

II. As to the former Faculty of the Understanding, we must remark, that it is of the Number of those which are commonly call'd Natural Faculties; contradistinct to the Free: in as much as it is not in the Power of Man to apprehend Things otherwise than as the Images of them present themselves to the Mind; nor can the Will by any Force hinder the Understanding from assenting to a Proposition which appears Clear and Evident to it. But thus far a Man is at Liberty, he can more diligently consider the Object in view, and more exactly weigh in his Mind the opposite Reasons of Good and Evil, and so not stick at the outward Face and Semblance of Things, but pierce into the deepest Secrets of their Texture and Constitution. And after so strict an Enquiry and Examination, he can pronounce a positive Judgment in the Cause before him. The Understanding being in this respect, as in many others, like the Eye, that it makes a very important Difference, in beholding Things with a roving and transitory Cast, and in contemplating them with a fix'd and steady Application (a). And hence 'tis easie to conceive, how far this Power of the Soul, falls under the Culture and Cognizance of Laws. For since 'tis beyond Human Ability that the Understanding should apprehend Things after another manner than they appear: and since Credit or Assent cannot but answer the Idea of the Understanding, no Person can judge otherwise of a Matter, than as he appears to have conceiv'd it; nor can he by any just Law be compell'd to a contrary Judgment: For suppose a Man to be in the wrong, yet a bare Injunction and Command will never make him the Wiser. Yet because many Things escape a negligent Searcher, which offer themselves to the Notice of more curious Enquirers; and because the Will may hinder the Understanding from contemplating some Truth, by presenting other Objects to tempt and engage its Care; therefore an earnest and assiduous Application of Mind is of vast use in confirming the Judgment; and consequently those who are entrusted with a Care and Authority over others, ought to make all fair Provision for the Assistance and Direction of a serious Meditation: and they may likewise engage Men by the Sanction of Punishments to apply with Diligence those Means which are most likely to dispel the Clouds and Perplexities of Things, and to represent them in their Genuine Colours and Condition.

III. Farther, Since the Understanding performs the Office of a Light in our Course of Action, and since when it doth not guide us aright, 'tis impossible but we should lose our way, we ought to establish this as a certain Principle, That there is both in the apprehending Faculty, and in the Judgment, a natural Rectitude, which upon due Attention given, will not suffer us to be deceiv'd in reference to Moral Things, and that neither of those Powers are so far corrupted and deprav'd, as to put us under a Necessity of being mistaken. For at the same rate it would follow, that because a Glass ill cut presents every Image in a distorted Confusion, and because the Tongue when cover'd with the Tincture of the Jaundice, is not able to discern the Difference of Tastes, therefore the Senses, to which those Offices belong, must be in general pronounc'd Fallacious and Uncertain. Neither could it be charg'd on us as Guilt, that we have done a bad Action, if we were not furnish'd with a clear Discernment of Good and Evil; and it would be the highest Injustice to impute that Error as Sinful, which was beyond our Power to avoid or shake off. Therefore, unless we would utterly subvert and destroy all the Morality of Acting, we must by all Means maintain, that the Understanding of Man is naturally Right and Certain, and upon sufficient Enquiry and Meditation, does always apprehend Things clearly, and as they are in their own Nature and Constitution: And likewise that the practical Judgment cannot prove so far Debas'd and Degenerate, (at least as to the general Precepts of Nature's Law,) as to excuse the Acts proceeding thence from being imputed as if they were Effects of invincible Ignorance (b). And here we desire it should be consider'd, that we are not debating what Power the Understanding has about Matters which depend on peculiar Revelation from G O D, or what it can perform in such Extraordinary Cases, without the singular Assistance of Divine Grace, because this is the Subject and Business of another Profession. Neither are we concern'd to examine whether in Speculative Truths, requiring the most subtle Disquisitions of Mind, a Man may not through ill Information, get such firm Possession of a false Tenet, as not to be able to recover himself out of the Mistake. But we are discoursing only about the Power of the Understanding, as it is employ'd in squaring our Actions according to the Dictates of Nature. And, as to this Point, we conceive that there's no Man of proper Years, and Master of his own Reason, so desperately dull and stupid, as not to comprehend, at least, the most general Rules of Natural Law, and those which are of the greatest use in Common Life, and not to discern the Agreement they bear to the Rational and Social Condition of Mankind. And tho' a Person through extream Idleness, may possibly never have thought of one or two Precepts, or through precipitate Rashness may have fram'd wrong Opinions of Acting, or by bad Information, or a Mind corrupted with vicious Courses, may have call'd their Truth and Necessity in question, or have taken up other Rules of Action contrary to Natural Suggestions, yet we do not by any means acknowledge this Ignorance or this Error to be Insuperable, so as to hinder the Imputation of Deeds Consequent on such a Principle. For these universal Edicts are so clearly publish'd and explain'd, and so closely interwoven with our Being, that no one can be overcome with so Brutal a Sottishness, as not to be capable of apprehending and discerning them; since to this Business there is not requir'd any singular Force of Wit, any peculiar Shrewdness of Reason, but an ordinary Portion of Natural Light is sufficient, provided that the Mind be not vitiated and obstructed by some Distemper. To which Purpose Tully's Distinction about Folly and Madness is observable; Folly (says (a) he) if assisted with a due State of Health, is able to maintain a competent Sett of Duties, and to keep up, in some manner, the Culture and the Methods of Common Life; but Madness is a perfect Disease, that quite Extinguishes the Right of the Mind, and involves all its Objects in a general Obscurity.

IV. The Judgment pass'd on Moral Actions by the Understanding, as it is suppos'd Conscious of a Law, and therefore Accountable to the Lawgiver, is commonly call'd Conscience, which as it either precedes or follows the Action, we may for Distinction sake, branch into Antecedent and Consequent: This last is the reflex Judgment of the Understanding, on Things done or forborn, approving what's Well, and condemning what's Ill; the Attendants of which are either Tranquillity or Restlessness of Mind, according to the different Testimony it bears; and as it gives us Occasion to expect either the Favour or the Displeasure of the Legislator, and either the Good-Will, or the Hatred of other Men (b). The Former, coming before the Action, informs us, what is Good and what Evil, and consequently what to be done, and what to be omitted. But here it is carefully to be observ'd, that the Conscience obtains no other place in the Guidance of Human Operations, than with respect to its being instructed in the Knowledge of some Law, since Laws only are the proper Rules of Acting. And therefore, if any Man will attribute to the practical Judgment, or the Conscience, any peculiar Force or Ability of directing us in our Doings, owing neither to its Original, nor its Dependence on any Law, he will invest with a Legal Power the vain Fancy of Private Men, and will bring the wildest Disorder and Confusion on the Affairs and Transactions of the World. For we must declare, that as far as our Diligence could reach in Searching, the word Conscience in this strange Sense, is neither to be met with in the Holy Scriptures, nor in the ancient Latin Authors: but it was first introduc'd by the Schoolmen, and has been maintain'd in these latter Ages by the Crafty Casuists, for the better securing of Men's Minds and Fortunes, to their own Authority and Advantage. But if we have regard to the true and genuine Signification of the Word, to do a thing against Conscience, is nothing else, but to commit a voluntary Evil, knowing it to be such; and is oppos'd to Transgressing out of Ignorance and Mistake. And this we mean by Conscience in our present Enquiry, recovering it to its ancient Import, and exploding the new Abuses that have been obtruded on its Signification.

V. Conscience rightly inform'd is of two sorts; for either it clearly understands that the Perswasion which it holds concerning some Performance or Omission, is built on certain Principles, and agrees with the Laws, which are the Rule of Action and of Conscience; or else, it esteems indeed its Perswasion as True and Certain, and sees no reason to doubt of it, tho' it cannot reduce it to a formal Demonstration; but on the contrary, relies chiefly on Arguments from Probability. In the former Case it is commonly term'd a (1) Right, and in the latter a Probable Conscience. Concerning a Right Conscience this general Maxim is establish'd, That every Voluntary Action against its Suggestion, and the Omission of any Action which it declares to be Necessary, is Sin, and so much the more heinous Sin, as the Person had a more perfect Knowledge of his Duty; because a Transgression under such Advantages, argues a greater Pravity and Corruption of Mind (c).

The Difference of a Probable Conscience from a Right, we conceive, not to be in reference to the Truth of the Perswasion, but upon account of its Ignorance and Inability, to reduce this Truth Artificially into the Exactness of a Demonstration; for which reason it has not so evident and unshaken a Knowledge of its Certainty. For (as the Logicians speak) nothing is Probable in it self, but only with respect to our Understanding. And by this Rule of Probability the greatest part of Mankind are steer'd and govern'd in their Proceedings. For few Persons are able to apprehend Human Duties as they flow from their first Origine and Foundation. And most Men rely with so much Security on the Tenor of Common Life (1), on the unquestionable Authority of unsuspected Teachers, and on the manifest Decency or Conveniency of such and such Actions, that they think it a superfluous Trouble to make a more curious Enquiry into their Reasons and Foundations of them. In the same manner as the greatest Number of Artificers are satisfy'd with performing their Work by Instruments Mechanically prepar'd, and leave the Mathematicians to demonstrate the Reasons of their Operations. And Men are apt especially to content themselves with these probable Appearances, when the Proposition in Debate is remov'd at a vast Distance from the first Principles, and therefore requires a tedious and troublesome Deduction, which is commonly above the Capacity of those who have not run the Course of the Sciences, nor cultivated their Reason by a Learned Institution. Yet hence can be drawn no Protection for that pernicious Probability maintain'd by the later Casuists, and especially by those of the Order of the Jesuites, which resolves it self into the sole Authority of a single Doctor, tho' destitute of Reasons, and oppos'd by all other Judgments. For this Principle tends to the utter Subversion of all Morality, and seems design'd only for the keeping under the Senses and the Consciences of Men, and making them depend entirely on the pleasure of the Priests: as has been prov'd at large by others (a). We need only observe farther, that they act not at all fairly when they confound Probability of Fact, with Probability of Judgment, and of Law. For indeed, in Matters of Fact the Authority of one Great and Credible Person, may raise a probable Presumption, and obtain at least half the Force of a full Proof. But in defining Matters of Law, 'twould be the highest Absurdity and Rashness to attribute so much to the Declarations of one Man, not grounded on good Arguments, and at the same time contradicted by Persons of equal Rank and Power, as that it should be safely admitted for the Square and Standard of Acting.

VI. For the Information and Direction of a probable Conscience, there are many Rules commonly laid down, concerning which our Opinion is this, That they take place only where there seems to be a Clashing between strict Law and Equity; or when both sides of the Question are alike free from the Obligation of the Laws; yet so as that one of them may seem to approach nearer to Honesty, or may appear more likely to produce some Convenience or Inconvenience than the other. For in Matters absolutely determin'd by the Command or Prohibition of some Law, there is no room left for such a free Choice, as that we may reject one side and take the other, because positive Laws will not be satisfy'd with Equivalents, but demand a punctual Obedience to their Decrees. And therefore this Freedom of Election must be confin'd to indifferent Things, to which the Laws do not extend their Sphere and Authority. The chief Rules are these:

1. In a probable Conscience two Opinions being propos'd, neither of them contrary to the Laws, one of which is founded on better Reasons, the other is the more safe; either of the Two may be follow'd without blame.

2. Two Opinions being propos'd, of which one is built on weaker Reasons, the other is the more safe, the latter ought justly to have the Preference.

3. In a probable Conscience a Learned Man may follow that Opinion which seems to him to have the greatest Degree of Probability, tho' perhaps it may appear different to others: unless he is under Apprehension of incurring some Inconvenience or Damage upon account of dissenting from the common Judgment.

4. An Unlearned Man may safely follow the Authority of Wiser Persons.

5. A Subject, or one plac'd under the Command of others (2), may, upon the Order of his Superiors, fairly do a Thing which he does not certainly know to be Unlawful, tho' in his private Judgment he does not think it very Probable that it ought to be done.

6. In Things of little Moment and Concern, if there are probable Arguments alledg'd on both hands, either side may be taken.

7. In Things of great Moment, if there arise probable Arguments on both sides the safer part is to be prefer'd, or that from which there cannot follow so great an Evil, tho' we are never so much Mistaken, as there might have done, had we err'd in the opposite Opinion.

VII. To proceed; Tho' according to our present design, we are engag'd only to treat of what's Good, and what Evil, what Just and what Unjust; leaving the enquiring about Things Profitable and Unprofitable to another part of Knowledge, yet it will not be much out of the way, if we here consider in short, what Rules the Understanding ought to have regard to, in Deliberations concerning Usefulness and Convenience. Especially because the Directions already laid down, depend very much on these; the Profit or Advantage of Things bearing a great force in our Proceedings; according to that of the Apostle, 1 Cor. V. 12. All things (that is, all things which he had been there speaking of) are lawful for me; but all things are not expedient. And in Civil Business, Affairs are many times committed to the sole Wisdom and Conduct of the Person employ'd, in which Cases a Man is conceiv'd to have acted ill, if by Imprudence or by Negligence he has taken the less profitable Course. In Debates therefore arising about such Things to which we are bound by any Necessity, or any determinate Obligation, (for Necessity excludes all deliberation and debates, and determinate Obligations leave nothing to the Agent but the duty of Execution;) this is laid down for a Foundation, that nothing ought to be undertaken from which in Moral Esteem, (or as far as Human foresight can pierce into the Obscurity and Uncertainty of Future Events,) there do's seem likely to follow as much Evil as Good, or more Evil than Good. The reason of which Maxim is evident. For as much of Evil as any thing has joyn'd with it, so much it loses of its Goodness, and consequently when the Good and Evil are in Equal Degrees, the former is swallow'd up by the latter, and the Thing is depriv'd of the Nature and Denomination of Good. Hence that Field is reckon'd very unprofitable, which do's not in the value of its Fruits exceed the Charges of Tillage (a). For those Matters which make the Subjects of such Deliberations as we are now speaking of, are undertaken purely on account of the use and advantage which may accrue to us from them (b). As Corollaries from this General Truth, we may subjoin the three Rules establish'd by Grotius (c): 1. If the Thing under debate has an equal efficacy or ability for the production of Good and Evil, that is, if we may as easily gain as lose by it, we may then venture on it, when the Good Consequence is a greater Good, than the Ill Consequence is an Evil: that is, if we are like to gain more by being successful in the Attempt, than we can lose if we prove unsuccessful. Thus it would be no rashness or imprudence to hazard ten Pounds, suppose in a dangerous Adventure, when we may get an hundred, if the Chance prove fortunate (d). 2. If the Good and Evil which may proceed from the thing in debate appear equal, we may then chuse it, with this provision, that it has a greater efficacy or ability for producing the Good, than the Evil: that is, if

'tis more easie that Gain should arise from it than Damage. In which point we cannot omit the noble Argument of Arnobius (e): Since this (says he) is the condition of future things, that they cannot be felt or held by any anticipating touch, is it not much the clearer Reason of two Uncertainties, the expectation of which is equally doubtful, rather to believe that which brings some hopes along with it, than that which affords none? For in the former Case there can be no danger, tho' the Matter expected never come to pass: But in the latter we incur the highest Damage, if what we disbelieved should not prove a falsity in the final event of things (f). 3. If the Good and Evil seem to be unequal, and the ability of the thing to produce them not less unequal, then we must determine our choice by one of the two Conditions, either that the ability for producing Good compar'd with that for producing Evil, be greater in proportion, than the Evil it self compar'd with the Good: (that is, if the Excess of Evil be less than the ability for producing Good;) or, if the Good be greater compar'd with the Evil, than the Ability for producing the Evil, compar'd with that for producing the Good: that is, if the power and efficacy which seem to incline towards the production of the Evil, be less considerable than the degree by which the Good exceeds the Evil. To which we will add this fourth Rule, That where Both the Good and the Ill effect of a Thing, and likewise its ability for producing of both, remain uncertain and undetermin'd, 'tis the part of a wise and cautious Man, to abstain from such a Matter, unless he is driven on it by urgent Necessity.

VIII. When the Judgment of the Understanding is at a loss, and cannot discern whether a Thing be Good or Evil, and consequently whether it ought to be perform'd, or omitted, we call this a Doubtful Conscience. Concerning which this Rule ought to be observ'd, That as long as the Judgment cannot by the force of any Arguments be inclin'd to one side more than to the other, the Action is to be suspended, and that therefore, he who proceeds to do a thing about which his Conscience still hangs in an equilibrium commits a sin; because as much as in him lyes, he has transgress'd a Law. For he declares his Mind to this effect, I am not indeed certain, whether or no this Action is repugnant to the Laws; but whether it be or no, I am resolv'd to undertake it. 'Tis good Advice (says (g) Tully) to forbear doing a thing, where we doubt whether it be fair and just, or foul and injurious: For when we are certain the thing is just, we have clear light and guide to proceed by; but to act with an unsettled judgment, do's not free us from the Thoughts and Intentions of offering an Injury. Grotius (a) says that this Rule, of abtaining from a doubtful Action, do's not hold when we are oblig'd to do either this or that, and yet are unsatisf'd in either, whether it be just or not; for then we are allow'd to chuse that side which appears less Evil or Unjust. For whensoever we are under the Necessity of making a choice, the lesser Evil assumes the Character of Good. This Observation, we think, ought rather to have a place in Evils of Damage, than in those of Morality; because in the former it is reckon'd a Gain and an Advantage, to avoid a greater Evil by admitting a less. But it cannot be applied to Moral Evils, without a very dextrous Construction. Properly speaking, therefore, of two Moral Evils, neither is to be chosen. Yet it frequently happens, that two Laws, either both Affirmative, or one Affirmative and the other Negative, shall seem to clash with one another, so that we cannot satisfy both at the same time (1). In this Case ignorant Persons are apt to fancy, that a Comparison is made between two Evils, or Sins of Omission, and that we are to do that, which it would have been the greatest Sin to have left undone. But in reality, we do not here of two Sins choose the lesser; but that Action which without this clashing and interfering had been a Sin, now ceases to be sinful, when we are oblig'd to a contrary Duty, by the force of a stronger Law. Thus, for example, when there seems to be a clashing between the Affirmative Command, Give Alms, and the Negative, Do not Steal, without doubt we must not be guilty of Thievery to gather Matter for our Alms; according to that of the Apostle, We must not do Evil, that Good may come of it. Yet in this Case, not to give Alms, is not properly a Sin, because Affirmative Precepts exert not their force of Obligation, when there remains no supply of Matter to furnish out the Action. So again, when a clashing is made between the two Affirmative Precepts, Obey God, and Obey the Magistrate, no question but we ought to Obey GOD rather than Men (b): not because of two Evils the least is to be chosen, but because it is not an Evil to deny Obedience to the Magistrate, when it cannot be given without violating the Duty we owe to God. For a weaker Obligation always yields to a stronger, when both cannot be fulfill'd together.

Grec.* l. 6. They are very far from deserving Commendation, who having carried off Glory and Victory from many Encounters, do still continue to engage, 'till being at length shamefully overcome, they lose their former Honour and their former Labour. The Case is the same with those Gamesters, who once meeting with a run of Good Fortune, are entic'd to venture on, 'till they lose double to their former Gains, and, in conclusion, are commonly Beggars. These Examples ought to warn us in our Martial Affairs, that we never suffer our selves to be drawn into such a Combat, where we must of necessity either win all, or lose all.

IX. To a Doubtful Conscience a Scrupulous one is nearly related; and this is, when the Judgment of the Understanding is possess'd, with an anxious fear, lest the thing which we fancy to be Good, should prove Evil, or vice versa. Now when such Scruples are founded on probable Arguments, the Action is to be suspended, 'till they can be taken away and clear'd up, either by the force of Arguments, or by the Authority of Wise Men: but when they proceed only from a Melancholy and a Superstitious Softness and Indiscretion, they are by all means to be discouraged, and forcibly driven out of our Thoughts. Therefore 'tis a good Remedy which Cartes (c) prescribes against Fluctuation of Mind, and the Bitings of Conscience which precede an Action, to accustom our selves to the forming of certain and determinate Judgments of all Things that offer themselves to us. But we must observe farther, that these Judgments ought to be drawn from Genuine and Solid Science, or from Doctrine of the Laws of Nature, and from the Christian Religion, purg'd from the vain Additions of Superstitious Men. For tho' without this Security, the Mind may indeed be so far harden'd, as not to perceive any fluctuation, or to feel any remorse of Conscience, yet such a firmness and obduracy is neither of long continuance, nor free from the Imputation of Sin. Whence we cannot approve of the latter part of Des Cartes's Prescription, where he tells us, We should always think our duty is discharg'd, when we have done what we judg'd best, altho' we have made the worst Judgment that can be. For this is not to cure the Disease, but by an ill temper'd Opiate, to bring a drowsiness and stupidity on the Mind.

X. When the Knowledge of the Understanding is wanting as to the Performance or the Omission of any Thing, we call this Ignorance (2). Which, as far as concerns our present Design, may be divided, either with respect to its Influence on the Action, or with respect to its Origine. With reference to the former, it is of two sorts, one being the Cause of the Thing ignorantly done, and the other not. The first may be call'd Efficacious, and the other Concomitant. The first is the Negation of such a Knowledge in the Understanding, which had it been present, would have hinder'd the Action. Such was Abimelech's Ignorance, Gen. XX. 4, 5. who, had he known Sarah to have been Abraham's Wife, had never entertain'd any thoughts of taking her for himself. The latter is a Negation of such a Knowledge in the Understanding, as would not have hinder'd the Fact, so that the Man, tho' he had known what he was indeed ignorant of, yet would have done the thing nevertheless. As suppose a Man should Kill his Enemy by a chance Blow, whom he would otherwise have Kill'd, had he known him to be in that particular place, where he now threw his Weapon casually, and without any intention of Hurt. Thus the Boy who flung a Stone at a Dog, and by mistake hit his Mother-in-law, and kill'd her, said, τ' αὐτοῦ μάλιστ' ἔτυχεν καὶ τὴν βουλὴν αὐτοῦ, Fortune had a better aim than I. Some distinguish these two Species's of Ignorance, in this manner, that what is upon the former shall be said to be done out of Ignorance, what by the latter, to be done by one that is Ignorant. Yet even in the latter case, no Murder, according to the strict and proper sense, is committed. For tho' that ill Affection of Mind was in it self vicious, yet it contributed nothing to the Fact. With reference to its Origine, Ignorance is divided into Voluntary and Involuntary. The former is by some term'd Consequent and Vincible, the latter Antecedent and Invincible. The former, whether it be directly affected, or proceeds only from idleness and unattention, is when a Man knows not that which he could, and ought to have known: the latter, when a Man knows not such things, as he had neither Ability nor Obligation to know. This Invincible Ignorance, is either such in it self, and not in its cause, or else both in it self, and in its cause too. The former is, when in doing a thing a Man is not able to overcome the Ignorance from which it proceeds, and yet is in fault for falling into that Ignorance. Thus frequently when a drunken Man commits a Sin, he do's not know what he is doing, yet he is culpable for not knowing it. The latter is, when a Man not only is ignorant of such things as could not be known before the Action, but is also free from any blame upon the account of his falling into that Ignorance, or his continuing in it. On this Point is observable what Aristotle has said in his Ethicks, Book III. Chap. 1. 11. and what Eustrathius has commented on the place. Where he distinguishes between what is done by one being Ignorant, and what is done out of Ignorance. For Instances of the former, he brings the Actions of a Drunken, or of an Angry Person: for such Men, tho' they often know not what they do, yet the Ignorance is not the Cause of their Acting, but the Drunkenness or the Anger, of which 'twas in their power to decline the former, and to restrain the latter. He adds farther, that those Persons cannot be said to do a thing unwittingly, who sin upon account of knowing what was to be done, or what to be avoided, which Ignorance he calls Ignorance in Election (1), or Ignorance of Universals (2): for these every Man was oblig'd to know. But that Ignorance of Particulars, is the thing which renders an Action capable of being construed involuntary. These Particulars are, who, what, about what, and in what, with what Instrument, for what Cause, and by what manner. All these no Man in his Senses can be ignorant of together, because he is at least apprehensive of his own acting, and therefore can resolve the first Question (Who?) But in all the other Circumstances Ignorance may intervene. Thus Persons who say what they did not intend, alledge for excuse that they know not what they said. And the same is the Case, of a Man who intending to show his Friend some shooting Engine, should let it go off, and kill him. An Instance of Ignorance about what, and in what, (which are the same thing) may be, when a Man kills his own Son, mistaking him for his Enemy. Ignorance of the Instrument, is, suppose a Man should throw a pointed Spear at another, and kill him, taking it to have had no Point. For what cause, comes to be consider'd in Ignorance, in such a Case as this, suppose a Man should apply a Remedy to Another with design of preserving his Health, and the Remedy should (against his Knowledge) prove Mortal. The last Circumstance is in what manner; as if a Man in teaching another should intend only to give him a slight Blow, but should by accident desperately wound him. The Roman Lawyers have treated under a peculiar Head concerning Ignorance of the Law, and Ignorance of the Fact. But they did not consider Ignorance so much for the force and use it had in Moral Actions, as for the influence it had on Matters of Right, and as it made for the keeping, or acquiring, or losing of any Legal Possession or Qualification. But their numerous Reasonings about both kinds, may be reduc'd to this short Issue, That Ignorance of the Law, is, for the most part joyn'd with some degree of Culpable Negligence, but Ignorance of the Fact is not; and that therefore Equity directs us to interpret the former to the Man's prejudice, and the latter not.

(2) Titius in his 23d Observation thinks the Author's Divisions of Ignorance not clear, nor compleat enough; and therefore rectifies them by considering Ignorance, 1. With respect to the Influence of the Object upon the thing we act; whence arises Efficacious, and Concomitant Ignorance. 2. With respect to the Nature of the Object consider'd in it self; which produces an Ignorance of Law, and an Ignorance of Fact. 3. With respect to the Consent of the Agent; whence results Voluntary and Involuntary Ignorance.

XI. When not only a Knowledge of the Truth is wanting in the Understanding, but a false Perswasion has intruded into its room, which pass'es it self for Truth, then we say a Man has an Erroneous Conscience, or that his Mind is possess'd by an Error. This Error, is (like Ignorance) either Vincible or Invincible. The former is that which a Man could and ought to have overcome, by applying such Diligence as is morally possible, or as the common Condition of Humanity admits and allows. The latter is such as a Man could not vanquish by all Diligence morally possible. Where it must be observ'd, that should we approve of that saying of the Emperour Antoninus, Book IX. Chap. 43. Whosoever sins, do's in that decline from his propos'd end, and is certainly deceiv'd (a), yet if the Error were not insuperable, the ill actions proceeding from it cannot be exempted from the number of Sins properly so call'd, nor ought to be pardon'd in gross by a promiscuous Indulgence.

XII. But it ought especially to be remark'd,

(1) i. e. When we are Ignorant which of two Things propos'd to us is more Advantageous. (2) Such is the Ignorance of the Law of Nature, at least of its common Principles: and the Ignorance of the Civil Laws of the Government to which we belong. (a) Add. Arrian Epictet. l. 1. cap. 28.

that Error has different Effects in Actions, which a Man may undertake or omit as he pleases, or the exercise of which is left to his Free-will; and in such Actions, as are enjoyn'd or forbidden him by the Law or the Command of a Superior. In the former kind of Actions, the Error is suppos'd to intercept our Consent: And therefore those Consequences do not flow from it, which are otherwise apt to follow on such an Action as we have thus consented to; especially if the Error did not steal on us thro' Supine Carelessness and Neglect. And therefore in Bargains an Error about a thing, or about its quality, upon prospect of which a Man was induc'd to come to such an Agreement, renders the Bargain void. For in this Case the Man is not conceiv'd to have agreed absolutely, but upon supposal of the presence of such a thing or quality, on which, as on a necessary Condition, his Consent was founded: and therefore the thing or quality not appearing, the Consent is understood to be null and ineffectual. Which Point shall be discuss'd more fully in its proper place.

XIII. But the Case seems to be very different in Necessary Actions, or in such as are commanded or forbidden by a Superior. Where we must first enquire, whether the Error arises in the Theory, or in the Practice; that is, whether a Man entertains a false Opinion concerning the Necessity of some Actions, thinking those ought to be omitted, which should have been perform'd, or vice versa; or whether some Error occurs in the very exercise of an Action by means of which the Action is not applied so rightly as it ought to have been. The former kind of Errors do not, in our Judgment, at all hinder the Imputation of an Action to the Agent, according as it shall appear to agree or disagree with the Rules prescrib'd him; because they must upon all accounts be esteem'd superable. For he that would restrain the Actions of another by a Rule, ought at the same time to make a sufficient declaration of his Will, that it may be clearly known by the Person whom he is to oblige. For otherwise 'tis the most unjust thing in the World to require obedience to a Law, when either the Law is unknown, or the discovery of its sense exceeds the Capacities of those whom it affects. Therefore, if a Man errs in Theory, that is, if he fancy a thing to be commanded which is really forbidden, or vice versa, he is suppos'd not to have apply'd sufficient diligence, and therefore he cannot refuse to bear the Imputation of Faults committed upon such an Error. This Doctrine is by some Casuists thus explain'd in other words. If the Conscience entertain a vincible Error about an Evil Thing, the Man sins, as well if he acts for it, as if he acts against it. That is, if he has perswaded himself that an Action was commanded, which was indeed forbidden, or that an Action was for-bidden, which was indeed commanded, he sins by performing the former, and by the forbearing the latter: because such a performance and such a forbearance are repugnant to the Law, but the Agent might and ought to have known the Law, according to its true import and signification. And yet the same Man has sinn'd no less, if he has forborn an Action, which was indeed forbidden, but by him believ'd to be commanded; or if he has perform'd an Action really commanded, yet such as he imagin'd to be forbidden. For tho' in these Cases there be no external Acts repugnant to the Law, yet because the Man thinks his false Notion and Construction of the Law to be right, therefore the contrary Intention shall be imputed to him as Sin. For the Evil Intention of the Agent makes the Action appear Evil, at least with respect to the Agent himself. From all which it appears, that from an Erroneous Judgment no Action can proceed which may be imputed for as good and right to the Actor, and that when a Man is fallly perswaded that such a thing is unjust, the thing is unlawful for him to do, so long as his Perswasion shall continue uncorrected (a).

XIV. But if a Speculative Error be entertain'd concerning a thing Indifferent, that is, if a Man should be perswaded that he ought to do, or to omit somewhat, which was indeed left free on both sides, he will only sin if he acts contrary to what this false Opinion suggests, upon the account of the Pravity of his Intention, but will not sin if he acts according to the Directions of his Error. For Indifferent Things are plac'd without the Bounds of the Law; which cannot be transgress'd by their Performance or Omission: And that Error appears very harmless which does not give occasion to Sin. Yet it is plain, that Actions undertaken upon the Motions of such an Error, cannot obtain those good Effects which otherwise follow the like Instances of Obedience to the Laws: Thus if a Legislator had constituted such a Reward to those who comply'd with his Injunctions, this Reward could not be challeng'd by one, who through Error and Mistake, should have observ'd some indifferent things, fancying them to be positively determin'd, and legally enacted.

XV. But 'tis much more usual that an Error should intervene in the Practice and Exercise of Actions commanded by the Laws: As suppose the true object of the Action should be remov'd, and another substituted in its place; or if we should mistake the time or place of the Execution enjoyn'd. Such Actions, as they are not follow'd by those Effects which are otherwise due to Actions rightly apply'd; so neither are they attended with the Effects proper to bad Actions, because the Error was not contracted by any Culpable Negligence. Which some Authors thus express in other words, An Intervening Error hinders the Action from being imputed on either side, making it neither Good nor Evil (a). Thus, tho' otherwise you would be freed from your Obligation by paying a Man what you owe him, yet should you pay him Undesignedly, and by pure Mistake, you will not indeed have committed a Sin, but you will by no means have cancell'd the Obligation. Thus, when a Man has, with an honest Intention, tho' with an inconsiderate Liberality conferr'd a Kindness on a wicked Person, who will abuse it toward the maintaining of his Disorders; he cannot at all boast of having done a good Action, yet he shall be excus'd from any Share in the consequent Wickednesses, and not be reckon'd to have contributed any thing toward their Commission. But when a Man has been particularly commanded, to discover and observe precisely the Object, the Place or Time of acting, it will be a hard matter for him to escape the Imputation of those Effects which shall proceed from the ill applied Action, unless he can demonstrate his Error to have been Morally insuperable and unavoidable. Thus if you give your Servant a strict Charge to wake you at such a certain Hour of the Night, it will not serve him for an Excuse of his Default to say, that he mistook in telling the Clock; yet if by any Casualty the Clock went wrong, or was out of order, the Servant shall be free from all Offence and Blame.

XVI. It frequently happens too, that an Error intervenes in the Exercise of a bad Action, while the Actor misses the Object at which he aim'd. In which case, the Malice of the Actor shall continue the same, as if he had not mistaken, but the Action it self shall be esteem'd more or less Heinous, according as the Object is on which it Casually lighted. Thus a Person who intending to kill his Enemy, accidentally kills another Man, shall be nevertheless guilty of Murther (b). Yet the Murther shall receive more or less Aggravation, according to the Dignity or Meanness of the Man, who has been so unfortunately slain. Hitherto must be referr'd the Case of a Man's killing another out-right, whom he intended only to wound, or to hurt in a less degree: for here the Fact it self must be the Rule to go by in Judgment: But when in the Exercise of a faulty Action, a Man by Mistake lights on a lawful Object, such an Action will be no farther Evil, than as it flows from an ill Intention in the Actor; so that this Error shall hinder the Fact from coming under the Name of the Vice design'd to be committed. And therefore that Saying of Seneca (c) will not hold, at least in Human Courts and Consideration, That if a Man lies with his own Wife, fancying her to be anothers, the Man shall be an Adulterer, tho' the Woman be no Adulterers.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Will of Man, as it Concerns MORAL ACTIONS.

THE most Wise Creator being pleas'd to make Man an Animal governable by Laws, for this Purpose implanted a Will in his Soul, as an Internal Directress of his Actions; that the Objects being propos'd and known, this Power might by an Intrinick Principle, and without any Physical Necessity move it self towards them, and might chuse that which seem'd most Agreeable and Convenient, and reject that which appear'd Unfuitable and Incommodious. The Will is concern'd to govern human Actions by the Administration of two Faculties, by one of which it is said to act spontaneously, and by the other freely. To Spontaneity, if we may so speak, are attributed certain Acts and Motions, of which some are Interior, commonly call'd Eliciti, others Exterior, generally term'd Imperati. The former are such Acts as are immediately produc'd by the Will, and terminated in the same Power. Some of these are employ'd about the End, as Volition, Intention, Fruition; others about the Means, as Consent, Election, and Use. Volition is that Act of the Will, by which it is simply carried toward some End, without Regard had whether the End be present or absent; or that Act by which the End is barely approv'd of. Others call this the Will of Simple Approbation, by which a Thing is understood to agree with the Nature and Inclinations of some Person, tho' he has not yet Actually and Effectually mov'd himself towards the producing or obtaining of it. Intention (or Proæresis) is a Desire Efficacious toward the obtaining of an End; or it is an Act of Will, by which it effectually tends toward an absent End, and endeavours Actually to produce or to acquire it. This Act being joyn'd with the Hopes and the Attempts of procuring an End, we may easily conceive what sort of Things it is employ'd about: and they to be sure, must be Things Possible in themselves, and and Things in our Power; as Aristotle (a) has more largely observ'd. For it enters into the very Definition of Intention or Προαίρεσις, that it be made with Reason and with Thought. Though there be many Degrees of Intention, with reference to its different Height and Force; yet as far as concerns the Occasions and Purposes of Civil Life, 'tis sufficient to divide it into Plenary and Semi-plenary. The Former is that by which the Will determines on any thing after a full Examination of the Matter, and without being driven to it by the Violence of the Passions. The Latter, when due Deliberation has not been taken, or when the Hurry of the Affections has created a Confusion and Disorder in the Reason. Fruition is the Rest, or the Delight of the Will in the End now obtain'd and present to it. To which is oppos'd Repentance, or an Aversion (commonly joyn'd with Shame or Grief,) to somewhat which we have before designed or affected. Consent is our simple Approbation of Means, as we judge them proper for our Work: and these Means when they are plac'd within our Reach and Power, employ the two remaining Acts mentioned in our first Division; for, Election determines, and Use applies them to the compassing of the End propos'd.

Those Acts are call'd Imperati or enjoyn'd, which are perform'd by other Human Faculties upon the Motion and Appointment of the Will.

II. Liberty is a Faculty of the Will, by which, all Requisites of Acting being given, it may out of many propos'd Objects chuse one or more, and reject the rest; or if one only Object be propos'd, may admit that or not admit it, may do or not do it. What we call the Requisites of Acting, some express by the single Term Occasion; now from these the last Determination of the Agent is conceiv'd as a distinct thing, which being added to the other Requisites, we immediately proceed to Action: and therefore those Requisites mention'd in the Definition of Liberty, do not include that Share which the Man himself bears in the Action, but are contra-distinguish'd to it. But more particularly, we call the Faculty of chusing one or more out of many Objects, Liberty of Specification, or of Contrariety, and the Faculty concern'd in the Admission or Rejection of one only Object, Liberty of Contradiction, or Liberty of Exercise (1).

Now Liberty is suppos'd to superadd to Spontaneousness, first an Indifference of Acts as to their Exercise; so that the Will is not oblig'd necessarily to exert one of its Acts, as to desire or refuse: for tho' in general it is impossible but it should affect Good, and refuse

Evil as such, yet in reference to any particular Object propos'd, it may determine on which side it pleases, tho' perhaps, it may seem to have a greater Propension toward the one than toward the other. Another Thing that Liberty superadds to the Notion of Spontaneousness, is the Freedom of Determination, so that the Will may upon an internal Impulse and Motion, exert either of its Acts of wishing or loathing, just in such a place, and at such a time. We must add farther, That tho' the Reason, which makes a thing desired or avoided, does not depend upon the Will, but upon the Condition of the Object, according as it bears the Face of Good or Evil; yet that Appetite and that Aversion, which thus follow the Appearance of the Object, are not of so much Force and Sway, but that there still remains in the Will a Liberty, whether or no it shall determine it self to any external Act about such an Object: especially since such an Evil thing may bear the Countenance of Good, and consequently be Desirable, as long as it shall be set in Opposition to a greater Evil. And therefore to refute that Notion of Hobbs's de Homine, Cap. XI. §. 2. that Appetite and Aversion necessarily follow our Pro-conception of some Pleasure, or of some Uneasiness likely to proceed from the Object, no room being thus left for Free-will; we must carefully distinguish the Volition of simple Approbation, from effectual Intention or Προαίρεσις, of which the latter does not so necessarily depend on particular Objects. In the words following this Assertion, he applies a very Idle piece of Nicety, while he observes, That when we say a Man has free Will of doing this or that, we ought always to understand it with this Condition, If he pleases; for 'tis absurd to say that a Man has free Will of doing this, or that, whether he will or no. For no Body is so Stupid as not to apprehend this Contradiction: and 'tis extream Foolish to add the very same thing which the Proposition asserted as a Condition to it. To say that a Man may freely will the doing of a thing, if he will, is the same thing as to say Peter runs if he runs: and who would ever give this Clause the name of a Condition? From what has been said it likewise appears, how we are to judge of those Notions laid down by Monsieur Le Grand in his Institutions of Philosophy, Part 7. Artic. 5. as if it were impossible for a Man not to desire what he clearly and distinctly perceives to be Good; and as if a Man sinn'd only upon this account, in not having a clear and distinct Perception of Evil.

III. But the chief Affection of the Will,

(a) Ethic. 1. 3. c. 4. Election is concern'd only about those things which are in our Power. Every Man purposeth to do that alone which he imagines himself able to compass. Again Ethic. 1. 6. c. 2. What is already done, cannot be the Object of our Choice and Pursuit: for no Man consults of what is past, but of what is to come, and is Changeable and Contingent. Whereas what is already gone cannot be alter'd or recall'd. And as Agatho well says, it is beyond the Power of God himself, to undo what hath really been done.

(1) Notwithstanding this Distinction is commonly used, yet it does not appear to some to be sufficiently, either Clear or Necessary. See Mr. Le Clerc. Pneumat.

and what seems immediately to flow from its Nature, is an Intrinsic Indifference, upon the account of which it is not restrain'd to any certain, fix'd, and unalterable way of Acting; and which cannot be entirely extirpated by the Force of any external Means. And this Indifference we are the more firmly to assert and maintain, because upon the Removal of it, all the Morality of Human Actions is inevitably overthrown (a). Of which wicked Design those Men are in a great measure guilty, who fancy some strange kind of Physical Predetermination in Human Deeds, by which the Motion in it self, and as it is a Natural Being, is so determin'd by the first Cause, that it cannot be done in any other manner; tho' it afterwards receive its Morality from the second Cause. Nor are they in a less Fault, who from the Divine Presence would derive an absolute Necessity on all our Proceedings. For tho' this Attribute of GOD cannot be deceiv'd, yet that it does not take away the Indifference of the Will, may be easily understood, if we either clear the word Prescience, from the Imperfection which it seems to imply, as do all other Terms taken from Human Things, and applied to the Divine Nature; (since in GOD there can be no Succession of time;) or if we say, that the Divine Concurrence does in such a manner accompany second Causes, as still to leave them the Power of acting in the way Originally assign'd them by their Creator, not debasing them with reference to Moral Actions from Principal into merely Instrumental Causes (b). How Prejudicial such Notions are to a State or Kingdom, Grotius is well aware when he observes, That those who utterly discard the Doctrine of Free-will, can hardly avoid making GOD the Author of all Wickedness; an Attempt which Plato himself declar'd ought not to be born with in a Commonwealth (c).

IV. For the right understanding of this Indifference of the Will, somewhat ought to be premis'd concerning the Nature of Good in general, now tho' Good by many (1) of the Philosophers is consider'd absolutely, so that every Being really existent may be pronounc'd

Good: yet we, without regarding this Signification, which we judge to be very usefess, will only consider Good, as it denotes Respect to others, and as it is said to be Good to one, or for one. According to which Sense the Nature of Good (2) seems to consist, in that Aptitude by which one thing is dispos'd to benefit, preserve, or compleat another; and therefore this Good, to which we may give the Name of Natural, is firm and uniform, and has no Dependance on the erroneous and various Opinions of Men. But because Good does not excite the voluntary Appetite of Man unless it be known, at least under a confus'd Notion; and because Knowledge arising from Sense, gives but a gross Representation of the Genuine Natures and Consequence of Things, so that the Understanding is often clouded with Error, and disorder'd by the violent Noises of Sense and Passion; hence it comes to pass, that many Men invest things falsely with the Name and Notion of Good, and this is what we call Imaginary Good. And farther, every particular Person as he understands a Thing to make for his Profit, his Preservation, or his Perfection, loves and desires it; and on the contrary, what he conceives to be Evil for him, he hates and avoids. But as it is not requisite to the Nature of Good, and to its Power of moving the Appetite, that it should be consider'd precisely as Good only for the Person desiring, and abstracting from the Advantage of others; especially since upon account of the Society and Conjunction of Men, the Good of Others may redound to our Benefit and Use; so amongst Mankind there is so fair an Agreement about the general Nature of Good, and its chief Parts and Species's, that barely on the score of their being divided about some Particulars, there's no manner of Reason either why we should deny the Universal and Unshaken and Uniform Notions of Good, or why, in a State of Natural Liberty, we should make it depend on the bare Opinion of every private Man, in a state of Government on the sole Judgment of the Supreme Magistrate, as the only proper Measures and Rules for its Determination (d). As for the

You will say, He that threatens me with Death compels me. I deny it; 'tis not the terrible Proposal which lays the Force upon you, but 'tis your own Choice which inclines you rather to the Commission of such a Deed, than to the Desire of Death. In this Case therefore, as well as in all others, nothing compell'd you but your own Opinion; that is, nothing overcame your Will, but your Will.*

Sueton was in the right, when he makes Tiberius (1. 69.) a Contemner of all Religion; Quid omnia fato agi crederet, for believing the World to be guided by Fate. For thus Proclus (ad Timæum) divides Atheists into three Ranks or Orders. Two of which he makes those who deny GOD the Care of Human Actions and Affairs; and those who attribute such a Care to GOD, as imposeth an absolute Necessity on all Events, utterly depriving Men of their Freedom and Choice.

Moral Good which appears in Human Actions, it shall be discuss'd by and by in its proper place.

From the foregoing Observations this manifestly appears to be the Nature of the Will, that it is always desirous of Good in general, and always averse to Evil in general. For it implies an open Contradiction, not to incline towards that which seems agreeable, and to incline to that which seems disagreeable to us. And therefore in this general Inclination of the Will, there can be no Indifference admitted, as if it could (with the Appetite of simple Approbation) sometimes desire Good and sometimes Evil. But they are the particular Goods and Evils, which give room for the Indifference of the Wills of particular Men, who at different times, and upon different Occasions, are very various in their Scents and Pursuits. And there is this evident reason why it should be so, because there are scarce any Goods or Evils which appear to a Man in their native Colours, and without suffering any Mixtures, but commonly they are blended and shuffled together; Good is adulterated with Evil, and Evil is sweetned with Good; to which if we add the strange Inclination which we find to some Things in particular Persons, and how all Men have not the Happiness, to distinguish solid and durable Enjoyments, from those which are only painted and transitory; we shall see how there must needs arise hence an infinite Variety in the Wills and Inclinations of Men; and how all pursue what they think their own Good, but in different Paths and by different Means. Besides, many Men do not know what Things are good for them, and therefore do not desire them; many more prefer the fair Face and Semblance of Evil to Real and Substantial Good, and so reject what they ought to desire, and desire what they ought to reject. To which purpose Aristotle well observes (a), That to be desirable by the Will, simply and properly speaking, which is truly Good, but that to be desirable by every particular Man which he imagines so (b).

Thus then in almost every Thing and every Action many Species of Good and Evil, both Real and Apparent, crowd themselves into our Thoughts, and when these have for some time variously agitated the Mind, and driven it one while to favour one, and one while another, at last the Will by an intrinsic Force determines it self to the embracing of one Object, and discarding the rest. And an Action perform'd in this manner, is call'd Spontaneous or Voluntary, which Aristotle thus defines (c); That is to be esteemed Spontaneous, the Principle of which is in the Person acting, who likewise understands the Particulars in which the Action consists. Eustrathius comments on this place to this purpose; Both these Conditions are necessary to the constituting a Spontaneous Action, that the Principle be in the Actor, and that the Actor know the Particulars. For he that acts out of Ignorance, has the Principle of acting in himself, and he that knows the Particulars, may yet act by the Compulsion of others; and therefore neither of these Conditions by it self can make a Thing properly Voluntary.

V. But it does not always fall out that the Mind shall maintain a kind of Aequilibrium, and apply it self to acting or not acting, without any considerable Advantage on one side more than on the other. But for different Reasons, and by different Causes, it frequently bends with great Violence one way; and sometimes External Violence bears so hard upon it, as to take away its Strength and to disable its Powers. As the Mariner does not always cut the Sea with an even and prosperous Gale, but sometimes oppos'd by furious Winds, he hardly holds the Helm, and sometimes being violently shaken out of his Seat and his Command, he is oblig'd to commit his Vessel to the Rage of the Tempest.

Among the Things then which are forcible in drawing the Will to one side, are the peculiar Genius's and Dispositions of Men, by which many Persons are render'd extremely Inclinable to some kind of Actions. These Dispositions arise in a great measure, from the Nature of the Climate and of the Soil (d), from the Temperature of Humours in Men's Bodies, (occasion'd by the Food, the Age, the Diet, the Health, the Studies and Pursuits of particular Persons) from the Conformation of those Organs, which the Soul employs in performing its Duties, and from the like Causes (e). Concerning all which it must be in general asserted, That none of them, as they belong to the Production of a Moral Action, are of so great Force and Vehemence, as to render it impossible for the Will to take the contrary side (f). And tho' as to some particular Impulses arising from the difference of Constitutions, the Will sometimes seems unable to hinder their Existence, or their breaking out into Action, yet it may provide so far, as to see they shall break out without Sin. Thus if a Man be so far vanquish'd by the warm Motions of Love, as to raise his Passion above Restraint, a Power is still left him of satisfying his Desires, in an innocent and a lawful manner (a). And thus Plato (b) disputes, 'That however the most Unnatural of Lusts had prevail'd in a Grecian State, that they might yet be suppress'd, by the Laws, if rightly fram'd and apply'd. By the same Rule we must judge of what Horace and others have deliver'd concerning the different Manners and Inclinations of the several Ages of Life. Thus, for Example, if old Men are violently inclin'd to Covetousness, yet 'tis in their Power to pursue Wealth without injuring others, and without usurping the proper Goods and Possessions of their Neighbours (c).

VI. Another thing that inclines the Will vehemently to some particular Actions, is the frequent Repetition and Custom of those Actions, whence it comes to pass that they are undertaken very Freely and with great Dispatch, and that when the desired Object presents it self, the Mind seems by a kind of Magnetism to be drawn towards it. And these Inclinations being joyn'd with an exceeding Desire and Dexterity of acting, pass commonly under the Name of Habits, which as they are concern'd about Moral Actions, either Good or Evil, are call'd either Vertues or Vices. There's no reason why we should tire our selves in reckoning up these according to their full tale and number, since most Authors, who have hitherto profess'dly treated of Moral Philosophy, have fancied the main part of their Business and of their Science discharg'd, by explaining only the Eleven Words that stand for so many Vertues. It will suffice to observe in general, that those Dispositions of the Mind are Vertues, by which a Man is inclin'd to Actions making for the Preservation of himself, and of Human Society; and that those on the contrary are Vices, which addict us to Actions Destructive of our selves, and of the Community to which we belong. And here Mr. Hobbs must fall under Censure for that Assertion in his Book De Homine, c. 13. §. 9. where he declares, That, except in Civil Life, there can be no common Measure found out applicable to Vertues and Vices, and that consequently in a State of Nature there can be no such Measure Establish'd, by which, as by a Standard, those things which we call Vertues and Vices may be settled and determin'd. For the Definition which we but now set down, will reach even to a Natural State: and whatever things are enjoyn'd as Vertues in Civil Communities, ought to agree to that Definition; and if any things should be ordain'd contrary to it, they ought to be reckon'd Absurd and Unreasonable Commands.

The Diversity which appears in the Laws of several different Communities, does not hinder, but that there may be some Universal and Uniform Definition of the Vertues. For this Diversity either is concern'd about such things as are plac'd without the Sphere of Natural Laws, or it arises from hence, that what is really a Precept of the Law of Nature, is in one place invest'd with the farther Force of a Civil Law, and in other places not; or lastly, it is an Evidence that some Legislators, in framing their Edicts, were not befriended by good Reason. Of which we shall have more to say by and by (1).

Farther, tho' Vices and ill Manners confirm'd by long Use and Habit, seem to pass into a kind of second Nature, so as not to be without great Difficulty resist'd (d), yet Actions proceeding from them ought nevertheless to be reputed Voluntary. And altho' Actions which precede any Habit, and by which it is introduc'd, are undertaken with a fuller Intention, and with a more urgent Endeavour, than those which are perform'd after the Habit has been contracted, when as it were without staying for the Command of the Will, the other Faculties rush swiftly upon the Object; yet neither the Goodness nor Pravity of the Actions seem upon this account to be at all diminish'd. For 'twould be a thing of very ill consequence, if a Good Action were therefore to be reckon'd less Good, because it has been often repeated, or if a Man were to be esteem'd less a Sinner, because he had frequently sinn'd. Especially, since if every Man is the cause of his own obtaining a Habit, or of his acting so suddenly and expeditiously. Aristotle has an Observation very close to this purpose in his Ethicks to Nicom. Lib. III. cap. 5. Actions and Habits (says he) are not spontaneous in the same manner; for as to our Actions we are Masters of them from the beginning to the end, because we understand all the Circumstances that belong to them: but of Habits the beginning only is properly in our power, continual additions being beyond our knowledge or prevention, just as it happens in the increase of Distempers. But because we had originally the power of doing so or otherwise, therefore the Habits likewise are to be construed as spontaneous, upon account of the Principle whence they spring. On which place Eustrathius thus descants; We have a command only over the Beginnings of Habits, not over their Encrease or their End. For the Progress and Improvement of them is unperceiv'd and unregarded, while they rise and advance by silent degrees; whence it happens, that some Men run deeper now and then into Wickedness and Vice than they intended: This may be seen particularly in Drunkenness and Uncleaness, in which Men sometimes going on freely and heedlessly, as if it were left to our pleasure whether we should get a Habit or no, by a continuance of bad Practice, contract a Habit before they are aware. Nor is it in Vices only that the Additions and Augmentations are undiscover'd, but in Vertues likewise the Advances are made by such secret steps, that a Man may sooner observe his own Proficiency, than he can know how he came by it.

VII. Those Motions of the Mind which they call Passions or Affections, chiefly excited by the Appearances of Good and Evil, have likewise a great force in driving the Will violently to some certain Actions, besides their ill Influence on the Judgment, which they frequently cloud and obscure (a). How many these are, by what means they are either rais'd or allay'd, and what use and service they have in Life, is most excellently shown by Des Cartes and his follower Le Grand; to whom may be joyn'd Mr. Hobbs (b). It is enough to our design, if we only remark, that however violent the Affections may prove they can never quite extinguish the force of our Will. But that Men of the weakest Souls may obtain an absolute Command over their Passions, if they use a sufficient diligence, in managing and in directing them, as Des Cartes has prov'd (c). Ovid's Medea put a Cheat upon herself, when she said, especially since she acknowledges that the Judgment of Reason oppos'd her Passion.

— aliudque cupido
Mens aliud suadet, video meliora proboque
Deteriora sequor.—

The Observation of Grotius on Matthew V. v. 22. is very applicable to our present purpose. He considers three distinct things in Anger, the πᾶθος or Affection, the ὄρμη or Impetus, and the συγκατάθεσις or Consent. The πᾶθος or Faculty, enabling us to be angry, being implanted in us by Nature, cannot be extirpated; but it should be rank'd among those indifferent things which we may make either a good or a bad use of. But because that part of the Mind where the πάθος or Passions are seated, is in it self irrational, hence it comes to pass, that without expecting the Judgment of Reason, the ὄρμη or sudden Sallies, exert their force; and unless these are diligently kept under, the συγκατάθεσις or Consent certainly follows, when the Power of the Soul, which was constituted for the governing and restraining of the Affections, idly lets go the Reins, and permits it self to be dragg'd by those it ought to guide.

This συγκατάθεσις then, or Consent, he declares to be Voluntary, and to be perform'd at the free Pleasure of Man: But he tells us farther, that from diligent attention and exercise, but more especially from the Holy Spirit of God, sufficient Assistance may be obtain'd even against these first Motions, (which the Philosophers compare to the twinkling of the Eyes,) so as to hinder them from any long continuance, or any forcible sway (d).

Besides, that Man is arm'd by Nature with some peculiar Instruments for moderating the Passions, and that he is engag'd by a stricter Necessity to restrain them, in as much as he incurs a far greater harm to his Health and Life from their Violence and Rebellion, than any other Animals do, has been fully made out by Dr. Cumberland (e). To conclude this Point, since some of the Passions are excited by the Appearance of Good, others by the Appearance of Evil, and accordingly spur us on toward procuring the one, and avoiding the other: this difference is observable between them, that the former kind afford very little or no excuse, if any thing be done otherwise than it ought to be, by their Instigation; but the latter deserve the greater degree of favour and pardon, according as the threatening Evil which excited them, was more ungrateful to Human Nature. For 'tis much easier to want a Good, not necessary to the preservation of Nature, than to admit an Evil tending to the destruction of our Nature: whatever Aristotle (f) has affirm'd to the contrary in that Maxim of his, καλεπώτερον ἢδὲν ἢ μάχεσθαι ἢ θυμῷ, (1) It's harder to resist Pleasure than Anger. When a Man has done an ill action out of obedience to an itching Lust, he is suppos'd for the sake of the present Pleasure, voluntarily to run the hazard of bearing whatsoever Evil may thence ensue: and therefore when he has already had the Enjoyment, which he thought equivalent to the Evil that might arise from it, he cannot upon any pretence plead for mitigation of that Evil. But he that has done amiss upon the fear of an impending Evil, has all the Infirmary of Human Nature apologizing and interceding in his behalf, since the only cause of his Miscarriage was his being willing to admit what he imagin'd to be the least of the Evils likely to befall him. But of those Cases, we shall hereafter have a larger field to consider and determine (2).

VIII. Lastly, The Vice of Drunkenness is a great inciter of the Will to some particular kinds of Actions; and this is procur'd either by Drink, or by some other sorts of Fumes, or by Opium, a thing of so universal use in the Eastern World, the effect of which is, that it disturbs and drives along the Spirits of the Blood with a most violent Motion, and by these means renders Men extremely prone to Lust in the first place (a), and not much less to Anger and Rashness: upon which account Lycurgus us'd to call Wine, an Evil Potion, (or a Magick Draught) because it chang'd and turn'd Men's Minds (b). And for the same reason the Cretans, receiv'd this among other Laws, of their famous Minos, Μὴ συμπνεον ἀλλήλοις εἰς μέθην (c), Not to drink with one another so far as to disorder and excess. Among the Indians Drunkenness lyes under the heaviest Censure, being rank'd in the number of their five most heinous Sins, which are said to be these; To lye with ones Mother, which takes in both a Mother-in-Law, and the Wife of a Master or Teacher. 2. To kill a Brachman. 3. To steal Gold. 4. To be Drunk. 5. To converse and keep company with Persons guilty of any of these Crimes (d). Mabomet too, under the Notion of Religion, found means to prohibit his People the use of Wine, tho' they were naturally more addicted to it than most other Nations.

Whosoever is voluntarily guilty of this Vice, since he knew, or at least might presume what effects would follow it, can with no more reason desire to be freed from the Imputation of Faults committed under its guidance, than he can with a good grace complain of a Shower of Rain falling into his House, when he himself, out of a petulant humour, has been pulling off the Roof. Plautus (e) has a merry Jest to this purpose; Wine (says he) would be too cheap at the price it now brings, if a drunken Man might do whatever he pleas'd, without being call'd to an account.

Yet in Indifferent Actions which are left to every Man's Pleasure to perform or omit, Drunkenness is allow'd this favour, that the Effect which would have follow'd any such Action, had it been deliberately perform'd, shall now be utterly invalid, since the overtaken Person acted with much disadvantage.

And, those Causes which we have hitherto reckon'd up, are the most considerable among such as impose a kind of Physical Biass and Tendency on the Will. That which Morally inclines it most, or at least ought to incline it, is Obligation: And yet this, how great soever, neither takes away the Wills intrinsic Liberty, nor renders the Action involuntary, tho' the Lusts and Passions may strive vehemently to oppose it. Hither may be referr'd that Sentence of Aristotle (f), ἀπορον τὰ ἀκήσια φάναι ὄν δὲ ὀρέγεσθαι, 'Tis absurd to call these things Involuntary, which we ought to desire and to pursue.

We say, Obligations ought to incline the Will; For such is the perverse disposition of Human Minds, that frequently the very forbidding of a thing, raises a desire of doing or of enjoying it (g): Which unhappiness, if we consider its closer and nearer Causes, may be referr'd, partly to the vicious Curiosity of Mortals, who admire every thing that they are strangers to, (which opinion is strongly confirm'd by the harshness of the Edict, and by the care and trouble of Obedience;) and partly to the Hatred and Obstinacy which we bear towards the Forbidder, whence we disdain that our Liberty should be abridg'd by a Person who looks so ill in our esteem; whereas on the contrary, it's the Nature of Love to make us willing to comply with the Commands and Desires of the Party we affect.

IX. It is farther observable, That sometimes upon the approach of extraordinary Dangers, and such as are suppos'd to exceed the common strength and firmness of Human Minds, the Will is so vehemently urg'd and press'd, that it gives consent to somewhat, which had it been free from that necessity, it would have utterly abhorrd. kind have the name of Mixt, being partly voluntary and partly involuntary. Thus far they are to be esteem'd Voluntary, in as much as their Principle is in the Agent, who is acquainted with the Nature and Circumstances of the Thing he is going about: and in as much as the Will for the present Time and Necessity, inclines toward them as toward a lesser Evil, or toward one part of an Evil, when otherwise a greater or an entire Evil must be undergone: And this lesser or partial Evil turns into a kind of Good, when both it and the Evil compar'd with it, cannot be both avoided together. 'Tis a known Maxim, that of Aristotle (a), A less Evil compar'd with a greater, obtains the place and character of Good.

But the same Actions are likewise in some degree Involuntary, because the Will seems to be driven on them contrary to its Inclinations, and would never undertake them, if the impending Evil were by any other means possibly to be escap'd. For which reason they have this Quality in common with Involuntary Actions, that the Moral Effects and Consequences attending Actions meerly Voluntary do in these, in a great measure, if not totally, fail. For tho' sometimes a Man may have so straight an Obligation laid upon him, that even upon the Threats and Apprehensions of Death, the most terrible of Natural Evils, he ought not to recede from it; yet where this do's not expressly appear, it is not easily presum'd and suppos'd, as being too sharp and rigorous for the Condition of Humanity: and where there is no such severe Obligation impos'd, it would be downright Folly, not to come off as cheaply as we can, and not to suffer as small a share of Evil as we may compound for. And therefore many things, which would have deserv'd reprehension, had they been undertaken without such a necessity, when they are done under the urgency of so hard a case, are commended by all fair and equitable Judges; other things are for the same reason, either entirely, or for the most part excus'd, and in others the Odium and Fault of the Action is devolv'd upon another Person, the Man who perform'd the Deed being declar'd Innocent. Aristotle (b) discourses well on this point, For these kind of Actions, (says he) Men are sometimes commended, when for the sake of great and honest things, they have sustain'd some Indecency or Harshness. To some things, tho' we allow no praise, yet we grant a pardon, when a Man has done what he ought not, upon the fear of Evils exceeding Human Nature, and not tolerable by Mortal strength. And there are some things perhaps, which no Man can be forc'd or compell'd to commit, but ought rather to endure the utmost Extremities, and Death it self (c).

X. Lastly, Since to make an Action voluntary, there is requir'd not only that the Principle of Motion be in the Agent, or that the Agent address himself to work by the Impulse of his own Will, but likewise that he knows what he is doing, upon the want of both or of either of these Conditions, the Action is rendred Involuntary (d). Now a Man is properly said to be compell'd, when by the force of a stronger Extrinsic Power, he is brought to apply his Limbs otherwise than he would, so as to express his Aversion and Dissent by manifest Signs, and especially by Corporal Resistance and Reluctancy. As if (to use Aristotle's Examples) the Wind, or Men superiour to us in power, should violently carry us any where against our Consent. Tully in his Second Book of Invention, gives an Instance after this manner; The Rhodians had a Law, that whatever beak'd Vessel should at any time be found in their Harbor, it should be condemn'd as Prize, and expos'd publickly to Sale; Now the Question is, Whether a Vessel of this kind, being driven into their Port by a Tempest, ought nevertheless to suffer the common Penalty? 'Twas upon this Topick, that the Friends of the ravish'd Lucretia (e) comforted her under her deep Affliction, by turning all the Guilt on the vile Author of the Crime, telling her, That the Mind only properly sinn'd and not the Body; and that there could be no fault where there was no deliberation or design.

This Reluctancy in Civil Courts is presum'd to have been us'd, in such Actions or Passions, as are not vulgarly thought to be willingly perform'd or undergone, and where all Signs of an Actual Consent are wanting; whence arose the term of Interpretative Reluctancy.

Thus whereas by the Jewish Law a Virgin is suppos'd to have suffer'd Ravishment, if she lost her Honour in the Field, without Witnesses; yet Philo the Jew (f) denies the favour of this Law to reach a Maid, who admitted a Debauch willingly, tho' in a Solitude: as neither can the same Law hurt a Maid in the City, who in the like Danger either could not cry out, or cried to no purpose, and without relief.

A forc'd thing may be so either in it self, and not in its causes, or else both in it self, and in its cause. The first is, when a Person remains in such a state at present, as to be unable to repel the offer'd violence, and yet was in a fault for getting into such a state. being his own fault, we mean, if he has done nothing but according to the Laws of Prudence and of his Duty. For if a Man performs the Office enjoyn'd him, or us'd his Right any other way, and acts not rashly or inconsiderately, whatever violence over-powers him, he will have no Guilt imputed to him, and no Sin to answer for.

CHAP. V.

Of MORAL ACTIONS in General, and of their Application to the Agent, or their Aptness to be Imputed.

HAVING in Pursuance of our Design examin'd and explain'd the Will and the Understanding, as the Principles whence Human Actions obtain the Privilege of being rank'd in a different Class from the Operations of Brutes, the next thing which we are concern'd for, is the general Disquisition of Moral Actions, since in discovering their Rectitude, or Pravity, the Science we are now engag'd in is chiefly employ'd. Moral Actions then, are the Voluntary Deeds of Men consider'd in Common Life, as they include the Imputation of their Consequences and Effects. We call those Voluntary Deeds, which in such a manner depend on Human Will as on a free Cause, that without its Determination, (proceeding from its Internal Acts drawn forth by the previous Knowledge of the Understanding) they would never have been perform'd; and which therefore, as to their being done or not done, must be refer'd to the Power of Man. And these Actions are here consider'd, not as they are bare Motions produc'd by some Power according to the Natural Constitution of Things, but as they proceed from the Determination of the Will; a Faculty dispos'd to embrace either part of two Contradictory Choices. For a Voluntary Action contains something Material and something Formal; the first is nothing else but the Motion of a Power existing by Nature, or its Exercise consider'd barely by it self; the other is the Dependence of that Motion or Exercise on the Determination of the Will, as on a Cause that is truly Free and Acts by its own Resolution. The Exercise consider'd separately and by it self, is for Distinction's sake rather call'd an Action of the Will, or of the Willing Power in a Man, than a Voluntary Action.

We may farther consider the Action of the Will, either in it self and absolutely, as it is a Physical Motion, undertaken upon the previous Injunction of the Will, or else reflexively, as the Effects of it may be imputed to the Actor. Now Voluntary Actions, as they comprehend this Reflexion, are, by a special Approbation of the word, call'd Human Actions. And because from these Actions, as they are perform'd well or ill, as they are agreeable or repugnant to their Rule, the Law, one is said to be a good or an ill Moral Man, (the Inclinations of the Mind resulting from frequency of acting, being likewise term'd Morals;) hence it comes to pass that Moral Actions seem only another Name for Human.

II. The Essence of Moral Actions, according to the last way of considering them, may be divided into two Parts or Notions, a Material and a Formal. The Material Part, or the Matter of a Moral Action is of a very wide Extent: Such may be first any Physical Motion, whether it be of the Locomotive Faculty, or of the Sensitive Appetite, or of the External, or of the Internal Senses, or of the Understanding, so far as concerns the Exercise of Apprehension. For the Act of Judgment depends so much on the Quality which appears in the Object, that it is not Capable of the Direction of the Will, tho' in forming of that Judgment, our Free-will and our Industry are allow'd some Influence and Power: The Act of the Will it self may likewise be the Matter of a Moral Deed, if we consider it in its Natural Condition, or as it is precisely taken, for an Effect produc'd by a Physical Power, as such. So likewise may be the Privation of any Physical Motion, which a Man might have produc'd either in it self, or in its Cause: For a Man may render himself Obnoxious to Punishment, as well by Omissions as by Commissions. As also the Inclinations of the Natural Powers toward certain Objects (acquir'd by the Voluntary Actions that have already pass'd,) at least so far as they are Spurs and Incentives to Acting. Nor are my own Motions and Habits, or the Privations of either, alone the Material Parts of my Moral Actions, but the same Motions and Habits or Privations proceeding immediately from others, provided they could or ought to have been directed by my Will. Thus the Spartan Inamorato's were to suffer for the Faults committed by their Minions (a). Nay, the Operations of Brutes, of Vegetables, and of Inanimate Things, may furnish out the Matter of my Moral Actions, when my Will should have guided their Proceedings. Thus even in the Law of God, a Mischief done by a Goring Ox is imputed to the Owner, in case he know before-hand that his Beast was faulty this way (b). Thus a Vine-dresser is Responsible, if through his Negligence the Vine has spent all its Fruitful Strength and Vigour, in sending out numerous and unnecessary Suckers. Thus the Damages by Fire are Repairable by the Persons who occasion'd it; and Wafts caus'd by the breaking in of the Sea, or of Rivers, are to be made good by him who has either broke down, or neglected to keep up the Banks. Quintilian (c) has propos'd two Declamation Lemma's much to our present purpose. A Piper had plaid a Phrygian Air to a Man who was offering Sacrifice, the Man running Mad, and throwing himself down a Precipice, the Piper is accus'd as the Person who had caus'd his Death. A Club of Young Persons, who had frequent Meetings and Entertainments, one Day made an Agreement to Sup together by the Sea-side. One of the Society being absent, the others wrote his Name upon the Stone Table which they had reared: The Young Man's Father at his Return from a long Voyage, landing in this place, and reading the Inscription on the Stone, took it for his Son's Monument, and hang'd himself for Grief. The Company is hereupon impeach'd as Accessory to his Death. Lastly, the Admissions or Receptions of another Man's Deeds, as far as my Default contributed to their Production, may be the Matter of my own Moral Actions. Thus a Rape is partly imputed to the Woman, if it appear that she rashly ventur'd into such a place, where she might have expected to meet with such violent Treatment.

III. The Formality of a Moral Action consists in the Imputativeness of it, if we may so speak, by which the Effect of a Voluntary Action may be imputed to the Agent, or esteem'd as something properly belonging to him, whether he himself Physically produc'd that Effect, or whether he caus'd it to be produc'd by others. And from this Formality of the Action, the Agent likewise has a Share in the Denomination of Morality, being call'd a Moral Cause. Whence we may easily understand, that the ratio formalis of a Moral Cause, in Strictness and Propriety of Speech, consists in Imputation consider'd with Reference to the Person in whom it terminates, and that therefore such a Cause can be nothing else but a Voluntary Agent to whom the Effect is, or must be imputed, upon account of his being either wholly or partly the Author of it; and that therefore whether it be Good or Evil, both are to be reckon'd as owing to him, and he is liable to give an Account for both. Thus one Man is the Moral Cause of Hurt in another Man, whether he has made his Head swell by Blows of the Fist, or whether he has broke it with a Club, or whether he has set Dogs or Murderers upon him. Thus Anah was the Moral Cause of Mules, he being recorded in Genesis (d), to have first found them out, or to have joyn'd the Mares and the Asses together for their Production. So Jacob was the Moral Cause of the different Colours in Laban's Sheep. Yet it does not always happen that a Man who has barely given Occasion to the Fact of another Man, should be reputed the Moral Cause of that Fact: and therefore the Sentence pronounc'd by Piso which Seneca speaks of, was extream Foolish as well as Cruel, when ordering a Soldier to be led to Execution upon Suspicion of whose Murder another Soldier had before suffer'd Death, he gave his Reason in these words, I order you to be executed for being the Cause of the Condemnation of your Fellow Soldier. There seems no great Necessity that we should here, with the Author of the Treatise De Principiis Justitiae & Decori (1), distinguish between a Moral Cause by it self, and a Moral Cause by Accident. For a Cause by Accident is a Term of vast Obscurity, and very likely to create and encourage vain Disputes: and besides, if we cannot rightly impute the Effect of an Action to a Man, we cannot upon any Account, call him a Moral Cause by Accident, tho' he contributed never so much to the Material Part of the Action. Yet thus far we must plainly acknowledge, that in weighing and rating the Greatness of the Imputation, it is a very Important Query, whether the Action proceeded from such a Person as the Principal, or as the Accessory: as likewise whether the Agent directly intended such an Effect, or whether it proceeded from his Inadvertency, or any other Concomitant Reason. For if the last of these Cases appear true, the Consequence will be, that the Action shall not be imputed to the Person, as if committed against the Laws of Justice, but against those of Prudence or Foresight, and that therefore he shall not be reckon'd to have acted wickedly, but only rashly or unadvisedly. It will not be amiss to examine more closely what the above-mentioned Author lays down in the same place.

First

First therefore he establishes this as a Maxim, Whatever is Evil in its own Nature, so that it can never be chang'd into Good, yet may by Accident follow upon the Exercise, or upon the Defence of my Right, without my incurring the Guilt of Sin, and therefore I am not oblig'd to decline the use of my just Right in such Cases. Grotius likewise proposes a Rule much to the same purpose in his Third Book (a), but Judiciously tempers it with a good Restriction. But our Author proceeds: A Sin is said to follow by Accident upon another free Act, when upon the use of a thing, to which I have a Right, some Effect follows, which I have otherwise no Right to produce. For an Instance of this Case may be alledg'd what Divines call Scandal or Offence taken; concerning which they tell us, That a Man ought not to omit an honest, a pious, or a due Act, though a wicked Person should take never so much Offence at it; and this Rule they confirm by the Authority of our Saviour. But now this very Example might have taught our Author to lay aside his Term of Causa per Accidens; since even in that restrain'd sense it would be little less than Impiety to call Him the Cause of Evil who is the Spring and Fountain of all Good. We ought rather to say, That a Man who exerts a Good and Necessary Action, is by no means the Cause of Sin in another Man, who shall thence take occasion of offending. Thus we commonly say, He who uses his own Right, does no Body any wrong. But he further adds, Since every Man has a Right of Preserving his Health, it is Lawful for the Recovery of Health to make use of a Medicinal Potion, tho' upon the taking of this Potion should follow Distraction (for some little time) or Drunkenness, or (Voluntary) Pollution, or Abortion, (in Case both the Mother and the Fetus must otherwise infallibly perish) and that therefore the Person who takes the Medicine is only the Cause of such Effects by Accident. On which Doctrine we only observe that it had been much plainer to have said, that those Effects are not to be accounted Sins in the Cases here mention'd. Neither do all the Examples brought by the same Author to illustrate the Moral Causa per se, or that which is truly and properly such, rightly hold. For a Criminal (as he speaks) who is to suffer, tho' he go on to the Place of Execution, and ascend the Ladder, cannot merely upon this account be call'd the Moral Cause of his own Death, because if he had refus'd to go willingly, he had been dragg'd along by the publick Officers. And yet there is no reason, why one Man who drinks Immoderately, or another who wasts his Strength in honest and necessary Labours, may not be reputed the Moral Cause of their own untimely Deaths; tho' the former Person sins and the latter not; and tho' neither, properly speaking, can be call'd a Murtherer. But such a one we should rightly call the Moral Cause of his own Death, who is therefore condemn'd, because he would not declare such Matters as might demonstrate his Innocency.

IV. It must be farther observ'd, that this Imputativeness which we have made the Formale of a Moral Action, bears the Nature of a positive Form, from which as from a Spring and Root, all the Affections, Properties and Consequences of such an Action result. And therefore a Moral Action may be call'd a Positive Being, (at least in the Order of Morals, if not always in the Order of Naturals) whether the Matter of it be a Physical Motion, or the Privation of a Physical Motion. For to constitute a Positive Being in Morality, 'tis sufficient that we conceive something in it, from which there arise true Affections of the same kind; since, as a Nou Ens can have no Affections, so whatever has certain and positive Affections cannot upon any account be stil'd a meer Nou Ens.

V. Now that a Moral Action should belong or should be imputed to any Man, (in which we have asserted the ratio formalis of it to consist,) there can be no other Reason or Cause; but that the Man had Power and Ability to do it, or not to do it; to perform or omit it. And this is so manifest a Truth, That the most ignorant and unskilful Mortals, when they are accus'd of any Omission, or of any Fact, think they cannot bring a fairer Excuse, than to say in the first Case that they could not do it, and in the other, that they could not help it. So that it is to be establish'd as a prime Maxim in Morals, That a Man is Accountable for those Actions, the Performance or the Forbearance of which were both in his Power: Or (what comes to the same thing,) that every Action dirigible by a Moral Rule which a Man is able to do, or not to do, may be imputed to him: And on the contrary, that whatever neither in it self, nor in its Cause, was in a Man's Power and Disposal, cannot be imputed to him, or affect him in the manner of a Debt (1). Nor is it any Breach of this Rule, that sometimes a Man is oblig'd to perform a Business depending on Chance, and consequently not in his Power. For this Case can never happen, unless the Man Voluntarily takes on himself such an Obligation (2). Thus much therefore is in the Man's Power, to bind himself to repair a Damage, proceeding from Causes not Capable of Human Direction. To conclude then, that an Action or Fact should be imputed it is sufficient that it was not Involuntary, according to our Discourse in the preceding Chapter (b), and that it was subject to the Guidance of our Will. But to make an Omission truly Imputable, 'tis Requisite that there have been both Power and Opportunity for performance, which Conditions of Power and Opportunity seem to include these four Things, First, That the Object be ready at hand. Secondly, That we have a commodious place, where we may neither be hindred by others, nor suffer any Evil from them upon our Acting. Thirdly, That we have a convenient time, in which we are not call'd to the Discharge of more necessary Duties, and which is equally Seasonable for those who are to concur with us in the Action. And Lastly, that our Natural Powers administer sufficient Strength for the Business. When any one of these Conditions is wanting without the Fault of the Man, it would be most absurd and unjust to lay the Omission of any thing to his Charge (a).

(a) C. 1. f. 4. & c. 11. f. 9. (1) Culpam autem nullam esse, cum id, quod ab homine præstari non potuerit, evenit. Cicer. Tusc. Quæst. l. 3. c. 16. (2) See what is said, l. 5. c. 9. (b) Sect. 10.

VI. Thus much being premis'd in general, it will be worth our while to consider more distinctly and in particular, what Things may be imputed to a Man, which proceed from a Physical Necessity, or from any Cause placed beyond the Direction of Men. And therefore 'tis a simple Practice they tell of the Kings of Mexico, that at the Commencement of their Reign, they us'd to promise their Subjects, that they'd take care the Sun should rise and set at due times; that Rain should fall as often as there was Occasion; and that the Land should bring forth Fruit. Neither can it be imputed to Man, that Natural Causes produce this and no other Effect, or that they produce it in this and no other way; as for Instance, that the Fire warms and not cools us. Yet thus indeed the Effects of Natural Causes furnish large Matter for Imputation, as their active Force is drawn out, or confirm'd by Man, applying Actives to Passives, or exciting their internal Strength by proper Means. On which account a Plenty of Fruit is imputed to the Husbandman, in as much as his diligent Culture obtain'd it from the Earth: Thus the Damage of Fire is imputed to him that kindled it; and thus the varied Colour of Laban's Lambs, may be imputed to the Subtlety of his Shepherd Jacob (b). A Natural Effect may be farther imputed to a Man as he has mov'd the supream Cause and Director of all Things to determine such an Effect. Thus the Three Years Drought might be imputed to the Prayers of Elias (c). As in fabulous Story a long Drought is said to have ceas'd on the Prayers of Aacus (d). Thus too, the Death of the Men who fell in the Pestilence (e), might in some measure be imputed to David, though not to the Degree of Murther.

VII. Neither may we impute to a Man the Actions and the Effects of Vegetative Faculties which appear in his Body, as they arise from his Birth, or from other Causes beyond his Disposal. Yet thus much is in a Man's Power, to supply those Faculties with convenient or with unsuitable objects, which may either maintain and cherish, or weaken and extinguish their Force; as also to distort and abuse their proper Organs. Thus he whom Nature has given a large, a sound and an able Body, is liable to no Imputation of Merit on that score. But to correct a weak Constitution by Industry and Exercise, and to encrease the Natural Powers, gives just occasion for Commendation; and on the contrary, to break or destroy the same Powers by Idleness and Petulancy, turns to a just Shame and Reproach.

Hence no Man can be fairly reprehended for a weak, or a tender, or a diminutive Body; for distorted, or for maim'd Limbs, or for want of Strength, provided that none of those Infirmities were contracted by his Default. Aristotle talks very pertinently to this purpose (f); 'Not only Faults of the Mind (says he) are Voluntary, but those of the Body too in some Persons, whom we therefore discommend. For we do not blame those who are naturally deform'd, but those who are grown so by Neglect of Exercise, and by a Careless way of Life. And the Case is the same as to any Meanness or Unsightliness arising from Distempers, or from the maiming of any part of the Body. For Men will not reproach, but rather pity his Blindness, who had it from Nature, or from a Distemper, or from an honourable Wound: But he will justly fall under universal Scorn or Censure, who has lost his Eyes by Drunkenness, or by any other kind of Intemperance (g). Yet it was not without reason that among the Ancient Gauls, as Strabo relates (h), The Young Men were Fin'd for exceeding the Measure of their Girdle. Because they took it for granted, that such a large Paunch, at such early Years, could proceed from nothing else but Laziness and Gormandizing (i).

The same may be said of the other Faculties which Nature and not our own free Pleasure has implanted in us, as that a Man has sharp or heavy Parts, quick or dull Senses, a firm or a deceitful Memory; unless these Natural Abilities have been improv'd or impair'd by the Man himself. Hither must be referr'd that Observation of Aristotle in his

As those who brush or strike our Cloaths, touch not our Body, so those who censure others for their Imperfections of Birth or of Fortune, vainly and foolishly strike the outward Parts, but never reach the Soul, nor those Blemishes which really deserve Reprehension and Correction. Ethicks (a), Many Things according to our Nature we do and suffer, which we are truly conscious of, and yet which cannot be call'd Voluntary or Involuntary: as to grow old and to die. These things therefore are not proper Matter of Imputation. Neither can the getting of wicked Children be imputed to Parents, provided they have not encourag'd them in their Vices by ill Education. Whence the witty Turn of Vindex will not hold in strict Truth, when he said, That Nero's Mother was justly put to Death by her Son, for bringing such a Monster into the World (b).

VIII. It's Evident likewise, That those Things cannot be imputed, which exceed our Strength, either as to the Hindrance or the Performance of them: provided that this Inability has not been of our own sinful Procurement. On which Foundation are built those common Maxims, That Impossibilities are incapable of Obligation (1); That no Man can be conceiv'd to have enjoyn'd Impossible Duties in a Law; And that therefore if any such thing occur in a Statute, or a Covenant, or a Will, it is either to be esteem'd as Null, or else a more Commodious Interpretation of it is to be found out (c). To this purpose we meet with a pleasant Passage in Herodotus (d); He tells us that when Themistocles desir'd a Supply of Money from the Inhabitants of Andros, supported by the two strong Goddesses Perswasion and Necessity, the Andrians oppos'd him with two stronger Goddesses Poverty and Impossibility. But here it must be carefully observ'd, that it is one thing to be Physically, and another thing to be Morally, Impossible. The former, Impossibility lays an Obstacle, which binds up the Will in such a manner, that either it cannot break out into Action, or else that it shall lose all its Labours and Endeavours. But a Moral Impossibility lays no Impediment surpassing the Active Power which inheres in the Will, but on the contrary arises wholly from the Will it self. And in this manner, we say, 'tis impossible that all Men should conspire together in delivering down a Lie to Posterity, without any prospect of Advantage: Or that any Man should lead a Life of such exact Holiness and Circumspection, as not to offend (at least through the Precipitancy of his Passions) in some smaller Instance of Duty. Hence the Author of the Treatise De Principiis Justi & Decori (e) infers, That a Legislator cannot indeed enjoyn what is Physically Impossible, but he may exact Obedience to things which include a Moral Impossibility. Because in this he commands nothing contrary to the Liberty of the Will, since all the Difficulty of obeying arises from the Will it self. Thus 'tis not Impossible for any Man to frame a Lie gratis; and if not for any Man, then not for the whole Multitude; and yet 'tis certain that the whole Multitude will not do so. In the same manner every Man has the Power of speaking Truth, and consequently a whole Society or Community; and yet 'tis most certain, that a Common-wealth will never be so happy, as to have all its Members abstain from false Speeches: yet this Impossibility does not take away the Liberty of particular Men, or excuse them from Sinning. Thus too we say, that the Fulfilling of the Law is Impossible, and yet that that Impossibility does not injure the Liberty of the Will. For 'tis equally Impossible for a particular Man to obey God's Command in all things, and for a Multitude to abstain from all manner of Lying: And he is as able to preserve himself from each particular Act of Sin, as the particular Citizens are to keep themselves Pure from Lies; and yet this is never likely to happen in the World. Which Doctrine, as it is applied to Theological Points, we leave to be discuss'd by the proper Professors. But if it keep within the Bounds of Human Courts, it does not appear why this should not rather be admitted, then that Assertion of Grotius (f), where speaking of those Sins which some call Sins of daily Incurfion, he says, It may well be doubted whether such as these may rightly and properly be call'd Sins, because tho' we are at Liberty as to the doing each Particular, yet we seem to lose that Liberty, when we consider them in general. For how can these Failures, taken Collectively, escape the Nature of Sin, when at the same time each Particular of them is acknowledg'd to be Sinful? Tho' indeed such small Slips are in Human Cognifance scarce look'd upon as Punishable.

IX. Neither can those things be imputed which a Man do's or suffers upon Compulsion: For they will belong, in Moral estimation, to him who offers the force, and he that receiv'd or executed them is look'd upon only as an Object or an Instrument. 'Tis a Rule with Dionysius Halicarnassens (g), That every thing which is Involuntary deserves excuse. And Cicero (h) argues with good reason, when he says, If we are oblig'd to pardon those who hurt us out of Ignorance, we are not bound to thank those who benefit us out of Necessity. Now Compulsion is suppos'd to be apply'd, not only when the Principle of Motion is in another Man, who by force bends the Members of a Person, to some Action or Suffering, of which the Person by struggling and resisting expresses his abhorrence; but likewise, when a Man by the Peril of Death, or of any other extream Evil, is put upon the Execution of some Enormity to which he is otherwise exceedingly averſe; yet ſo that he ſhall not be the Author of the Deed, but the other Perſon who compell'd him to it. Examples of the former kind are, when a Man by Superiority of ſtrength violently thruſts another upon a third Perſon, or ſtrikes him with a forcible bend of the other Man's Hand: or when any one commits a violent Rape upon a Woman that did not provoke his lewdneſs by her own fault. Her Body indeed, in this Caſe ſuffers diſhonour, but the Blemiſh doth not reach her Soul (a). But a Nymph will not have the benefit of this Interpretation, when with a faint reſiſtance ſhe lets her Ring be ſtoln off from her digitus male pertinax, as Horace (1) calls it. An Inſtance of the latter Compulſion may be, when a Sergeant or a Guards-man is commanded to kill a Man whom he knows innocent, under pain of being immediately kill'd himſelf upon reſuſal: For he can by no means lye under an Imputation in this Caſe, ſince nothing is enjoy'd him but the bare Execution, which in it ſelf is agreeable enough to his Perſon and Character, and ought not to be reſuſ'd upon the hazard of loſing his Life: Eſpecially ſince tho' he threw away himſelf, he could not by that means ſave the other innocent Party. Yet it muſt be confeſt, that the bare Execution of ſome Acts is ſo very foul and deteſtable, that it is a generous Bravery for a Man rather to die than to apply his Body to ſuch Operations, tho', if committed, the fault of them would not light on himſelf, but on others. To which Caſe the paſſage of Ariſtotle relates above-cited: An Inſtance of it may be, Suppoſe a Man ſhould be commanded to commit a Rape on his own Mother, which Faſt, in Oedipus, tho' committed out of invincible Ignorance, yet tormented him ſo, as to make him tear out his own Eyes. But when Ariſtotle alledges for an Inſtance of a forced Action, the doing a baſe thing, upon the Command of a Tyrant who has our Parents or Children in his hands, and will ſave or kill them according to our Obedience or Diſobedience; what he then calls αισχροπραγία, or a baſe thing, muſt be underſtood in a limited ſence, ſo as not to reach thoſe more odious Villanies which we are now ſpeaking of.

And more fully Ethic. l. 3. c. 7. Legiſtators correct and puniſh thoſe who commit Evil, provided they did it neither upon violence and compulſion, nor out of ſuch Ignorance as they did not themſelves occaſion. For otherwiſe, Ignorance it ſelf is puniſhable, when contracted by the Perſon's own fault. Hence there is a double Punishment ordain'd againſt Drunkards, becauſe the Spring of that Vice is in a Man's ſelf, he having the power of avoiding it; and therefore what he doth through Ignorance in that Condition, is nevertheleſs to be charg'd upon him. In like manner they puniſh thoſe who plead Ignorance of the Laws, when the Points were eaſie, and ſuch as ought to have been known. The Caſe is the ſame with all that are Ignorant by their own neglect, they being Maſters of their own Powers, and capable of Diligence and Application.

tion, ſo far as it renders the Action Involuntary (b). This point may be illuſtrated from ſeveral Paſſages of Ariſtotle's Morals; 'Whenſoever (ſays he) Ignorance has been the occaſion of doing a thing, that thing is not done willingly, and conſequently cannot be injurious. But when a Man is himſelf the Cauſe of his own Ignorance, and out of that Ignorance commits a Deed, he plainly offers an Injury, and may in Juſtice be accountable for the Crime. This is the Caſe of drunken Men, who if they commit any diſorder under that Condition, without diſpute do a real Injury, ſince they themſelves have been the Cauſes of their Ignorance. For 'twas in their power, whether or no they would tittle themſelves ſo far out of their Senſes, as to make them (for example) beat their own Father. The ſame Rule will hold in all other Inſtances of Ignorance, the cauſe of which is in the Agent, ſo that he who injures another upon the ſtrength of thoſe Pleas, is nevertheleſs properly unjuſt. But thoſe Perſons cannot by any means be call'd unjuſt, who offend out of Ignorance not of their own procuring. For ſuch Ignorance is to be eſteem'd Natural; as when little Children ſtrike their Parents, their Natural Ignorance, which is the cauſe of the Faſt, hinders it from being ſtil'd Unjuſt; the Ignorance not at all depending on their own power (c).

But in reference to Infants it is farther obſervable, that we chide and beat them for ſome Actions, not becauſe in Human Judgment they be ſtrictly Crimes, but meerly for the ſake of Amendment, that they may not prove troubleſome to others by ſuch Tricks, or may not get an ill habit when they are little, and ſo keep it when they are grown up. And the ſame muſt be ſaid of Delirious Perſons, provided their Diſeaſe was not occaſion'd by their own fault. For the Blows given to one in this Condition, have no more the proper Nature of a Punishment answering to a Fault, than thoſe we give to a kicking Horſe, to break him of that Cuſtom (d).

But he who is the Cauſe of his own Ignorance, and who has wittingly and willingly hindred himſelf from the knowledge of thoſe things, which he might and ſhould have known, is in the ſame Caſe as if he had offend'd upon Knowledge and Deliberation (e).

Ignorance of Universals, and that which we were oblig'd to know, do's not take off Imputation, but only Ignorance of Particulars, and of what concerns the present Fact (a). An Example of this Ignorance is thus given by Tully (b); There was a Law in some certain place, forbidding to Sacrifice a Calf to Diana; now a Company of Mariners being in distress at Sea, made a Vow that if they gain'd the Port which was now in sight, they'd offer a Calf to the Deity who presid'd there. It happen'd that in that very Port there stood a Temple of Diana, to whom no Calf was to be offer'd by the Laws; but the Mariners not being acquainted with these Laws, offer'd the Calf which they promis'd: and upon this Fact they are accus'd.

If an Action be done without any malicious design, and not with Ignorance voluntarily contracted, but such only as crept in by Inconsideration and Inadvertency (c), the Imputation is not altogether taken away, yet it is considerably diminished (d). Hither we may refer the Case propos'd by Aristotle (e) of a Woman that gave a Love-Potion to her Gallant of which he died. Now the Athenian Judges absolv'd the Woman from this Indictment, because she did the Fact undesignedly, and only mis'd the Effect of her Potion, and procur'd his Death instead of his Love, which was her only Aim. But to make this Sentence equitable, it must have been suppos'd as a Principle, that the Woman never so much as thought, the Potion she administred was any way hurtful (f).

XI. Farther, Since the Images form'd by the Fancy in sleep are not in our power, nothing can be imputed to us which we seem to do in a Dream, only as far as by thinking on such things in the day time with delight, we have fix'd the Idea's deeply in our Minds (g). Hence the Man whom Tacitus (h) speaks of, and reports to have seen the Emperour Claudius in his sleep, cover'd with a Crown made of Ears of Corn, was not guilty of any Crime. And the Fisherman in Theocritus (i) entertain'd a very vain Scruple, when he appear'd concern'd for an Oath he had made in his sleep never to venture out again to Sea (k). Neither was Julius Cæsar guilty of Incest, upon account of his strange Dream, recorded by Sueton (l). Yet Byblis was not altogether innocent, when, as Ovid tells the Story,

In sleep she oft does the lov'd shadow seem
To grasp, and joys, yet blushes in her Dream.
Mr. Oldham.

Nor is Plutarch (1) much out of the way, when he maintains, that a fair Argument may be drawn from a Man's Dreams, as to the temper and composure of his Mind: and therefore 'twas a good saying of Epicurus, That a wise Man will be like himself, even in his sleep (m).

XII. Lastly, It is against Reason, that the Imputation of any future Crime should be as it were Antedated, or that it should affect us backwards: unless perhaps the future Crime should depend on some future or present Act of ours, as a Necessary Effect do's on its Cause: For it is a common thing to impute the Effect to him to whom the Cause properly belong'd. Indeed it is not at all absurd, that by Imputation of Favour a future Deed shall procure some good thing to the Agent, or to some Body else, long before it is perform'd. For since any Man may (if he pleases) do a kindness gratis, it is certainly in the power of a Benefactor, who knows what will afterward happen, to confer a present Favour under some Term and Condition hereupon to be fulfilled. But since ill Actions cannot be imputed, but by way of Debt or Guilt, it would be the highest Absurdity, to reckon so far backwards, as to lay Imputation on Persons who neither had any Knowledge of Futurity, nor any Obligation or Power to hinder the Thing from being done; nor, lastly, any Communication of Action with the Author of the Fact (n).

(a) Aristot. Ethic. l. 3. c. 2. He that is ignorant of his Duty or Interest, ought not to be said to act against his Will; for Ignorance upon choice doth not produce an involuntary, but a wicked Action. An Ignorance of Universals renders Men liable to reprehension; but an ignorance of Particulars, or of the Circumstances of the Action, deserves pity and pardon, in as much as the Person thus offending doth truly proceed involuntarily. (b) De Invent. l. 2. (c) These are properly the ἀμαρτημαία of Aristotle. (d) And thus far only may we allow the saying of Quintilian, Inst. (l. 1. c. 6.) Scipio.

XIII. Beyond these Exceptions no Human Action ought to be reckon'd involuntary or incapable of Imputation, tho' to undertake it be never so contrary to right Reason, or tho' any disorder of Mind violently hurry us into the Commission. Indeed Plato (a) lays it down for a Rule, That 'in those Injuries which 'tis impossible to repair, no Man is voluntarily Injurious, because no Man is willing to admit the greatest of Evils into any of his Concerns, and much less into those Things which are most dear to him, and most excellent in themselves; such as is his Soul (b). To the same purpose Aristippus says in Diogenes Laertius, 'That all Mistakes (by which he means all smaller Offences) deserve Pardon, because no Person is mistaken willingly, but as he is compell'd by some perturbation of Mind. And the Emperour Antoninus frequently advanceth the like Doctrine (c). But Aristotle hath in many places refuted this Opinion. As when (d) he recites the following Argument of Socrates design'd to prove, that it was not in our power whether we would be good or bad: 'Because supposing we should ask any one, whether he had rather be just or unjust, no Man would chuse Injustice; whence it should appear, that if some Men are wicked, they are not wicked of their own accord, and consequently none are of their own accord Good. In Confutation of which Aristotle hath us'd these Reasons; 'that it would be absurd for a Lawgiver to enjoyn Good Actions, and to forbid and to punish Evil, unless both were ἐν ἡμῖν, in our power: and that otherwise there would be no manner of cause why Vertue should meet with Praise, or Vice with Disgrace and Reproach. In another Work (e) he handles the Point more at large, and with good reason rejects that common Argument of the Stoicks, All desire and follow what appears good to them; but now no Man is Master of his own Fancy, but the Ends he pursues appear to him just, according as he is inclin'd and dispos'd. For in spite of this Objection, the understanding of what is Just, and what Unjust, must be acknowledg'd both to be in the power of Man, and to be attainable without much difficulty or labour (f). In the same place Aristotle well observes, that as Ignorance contracted by our own fault, doth not render an Action involuntary, so neither can an ill Habit, or a Mind corrupted by frequency of sinning. 'If (says he) a Man, not out of Ignorance, do's things which may denominate him unjust, he is voluntarily unjust; but he cannot, at his Will and Pleasure, turn from unjust to just again (g); no more than a sick Man can be Sound again when he pleaseth, tho' his Sickness perhaps was voluntary, occasion'd either by his intemperate way of Life, or by his disobedience to the Orders of his Physician: Such a Person at first had it indeed in his power not to be sick; but when he hath once neglected his Health, it is not in his power to restore it: In the same manner as one, who hath thrown a Stone out of his hand, cannot recover it again, tho' at first he had the power of throwing or not throwing it. Thus the Unjust and the Intemperate, at first might have been otherwise, and therefore were voluntarily such, but being once under those Conditions, they are not at liberty to be without them; that is, before they have reform'd and corrected themselves.

It may not be amiss to cast an Eye upon what the Author of the Treatise De Principiis Justitiae & Decori (h) hath advanced on the Subject of Moral Habits. 'Those Moral Habits which we commonly call Evil, are not (says he) really Sins, nor worthy of punishment if consider'd in themselves; because they do not touch the Effect with any Moral Causality, so long as they continue Habits, but only as they break out into Acts. And if they prove a hindrance to Vertue, this is done by an elicite Act of Men's Will, which Will is then the Cause of the Moral Vice. But to establish a Moral Cause superior to the Will, is to take away the Nature of that Faculty, it is to turn one Elicite into an enjoyn'd Act, and to attribute to Habits an actual efficacy of operating without any Operation. For we operate only by the Will, and nothing truly Moral can work before the Elicite Act of that Power from which alone proceeds the Morality of any performance. For an Ill Habit, before the Act of the Will, is only a Physical Thing, or a Mode of the Soul; but when the Soul works sinfully by the Will, then the Habit ceaseth, and is superseded. The Efficacy by which ill Habits dispose the Mind to ill Actions is different from that, (for Instance) by which lewd Discourse instils Wantonness into the Minds of the Hearers: because that Discourse may be properly said to work antecedently to the Will of him to whom it is applied, tho' the Effect doth not always follow. Which abstruse Doctrine may fitly enough be explained by this Similitude: Splayness of Foot in it self, and as long as the Foot rests, is not a fault against the Rules of Dancing, but when the Spark makes an ill Step; the Moral Cause of that Miscarriage is not the turning out of the Toes too far, consider'd in it self, but the Will of him that hath so awkerdly mov'd them.

The same Author adds, That 'the reason why we hate ill Habits, is partly because the Persons got them by ill Actions, and partly because they are more prone to ill Actions on the ac'count of them: and that tho' they are Diseases of the Mind, yet they do not deserve Punishment in themselves, but because they were voluntarily contracted. As if we should say, when we beat an unluckly Boy that puts out his Ankle by a wanton and negligent Leap, the reason why we beat him, is not the putting out his Ankle (in it self,) but the idle Leap that caus'd it.

XIV. A Man is not only liable to have his own Actions imputed to him, but likewise the Actions of other Men. Yet this cannot rightly be, unless he has some way or other efficaciously concurr'd in their production. For otherwise Reason will never suffer that the Effect of a Moral Action should be transferr'd from One to Another, unless this other Person had some influence on the Action, by some performance or some omission of his own (a). Thus when a sound arrives at our Ears against our Consent, the bare hearing can be no Crime, if we proceed no farther (b). Though sometimes indeed a quiet and silent hearing is construed as a Token of Consent. And 'twas on this account that the brave Germanicus, when on the News of Augustus's Death, his Seditious Soldiers offer'd him the Empire, started immediately in Confusion from his Seat of Command, as if he had been already tainted with Rebellion (c).

Sometimes, then, it happens, that an Action is not imputed to the immediate Performer of it, but to him who commanded it to be done. As when a Superior, under the Penalty of the severest Evils, and such as he is really able to inflict, enjoyns a Subject the bare execution of some Deed. Thus, as Procopius (d) well observes, 'an Ambassador, at the command of 'him whom he represents, speaks such and 'such words; in which if there appear any 'fault or offence, it ought not to be charg'd on 'him, but on his Master, whose Orders and 'Instructions he is under a necessity of obeying. When the Roman Senate declar'd the League with the Sannites to be Base and Inglorious, and voted the delivering up the General, the Author of it, to the Enemy, it was a very senseless Proposal mov'd by one of the Grave Fathers, that the same Punishment should be inflicted on the Person who held the Swine during the Ceremony of making the Agreement (1) (e). When Mithridates put to death Attilius and other Conspirators against his Life, he pardon'd Attilius's Freed-men who were of the Company, ὡς δεσποτῶν διακονοῦντες (f), as Persons that only obey'd their lawful Master.

But it's more usual that the Action shall be imputed both to the Performer and to the Commander of it. And this is chiefly done in these three ways: Either, that the Commander shall be the Principal Cause of the Action, and the Performer the Inferior and Accessory Cause, or that both shall be deem'd equally guilty, or that the Commander shall be the Inferior Cause, and the Performer the Principal. And in all Cases the Concurrence to another Man's Action is made either positively or privatively by some Commission or Omission.

First then, He is esteem'd the Principal Cause of an Action committed immediately by another Man, who commands something to be done by One under his Power and Sway, or who by his bare Authority, not easily to be resisted, moves a Man to the performance of some Deed, which he could not have enjoyn'd, by Command or Power properly so call'd. And this last was the Case of Piso in Tacitus; whom Tiberius himself excused from having any Guilt in the Civil War, since as he was a Son he could not decline his Fathers Orders (g). But now his Father, by his Paternal Right and Power, could not have oblig'd him to engage in such a Crime, and therefore he was mov'd only by his Authority.

Secondly, He who gives a Consent necessarily requisite to the performance, and without which the Agent had not proceeded (b).

Thirdly, He who ought to have forbidden an ill Action, and did not; provided he had a full Obligation thus to prohibit it, and that upon the account of that Obligation other Men had a right of exacting such a Prohibition from him (i). On this score Diogenes beat a

But this was indeed to censure and reproach Nature for framing our Ears flat and open, and for not putting it in our power to close and contract them, as we do our Eyes or our Mouth: since these alone of all our Instruments of Sense, are plac'd beyond our Will and Command, lying ready to receive of necessity every thing that flows in, like a House without Gates or Doors. Schoolmaster, whose Boys were too much given to their Bellies, Not imputing the Fault (as Plutarch (a) says) to them for not learning better things, but to him for not teaching them. Thus Messalinus in Tacitus (b) advised, that a Decree of Senate should pass to punish the Magistrates for the Crimes committed by their Wives, in Relation to the Government of the Provinces, whether they themselves were concern'd or unconcern'd in the Fact. And thus too by the English Laws, the Husband is oblig'd to Answer and to make Satisfaction for the Wrong his Wife doth to another, either by Word or Deed; because he neglected to use his Power of restraining her. Nay, if the Husband and Wife commit Felony together, the Wife is accounted neither a Principal nor an Accessary in the Crime, because she is suppos'd to have acted upon Necessity, by Vertue of the Obedience she owed her Husband (c).

Fourthly, He who commands, or hires a Person to perform a Villany (d).

Fifthly, He who assists; as he who brings and holds the Ladder, while a Thief gets into a Window: He who strikes the Money out of a Man's purse, that another Rogue may pick it up: He that drives away a Man's Cattle, that his Comrade may seize them, and carry them off (e).

Sixthly, He that conceals or receives stolen Goods (f).

Seventhly, He who did not assist the suffering Party, tho' he was oblig'd to do so (g). Thus Soldiers, who are hired for a Guard in a Journey, if, on the Approach of a number of Villains, whom they are able to grapple with, they refuse to fight, they are to be reckon'd themselves among the Villains. Thus a Fire shall be rightly imputed to the Watchman, who saw it kindling, yet neglected to stop it, or call for help (h). Thus among the Egyptians, if a Man on the Road saw another kill'd, or suffering any Violence, and did not rescue him tho' he was able, he was obnoxious to Capital Punishments. And if the Man was too weak to give Assistance and Deliverance, he was oblig'd to discover and prosecute the Actors: Upon Default thereof, he receiv'd a set number of Blows, or was enjoy'd a three days Abstinence from Viſuals (i). And thus Abas King of Persia, to clear his Country of Thieves, publish'd an Order, that whenever any Person was kill'd or plunder'd, the Inhabitants of the next Town should be Accountable for the Fact (k). So with the Spartans, he that did not reprove a Person who offended in his presence, was punish'd as a Partner in the Crime (l). So Cato exhorting the Magistrates to put the Laws in Execution against Offenders, told them, 'That those who were 'able to restrain wicked Doers, and yet neglected this Power, did plainly assent and contribute to their Enormities (m). As for the Silence and the Diffimulation of Magistrates, Plato (n) has given those Crimes their due Censure: The second Enemy to a State (says he) is the Man, who, tho' he be not strictly a Partner in this Villany (he means Treason,) yet while he enjoys the highest Offices in the Commonwealth, does not observe the Conspiracy; and if he does observe it, out of a timorous Baseness neglects to Succour and to Deliver his Country (o).

For the same reason, if a Keeper, who has undertaken the Care of a Madman, prove negligent, and the Madman happen to do any Hurt, the Keeper shall be answerable for the Fact, tho' the Madman be not capable of Imputation (p).

Those Persons are reckon'd the inferiour or less principal Causes of other Men's Actions, who have advis'd, commended, or cajol'd them before the Facts, in such a manner, as that their Counsel, or Praise, or Flattery, has had any weight in promoting their Undertakings. For otherwise, a Man who barely commends a Crime, and yet by his Commendation contributes nothing to it, ought not to be punish'd for the Crime it self, but should suffer for his ill Thoughts and Designs (a). It will not be very unjust to reckon those in the same Class, who by their Recommendation have prefer'd a Man to the Care and Management of any Business, since 'tis decent they should blush for his Faults and Miscarriages (b).

But as to the Matter of Counsel, it's worth while to run over the Disputes of the Civilians, where they are arguing whether the words Ope and Consilio, by Help and by Counsel, are to be understood in a Conjunctive or in a divided sense. For if Counsel imports the same as Intention or Design, he only will be guilty of another Man's Theft, who assisted him in it, not out of Imprudency, but with premeditated Wickedness (c).

If Counsel has been given without help, it will be requisite to enquire, whether it were General or Special. The former kind is, for Example, when a Man, hearing another complain of Poverty, advises him to support himself by Stealing; and such a Counsellor will not in Human Cognifance, pass himself for a Thief. But if a Man has given special Counsel to another, as, if he has shown him what way to break into a House, told him the fittest time, and where the things be that may be most conveniently carried off, or how he may hide himself after the Fact, such an one will have a very strong Twang of the Thief (d). It is farther observable, in reference to Counsel and other like Influences on other Men's Actions, that by them the Guilt is only communicated; but not wholly devolv'd from the Actor to the Exhorter, unless the former were under an Obligation to put his Advice in Practice. Hence Diodotus in Thucydides (e) complains with good reason, 'That the Orators in a State should be accountable for their Advice, and the People not at all accountable for hearkening to them. He adds, If he that believ'd, as well as he that perswaded a Business, were liable to be punish'd, you would proceed much more wisely in your Judgments. But now, when you fall into Passions on any Disappointment of your Hopes, you only punish him who gave the Advice, and not your selves, who have always born so great a Share in the Mistake or Miscarriage. Hence Mr. Hobbs (f) thus declares in general; This is also Incident to the Nature of Counsel, that whatsoever it be, he that asks it cannot in Equity accuse or punish it: For to ask Counsel of another, is to permit him to give such Counsel, as he shall think best; and consequently he that gives Counsel to his Sovereign (whether a Monarch, or an Assembly) when he asks it, let it please or displease, cannot be punish'd, because he gave it to such as were willing to hear it, whatsoever it should be. But here he should have added, If the Counsellor gives his Opinion bona fide, and has a perfect Knowledge of the Matter in debate. For it is a piece of Wickedness to pretend to give a Judgment about a thing which we are unacquainted with. He presently subjoyns; But if one Subject gives Counsel to another to do any thing contrary to the Laws, whether that Counsel proceed from Evil Intentions, or from Ignorance only, it is Punishable by the Commonwealth, because Ignorance of the Laws is no good Excuse, where every one is bound to take notice of the Laws, to which he is subject.

Hence that Maxim in England commended so highly by Dr. Bates (g) cannot be receiv'd without some Limitation; That the King can never mistake, nor do any Man an Injury, because all the Fault and Punishment, is deriv'd, as it ought to be, on his Ministers and Counsellors, whose Duty is to Admonish the Prince, to deny him their Assistance, when he enters on ill Designs, and rather to quit their Places, than to Obey him when he Commands the Doing of any thing contrary to the Laws (h).

It is Doubtful whether we should rank under this, or under the former Class those, who by their Example excite others to such Sins, as they would have otherwise declined (i).

From all these Observations it is easy to perceive the Reason and the Limitation of those common Axioms; What a Man does by another, of that he himself is reckon'd the Author: We make those things our own, to which we grant our Consent (k). That which, in matters relating to us, is done by others upon our Command, obliges us our selves: That is esteem'd our Action the Execution of which we have impos'd on another; and the like. As for that Communication of Actions, which results from the Union of a Moral Body, it will be hereafter explain'd in its proper place.

When one is said to partake of another's Action, upon account of his own Permission, or because he did not hinder the Action, in this case it is requisite not only that he should have been able by his natural Strength to have hindered it, but likewise that he should have had an Obligation incumbent on him to hinder it. When either of these Two Conditions fails, nothing can be imputed to him, who gives another leave to act at pleasure. And therefore God Almighty is Capable of no Imputation, upon the account of his Permission of Sins. For he is not oblig'd to restrain them in such a manner, as to make them impossible to be committed: that is, by withdrawing our natural Strength, or extinguishing the Liberty of our Will: since upon the Removal of these, no sort of Moral Actions could be perform'd by Man (a).

That Permission then of another Man's Action is void of all Moral Effect, which we give when to hinder the Action is beyond our Duty, or above our Strength; unless this Weakness and Inability is procur'd by our Fault, and unless the Ignorance arose through supine Negligence, and within that Degree of Diligence, which we are oblig'd to observe.

Lastly, Nothing can be imputed upon the account of permitting a good Action, which we might indeed, but ought not to have hinder'd. Thus he can impute nothing to me (or I owe him nothing) who has given me Permission, or has not forbidden me to use my Right; that is, has done me no Injury.

(a) 'Tis a notable saying of Lucian, de Merced. Conduct. God is not in the fault, but the Man that makes it. And thus we intend no more than a Jest, when we say on some Occasions, Now I'll give it leave to rain, or the like.

C H A P. VI.

Of the Rule of MORAL ACTIONS, or of Law in General.

WE come now to consider of that Moral Rule, or Law (1), by which Moral Actions are to be squar'd, and according to their Agreement or Disagreement with which, they acquire peculiar Qualities. And here we must take Care in the first place, accurately to distinguish Law from some other things which seem to bear some Relation to it, and which for that Reason are frequently confounded with it: And these are Counsel, Covenant, and Right. Now Law differs from Counsel in this, that by the latter a Man endeavours, with Reasons taken from the Nature of the Thing, to induce another Person to some Performance or Omission, over which Person, at least as to the present Business, he has no proper Power, so as that he can lay no direct Obligation on him, but must leave it to his Pleasure and Choice, whether he will follow the Counsel, or not. Yet Counsel indeed may administer occasion to an Obligation, in as much as it furnishes a Man with some Knowledge, by which an Obligation may be produc'd or increas'd. Thus, a Physician cannot by Virtue of any Power or Command, order his Patient to take such things, and to abstain from others; but while he shews one thing to be conducive, and another pernicious to Health, the Patient is bound to embrace the former, and to avoid the latter; not upon account of any Right which the Physician holds over him, but by the Law of Nature, which commands every Man to take Care of his own Life and Health. But Law, though it ought not to want its Reasons, yet these Reasons are not the Cause why Obedience is paid to it, but the Power of the Exactor, who when he has signify'd his Pleasure, lays an Obligation on the Subjects to act in Conformity to his Decree, tho' perhaps they do not so well apprehend the Reasons of the Injunction. To which purpose Mr. Hobbs (a) thus expresseth himself; Counsel (says he) is a Precept, in which the Reason why we obey, is taken from the Thing prescribed: But Law, or proper Command, is a Precept, in which the Reason of our Obedience is taken from the Will of the Prescriber. For no Man can say, Sic Volo, Sic Jubeo, so I will, and so I command; unless his Will is his Reason.

We obey Laws therefore, not Principally upon account of the matter of them, but upon account of the Legislator's Will. And thus, Law is the Injunction of him, who has a Power over those to whom he prescribes; but Counsel, of him, who has no such Power. To do the things enjoyn'd by Law, is Matter of Duty; to do those appointed by Counsel, is matter of free Pleasure. The End of Counsel is directed toward him who receives it: And this End he is at Liberty to weigh and to approve. But tho' Law too has commonly some End directed toward those who receive it, yet it does not leave them the Right of examining and rejecting this End, but Actually determines it, by enjoying it. Counsel is only given to those who are willing to have it, But Law reaches the unwilling. Lastly, The right of a Counsellor ceases at the Pleasure of him who receives the Counsel; but the Right of a Lawgiver cannot be taken away at the Pleasure of those on whom he imposes the Law (a).

(1) See Book 2. c. 1.

II. Neither were those Ancients accurate enough in their Expressions, who frequently apply to Laws the Name of Common Agreements (b). For besides that, neither the Divine Positive Laws, nor the Laws of Nature, had their Rise from the Agreement of Men, and therefore that Title can only be attributed to Civil Laws; even these are not properly Covenants and Agreements, tho' there was indeed some Intervention of Compact at the Original of Civil Power. It's plain that the Grecians, as in their other Politick Speeches, so in this too, had an Eye to their own Democratical Governments; in which, because the Laws were made upon the Proposal of the Magistrate, with the Knowledge and by the Command of the People, and so (as it were) in the way of Bargain or Stipulation, they gave them the Name of Covenants and Agreements, before-mention'd. Though indeed, neither upon account of the major part of the Peoples consenting or agreeing to them can Democratical Laws be properly stiled Covenants. For this Agreement is only the manner by which the Supream Power lodg'd in a General Assembly exerts its Force; that being taken for the Will and the Decree of All, to which the Greater Number give Consent.

So that the Efficacy of a Vote given in Council by any Member about framing a Decree, is very different from the Consent which a Man declares at his Entrance on a Covenant: For in this last Case, a Person that dissents is not bound, and the Party cannot proceed without him: whereas in the former Case, even the dissenting Party is tied and obliged by the Plurality of Votes.

The remaining Points of Distinction between a Compact or Covenant, and a Law, are obvious. For a Compact is a Promise, but a Law is a Command. In Compacts the Form of Speaking is I will do so and so; but in Laws the Form runs, Do thou so, after an imperative manner. In Compacts, since they depend, as to their Original, on our Will, we first determine what is to be done before we are oblig'd to do it; but in Laws, which suppose the Power of others over us, we are in the first place oblig'd to act, and afterwards the manner of Acting is determin'd. And therefore he is not bound by a Compact, who did not freely tie himself by giving his Consent; but we are for this reason oblig'd by a Law, because we ow'd an antecedent Obedience to its Author (c).

III. As for the Term of Right, as it imports a power of acting granted, or left free by the Laws, we must take care not to let it pass for the same thing as the Law it self. That is, when we are said to have a Right by the Divine Law, of doing such or such a thing, we must not imagine that the same thing is enjoin'd and commanded by the Divine Law, and that therefore we may fairly do it, tho' it should be forbidden by the Laws of Men. For, since a Man hath a power of doing all such things as can proceed from his Natural Abilities, except those which are forbidden by some Law, hence by common Custom of Speech, those Things which are not prohibited by such or such a Law, we are said to have a Right of doing, by that Law. Right therefore, in this sense denotes a Liberty; but Law includes some Bond and Engagement, by which our Natural Liberty is restrain'd.

IV. In general, a Law may conveniently enough be defin'd a Decree by which a Sovereign obligeth a Subject to conform his Actions to what he prescribes. We call it a Decree, not as it remains in the Mind and Will of the Party decreeing, but as it is communicated to the Subject in such a manner, as to let him understand the Necessity of his conforming to it: and therefore the Term Decree is here Equivalent to Command. And we think it an indifferent matter, whether one should call a Law a Decree or a Speech, provided it be not esteem'd Necessary to it, that it be promulgated either vivâ voce, or in writing; since it is sufficient that the Will of the Legislator be any way made known to the Subject, tho' it should only be by the internal Suggestion of Natural Light. Therefore we take it to be an useless piece of Subtlety and Niceness in Mr. Hobbs (d), when he maintains that the Laws of Nature have no farther the Force of Laws, than as they are promulgated in Holy Scriptures by the word of God; and not as they are certain Conclusions apprehended by Reason, concerning the doing or the omitting of Things. For from the bare Dictates of Reason, we do not only understand that the Observance of Nature's Laws is good and profitable to Mankind, but likewise that it is the Will and the Command of GOD, that Men should govern their Actions by those Rules; which is sufficient to the Essence of a Law. Tho' still indeed this Reply may be made, that Natural Laws, even as they are the Dictates of Reason, cannot be conceiv'd any otherwise than in the manner of Speeches, Propositions, or Sentences.

As to Grotius's (1) Definition, where he says the Law obligeth to that which is Right, we must observe, that he supposeth somewhat to be Just and Right before any Rule or Law; whence it must follow that the Law of Nature doth not make what we call Right, but only denotes or points it out as a thing already Existing. Concerning which Hypothesis we have formerly declar'd our Mind (1).

To conclude this Head, it is evident that under the Name of Laws, not only those are comprehended which belong to Justice strictly so called, directing us, upon a full and perfect Obligation (2), to exhibit such and such things to Others; but those too which are concern'd about the other Vertues, and which extend no farther than the Agent's own Person. For which Reason Laws may, and frequently are, made against Drunkenness (a), and other kinds of Intemperance, which Vices are so very Prejudicial to the Parties Committing them. The same must be held as to Sumptuary Laws, which prescribe the Measure of Expences in Victuals, Cloaths, Building, and other Furniture or Provisions. In which Particulars if any Man offends, he doth no one an Injury, provided he defray the Charges out of his own Stock: And yet there's no Question to be made, but that a Subject may by Laws be obliged to Frugality, which conduceth so highly to every Man's Interest and Advantage.

V. But since in the Definition of Laws it hath been asserted that they proceed from a Superior, and that they have in themselves the power of Obliging, it seems necessary that we here shew what Obligation is, and whence it ariseth; as also who is capable of receiving an Obligation, and how one Man can Oblige another, or which is the same thing, how it comes to pass that one Man may, by Virtue of his Authority and Command, enjoyn another such and such Duties.

Obligation, then, we have already defin'd (3) a Moral Operative Quality, by which a Man is bound to perform somewhat, or to suffer somewhat (b). The Roman Lawyers call it Bond of the Law, by which we are necessarily tied to this or that. For by means of it a kind of Moral Bridle is put upon our Freedom of Action, so that we cannot rightly take any other way than what we are thus guided to. Not that it can so far restrain Men's Wills as to render them unable to steer a different Course, tho' at their own Peril: for in this sense Arrian's (c) Assertion will ever hold true, Περαιρέσις ἀλλοτρίαις ὑδαίς κρείττε, No Man is Master of another's Will.

Now although there are many other things which have an Influence on the Will, in bending towards one side, rather than the contrary, yet Obligation hath this peculiar Force beyond them all, that whereas they only press the Will with a kind of Natural Weight or Load, on the Removal of which, it returns of its own accord to its former Indifference, Obligation affects the Will in a Moral way, and inspires it inwardly with such a particular sense, as compels it to pass Censure it self on its own Actions, and to judge it self worthy of suffering Evil, if it proceed not according to the Rule prescrib'd. And hence alone we may understand how sufficient the strength of the Obligation is to the bending and inclining the Will; since there's nothing but the Thoughts of that Good or Evil (4) which our Actions may bring on our selves or others, that can lay any Necessity of such a Performance, or of such an Omission, upon the Mind of Man whilst in debate about future Concerns; supposing that the Will is allow'd its proper Liberty, and that such Actions are to be exerted, as may be properly imputed to the Agent. And in this respect chiefly, Obligation differs from down-right Compulsion, that although both do ultimately represent some Object of Fear, yet Compulsion only shakes the Will with an external Force, and drives it on to the Choice of an ungrateful Thing by the bare sense of approaching an imminent Danger: whereas Obligation doth farther engage the Person to acknowledge that the Evil denounc'd against the Transgression of such or such a Rule, doth not undeservedly fall upon him, since by observing the Rule, he might have declin'd and escap'd it.

VI. As to Man's being capable of receiving Obligation, one reason how he comes to be so is, because he is indu'd with Will, which can turn to either side, and so guide it self by a Moral Rule; unlike those other Beings which by some intrinsical Constraint are determin'd to one and the same way of acting. Whence it follows, that so far as no Necessity is interpos'd by any external Principle, Man must be conceiv'd to be perfectly free, and to have a power of doing all those Things which fall within the Sphere of his Natural Strength and Ability. Nay, when he hath once determin'd and resolv'd with himself, or when he hath once made any Choice, yet in the Determination, Resolution, or Choice, consider'd purely as they proceed from the Will, there is no such Force, but that he may, at his pleasure, rightly change or relinquish them: unless there intervene some outward Restraint, forbidding any Alteration of the Will,

(1) C. 2. f. 6. (2) To understand this Distinction of Perfect and Imperfect Obligation, See Chap. 7. of this Book, f. 7. and B. 3. c. 4. f. 3, &c. (a) Ælian, V. H. l. 2. c. 37. relates a remarkable Law of Zaleucus to this purpose, That whosoever of his Subjects happening to be indispos'd, should drink pure Wine, unless upon the Advice of a Physician, if he recover'd, should suffer Death, for exceeding the Bounds of Temperance without express Oracles. Which Penalty was no doubt unreasonably severe. (3) C. 1. f. 21. (b) In thus defining Obligation we consider it as it inheres in the Person obliged. Bp. Cumberland, c. 5. f. 27. in his Definition proceeds another way, considering Obligation as it is an 'Act of the Legillator, by which he shews or declares that Actions conformable to his Laws, are necessary to be done by the Persons for whom the Laws are ordain'd. (c) In Epicet. 1. 4. c. 12.

(4) This is Dr. Cumberland's Sentiment, whose words our Author here uses.

when once settled and declar'd; for a Man upon once signifying his Will and Purpose, may put himself under such a Condition, as that it shall be unlawful for him afterwards to recede.

Now a Man is suppos'd to have chang'd his Will, not only when he expressly declares his present Dislike of his former Choice, but likewise when he hath done any thing inconsistent with his preceding Resolution. And from this Principle may be deduc'd the greatest part of what the Civilians deliver concerning Repentance, or the altering of a Purpose. For if we enquire after the general and ultimate Cause, why to repent of a Design should in some Acts be lawful, in others not, we shall find it to be no other but this, that some Acts are attended with an external Bond, which forbids any Change of a Purpose once declar'd; whereas in the rest, the Will is left to the Exercise of its intrinsic Liberty. The former Case usually happens, when upon Supposition of a Change in one Man's Resolution, some other Man would be highly injur'd and prejudic'd, and so Occasion would be admittred to the breaking off of all Society and Commerce amongst Men. And therefore from a Signification of the Will, this other Man is said to obtain a Right, by means of which he is now empower'd to make the promising Party stand to his word, and upon Default may prosecute him by Force, either such as he himself can exert, or such as proceeds from the Supreme Ruler, according as the Persons live, either in a State of Nature or of Civil Society. Therefore, when upon Declaration made of my Will, another Man doth not obtain a Right over me, I am then at Liberty to repent of what I have done. And such a Right over us is then not obtain'd, when the Sovereign under whose Power we live, hath not given another Man Authority to require and exact that from us which we have signify'd as our Intention. And hence it appears why Positive Laws may be repeal'd by him that enacted them; because they do not convey to the Subjects any such Right upon the Legislator, by Virtue of which they may demand and require their Continuance. Tho' some Common-wealths have endeavour'd to preserve the Perpetuity of their Laws, by obliging the Members to declare upon Oath, that they will not consent to their Alteration. Nay, though at the end of the Statute or Ordinance a Clause should be affix'd, pronouncing all Decrees that may hereafter be made contrary to this, to be null and void, yet such a Clause cannot hinder the altering or reversing of a Law by which no Man has obtain'd a Right. For 'tis absurd that a former Decree should disannul a latter;

since Absolute Power cannot bind and restrain it self; and since that which is in its own Nature subject to change, cannot be made fix'd and irrevocable (a). The Athenians in Tibucydides (b), laid up a thousand Talents in the Citadel, denouncing a Capital Penalty against him who should either decree or perswade the employing that Money to any use, except in case the City were attack'd by a Hostile Fleet. And yet upon the Revolt of the Inhabitants of Cbios, their Fears engag'd them to repeal that Decree (c). When Princes add expressly in some of their Constitutions, that altho' they should hereafter order any thing to the contrary in a particular Edict, yet the Magistrates and Judges shall not obey or regard any such Command, this Addition doth by no means amount so high, as to prove they may not abrogate such Constitutions, but rather shews that the latter Orders are not serious, or that they dropt from them unawares. And sometimes by this subtle Artifice they cut off and prevent the Importunities of fawcy Petitioners, whom perhaps it would not be safe for them absolutely to deny (d).

But there's need of distinguishing very nicely between the positive Law it self, and that Right which it occasions to be obtain'd. The Law it self may be disannull'd by the Author, whilst in Force, must still remain: For, together with a Law, to take away all its precedent Effects, would be a high piece of Injustice (1). For example, Suppose it were a Law in any State, that as a Man dispos'd of his Possessions by Will, so the Right to them should stand: it would be very fair, in this case, for the Sovereign to retrench this Liberty of Testaments, and to order that for the future all these Inheritances shall pass to the Heirs at Law. Yet it would be unreasonable to take away from Persons what fell to them by Will, whilst the former Law was in Use and Vigour. And by the same Rule we may judge of that Action of Pope Boniface VIII. when out of Hatred to Philip the Fair, King of France, he recall'd all the Indulgences which his Predecessors had granted to the French Nation; which Harry Stephens hath so justly ridicul'd in his pleasant Apology for Herodotus (e).

We must take care likewise to distinguish the other Acts of Sovereigns from their Law, lest any should imagine that All their Just Donations, Alienations, or Compacts may be retract'd by themselves, or by their Successors. For upon these Acts a Right is obtain'd by other Men, which ought not to be taken from them against their Consent. Hence it appears, that when a Man renounceth his Right, it is not necessary to add expressly, that neither he nor his Heirs will do hereafter any thing contrary to that Rénunciation, and that if they do attempt any such Matter it shall be esteem'd void. For, since in Deeds of this Nature, a Man plainly declares his receding from his Right to any thing, and professeth to translate it on another Person, it would be evident, without that additional Clause, that he cannot (with any Force or Effect,) afterwards dispose of that thing, having no longer any Right or Title to it. And for the same reason, because whilst the Testator lives, no Man hath obtain'd a Right by virtue of his Testament, he may fairly alter it, even tho' he had strengthen'd it with a Clause, declaring all Wills that should hereafter be made to be invalid. For this indeed carries Grounds enough to make us presume the latter Will did not proceed from his serious Intentions; yet if that very Clause be revok'd in that latter Will, the former will be of no Virtue or Efficacy. And so in Deeds and Instruments of Conveyances and other Contracts, if a Dispute arise about any Point, that which bears the latter Date shall take place, in Prejudice of that which was made sooner.

VII. From what has been said, we may likewise gather the reason why a Man cannot be oblig'd to himself, or why he cannot enter into any Agreement or Promise purely directed to his own Person, no other Party being concern'd with him. For he who obtains a Right by any Obligation, may fairly wave that Right, when by so doing he injures not a third Man. But now in this Case the obliged and the obliging Party, or he that owes the Right, and he that obtains it, are one and the same. Therefore should a Man never so much resolve to oblige himself, yet the Obligation would be in vain, since he could excuse himself from Performance at his pleasure: And he that can dispence with himself in this manner is actually Free. Besides, such an Obligation could be of no manner of use; because when a Man gives or denies any thing to himself, he neither gets by the Performance, nor loseth by the Omission (a).

But whereas it is sometimes said, that a Man is obliged to preserve himself (1), the meaning of this is no more but that the Exercise of that Obligation inherent in every Man is terminated in a Man's own Person, but it hath likewise a reference to GOD the Author of Natural Law, as to him who hath a Right of requiring the Performance of that Obligation, and of punishing its Neglect: And therefore a Man is so far bound to consult his own Preservation as he is a Servant of God, and a part of Human Society, to which by the Divine Command he ought to shew himself a useful Member. In the same manner as a Master may rightly punish his Servant, and a Sovereign his Subject, who hath render'd himself unfit to discharge his proper Labours and Employments. Neither is this Maxim, That a Person cannot oblige himself, confin'd to single Men, but extends to whole Bodies and Societies (2). As for that which some Authors urge about a Man's swearing to himself, That he will, for instance, refrain from this or that Enormity to which his Evil Appetites incline him, this Obligation bears the Nature of a Vow, the Exacting of which appertains to Almighty God (b).

VIII. Another Reason why, since the Will of Man is capable of conforming to a Rule, such a Rule may be prescrib'd to it, and an Obligation laid on it thus to conform, is, because he stands under the Command of a Superior Power. These two Conditions put together, render Men liable to Obligations, proceeding from Eternal Principles. For when the Powers of any Agent are so tied up by Nature to an uniform way of acting, as that it cannot by its inward Motion steer a different Course, the Action thus produc'd is rather Physical than Moral, and ariseth rather from Necessity, than from Obligation. And, on the other hand, where a Person acknowledgeth no Superior, there can be no Essential Principle apt to restrain his Inward Liberty. And, although such an one should never so exactly observe a certain Method of proceeding, and constantly refrain from some kinds of Actions, yet this would not be taken for the Effect of any Obligation, but of his own free Pleasure. It follows then, that he alone is capable of Obligation, who can have Knowledge of a Rule prescrib'd him, and hath a Will intrinsically free, able to steer contrary ways; which Will must however, when a Rule is injoin'd it by a Superior, be sensible that it ought not to recede from it. And that such is the Nature of Man, every one's Observation may inform him.

IX. Obligations are laid on Human Minds properly by a Superior, that is, by such an One as not only hath sufficient Strength to denounce some Evil against us upon Non-compliance, but hath likewise just reason, to require the retrenching of our Free-wills by his own Pleasure. For when any one is indued with these Qualifications, so soon as he shall command any thing, and shall farther signify the Good and Evil Consequent on Obedience and Disobedience, there must needs arise in the Rational Faculty a Fear mix'd with Reverence, the former proceeding from his Power, the latter from the Consideration of such other Reasons, as without that Motive of Fear, and barely by way of Counsel, ought to prevail on us to embrace the Command. Hence we conceive, that the Right of imposing Obligations on another, or, which comes to the same thing; the Right of commanding another, and of prescribing Laws, doth not arise barely from Strength, or from the superior Excellency of Nature. Strength indeed, may of it self, so far bend me contrary to my Inclinations, as to make me chuse rather, for a while, to obey another's Will, than to venture the Experience of his Force: But this inducement ceaseth, when once the Fear is over, and I shall then have no reason why I should not act, rather according to my own Pleasure, than according to his. And where a Man can bring no other Argument for my Compliance to his Orders, but Force and Violence, nothing hinders, but that if I judge it expedient for my Affairs, I may try all means to repel the Violence, and to assert and vindicate my Liberty (a).

X. It may not be improper here, to examine that Assertion of Mr. Hobbs, which he hath laid down in his Book, de Cive (b), and which runs thus, in the English Improvement of his Leviathan (c). The Right of Nature, whereby God reigneth over Men, and punisheth those who break his Laws, is to be deriv'd not from his Creating them, as if he requir'd Obedience as of Gratitude for his Benefits; but from his irresistible Power. The Argument with which he defends this Notion, is carried on to this purpose. 'All Right over others being either by Nature, or by Compact, that Right may be said to be granted by Nature, which Nature doth not take away. Now seeing all Men, by Nature, had a Right to all things, they had a Right every one of them, to reign over all the rest. But because this Right could not be obtain'd by Force, it concern'd the Safety of every one, laying aside that Right, to set up Men with Sovereign Authority, by common Consent to rule and defend them: Whereas if there had been any Man of Power Irresistible, there had been no Reason why he should not by that Power, have rul'd and defended both himself and them, according to his own Discretion. To those therefore whose Power is Irresistible, the Dominion of all Men adhereth naturally by their Excellence of Power; and consequently, it is from that Power, that the Kingdom over Men, and the Right of afflicting them at his Pleasure, belongs naturally to Almighty God, not as Creator and Gracious, but as Omnipotent. Now, in this Discourse, there are several things that deserve to be censur'd. For in the First place, it may be question'd, whether or no those two Expressions, A Right of Sovereignty (upon account of Strength) is granted by Nature, and A Right of, &c. is not taken away by Nature, hang very well together. Because in most Cases, my not taking away a thing is by no means an Argument, that I therefore grant it. And since, not to be taken away, and to be granted, are different things; such a Right may seem to be granted by some other Principle than Nature, tho' Nature doth not take it away. Besides that Maxim, All Men by Nature had a Right to all things (1), ought to be interpreted with great Caution. By Right (2), he means the Liberty which every Man hath of using his Natural Faculties according to Reason. Therefore his Principle, in a sound Sense, will amount to no more than this; By Nature, that is, upon the removal of all Law, every Man may fairly use his Natural Strength against those whom his Reason instructs him thus to deal with, for the sake of his own Preservation. But it doth not hence follow, that barely by Natural Strength an Obligation, properly so call'd, may be laid on another: For to compel, and to oblige, are very different Matters; and though Natural Strength be sufficient for the former, yet the latter cannot be perform'd by that Superiority alone. For, even according to Mr. Hobbs's own Notion, as one Man hath a Right of compelling others, so those others have a Right of resisting him. But now, Obligation cannot stand with a Right of resisting: Because, it presupposeth such Reasons as, inwardly affecting Men's Consciences, make them conclude, by the Judgment of their own Mind, that they cannot Honestly; and therefore Rightly, resist. And though it be Irrational, to contend violently against a superior Strength, and by that means to draw upon our selves greater Mischiefs (d); yet there remains in us, a Right of trying all ways, either to drive off the Force, by the dextrous Application of other Force, or to elude it by Subterfuge and Escape: But neither can this Right consist with that Obligation which is precisely so term'd, and which Grotius commonly opposeth to Extrinsiccal (3). So that, on the whole Matter, by bare Force, not the Right of Resistance, but only the Exercise of it, is extinguish'd. We may explain the Point by the Case of Brutes, with which we Men live in a Lawless State: Now those of them which we can master by our Strength, we lay hold on, and employ in our Service; but if any of them escape our Power, we are not apt to complain of any Injury receiv'd from them. Nor can it here be reply'd, that Brutes are not capable of Obligation; and that therefore they cannot be tied and engag'd any other way than by Strength: For Mr. Hobbs himself acknowledgeth (e), That a Captive of War, although capable of Obligation, yet is under none, whilst he is restrain'd only by Natural Bonds, and before the Interposition of any Faith or Compact; and that therefore, such an one may give his Conqueror the slip, or may assault him violently so soon as he finds

(3) He understands by an Obligation Extrinsiccal that which is founded only upon Civil Laws: whereas an Internal Obligation has for its Principle the Light of Conscience, which makes us look upon many things unjust, which Civil Laws permit, tolerate, or at least don't formally forbid. (e) De Cive, c. 8. f. 2.

Opportunity (a). Were we dispos'd to be tedious, we might farther shew, that this Maxim of Mr. Hobbes is meer Absurdity and Nonsense, if applied to GOD Almighty. For how can Nature be said to have granted any thing to God: Since Nature is either GOD himself, or at least the Work of GOD? For these Reasons therefore, and because it seems unworthy of the Divine Goodness, we conclude, that the Right of Commanding, or the Sovereignty of GOD, as it denotes the Virtue of imprinting Obligations on Men's Minds, is not to be deriv'd from the bare Consideration of his Omnipotence.

Neither do those Arguments, brought by Mr. Hobbes from Scripture, prove the Truth of his Position. When GOD seems to have recourse to his Absolute Power, about the Calamities sent on Job, we cannot hence infer, that he hath no Right over his Creatures, but what ariseth from that Power only. Job himself, at the beginning of his Sufferings, made a true Declaration, by what Right GOD had depriv'd him of his Goods, and of his Children: The Lord gave (says he) and the Lord hath taken away: That is, why may not he recall at his Pleasure, those things which he gave upon the same free account (b)? But when his Grief had so far prevail'd on his Reason, as to make him enter into Expostulation with Heaven, then GOD, to repress the Insolence of the Complaint, alledg'd his Power, since the Sufferer had now neglected to consider the other Reasons of the Divine Sovereignty and Command. And thus we commonly deal with Obstinate and Refractory Subjects; when they refuse to hear our Reasons, we shew them our Strength; to make them understand not only their Sin, but their Folly too in opposing our Dominion. In the same manner, if a Person complains of the Misfortunes of good Men, and the Prosperity of the Wicked, when he persists Deaf to the genuine Causes of that Proceeding, in the last place, we confound him with the Divine Omnipotence: As if we should say, You that fancy your self injur'd, go and try your Strength against GOD for Satisfaction.

Nor is it a better Inference of Mr. Hobbes, when he says, that the Obligation of paying Obedience to GOD is incumbent on Men, upon account of their Weakness. For this could only make it a piece of Folly in us, not to redeem our selves by obeying, from some greater Evil: But it doth not at all take away our Right of desiring, and of endeavouring by all means, to escape the Superior Strength, which thus oppresseth us. But such a Right is utterly excluded by every true Obligation. Nor is this Consequence good, Of two Omnipotents, neither can oblige the other, therefore Men are oblig'd to GOD, only because they are not Omnipotent; were the Antecedent never so unquestion'd. Not to say, that the Fancy of two Omnipotent Beings is an impossible Supposition. Neither did our Saviour intend to assert his Right against Saul by that Argument, It is hard for thee to kick against the Pricks; but rather to reprove the Boldness and Vanity of Saul's Design. Nor was that Mighty Convert afterwards invited by Ananias into the Christian Faith, barely by being inform'd how much above his Strength it was, to destroy that Profession. We have applied so much the more Diligence to the confuting of this Opinion, the more Danger we apprehended of its being abus'd by Violent and Head-strong Men (c).

XI. Others there are, who derive the Origin of Sovereignty, or of the Power of imposing Obligations on another, from Eminency or superior Excellency of Nature, which they pretend is of it self sufficient for that great Purpose. They draw a main Argument from the very Nature of Man, in whose Mind, as in the most excellent Part, is seated the  $\tau\delta$   $\eta\mu\alpha\nu\omega\nu\delta\eta$  the Directive Power. To illustrate which, they alledge the Authority of Cicero\*,

(a) Senec. de Ira, l. 2. c. 11. Nature hath so order'd things, that he whose Greatness depends on the Fear of others, is not without Fear himself. (b) Add. Senec. ad Polyb. c. 29. (c) In Thucydides (l. V.) the Athenian Ambassador speaks to this purpose, We follow the common Nature and Genius of Mankind, which appoints those to be Masters who are Superior in Strength. This Law is not of our making, nor are we the first who have used it; but we receiv'd it as it came down to us, and we shall leave it to guide the Practice of all Posterity. Dionys. Halicarn. l. 1. It is a Law of Nature common to all Men, and which no time shall disannul or destroy, that those who have more Strength and Excellence, shall bear rule over those who have less. Brennus (in Plutarch's Camillus) calls it a most ancient Law, that which gives to the Valiant the Possessions of Cowards; derived from GOD himself, and reaching even to Brute Creatures; for even amongst these, Nature gives larger Privileges and Portions to the strong than to the weak. Livy hath express'd the Notion more concisely, omnia fortium esse, that the World was made for the Bold and the Strong. Callicles (in Plato's Gorgias) pursues the same Argument: In the first place, he lays down this Supposition, that Nature and Law, are many times contrary to each other: He instanceth in the Case of Injury, to receive which is by Nature the most base and vile, as the Treatment of a Slave, not of a free Subject; yet to do an Injury is much worse in the Construction of the Law. He observes it to have been the Policy of Law-givers, to encourage this latter Notion, so to order the useful Engines of Praise and Dispraise, as to hinder others from growing too powerful for them; well knowing, that they were otherwise an unequal Match for the Multitude. Now Nature her self (says he) as I imagine, shews it to be just and right, that the Good and the Strong should have, in every thing, a larger share than the Bad and the Weak. And therefore, whereas Xerxes and Darius had both made use of this Pretence, the former against the Grecians, the latter against the Scythians; he says they did all this according to the Law of Nature. He complains, that the rigid Doctrine of Justice damps and oppresseth the Generous Spirits of young Men; or that on the contrary, when any one breaks through those formal Restraints, he seems to shake off his rust, and to shine in all the Splendor of Natural Right. On this Principle, he says, Hercules drove off Geryon's Oxen, who neither sold nor gave them him; the Hero having a Natural Right to the Oxen, and all the other Goods and Possessions of Inferior Puny Mortals. And this is indeed the Maxim which the great Bullies of Mankind would have prevail in the World: Hoc Ithacus velit & magno mercetur Atrida. Plutarch's Opinion is much more moderate, and might be admitted with less Exception; It is the first and principal Law of Nature (says he) that he whose Circumstances require Protection and Deliverance, should admit him for his Ruler, who is able to rescue and to defend him. * Tusc. Quest. lib. 3. cap. 5.

when he commends the Latin Phrase exire de potestate, as applied to those, who are carried away from Rational acting, by the Fury of their Passions and Lusts; such Men being truly gone out of the Power or Command of their Minds. Aristotle likewise, is brought in to strengthen their Party, because he hath somewhere declar'd, that if a Man can be found excelling in all Vertues, such an one hath a fair Title to be King. Thus the most Superlative Pre-eminence of GOD, would, they say, deserve Veneration, though he had never created the World. Farther, to this Pre-eminence of Nature, they add Non-accountableness; and affirm, That for this Reason only, if Man useth Brute Creatures (whom he so far excels) any otherwise than with Decency and Moderation, he may do it fairly and securely, and they have no Right to complain of their hard Treatments: Because when one contends with another about Matters of Right, he doth, as it were, compare himself with him, and is willing that both should be judg'd by the same Law; but this cannot be admitted in two Natures, so vastly different, that one may be said to have been made for the sake of the other. And therefore they pretend, that GOD declar'd Mens Right over Brutes, purely on account of their superior Nature. Whence, they tell us, if a Man for abusing his Cattle happen to be punish'd by the Magistrate, this is not done in favour of the Beasts, but for the sake of the other Subjects, whose Interest it frequently is, that every one should use well what he possesseth. On the same score, they say, the Body ought not to complain, though it should, by the Command of the Soul, be wasted and worn out in Labours; since it is in so high a degree surpass'd by that Nobler Part.

But, to deliver our own Judgment, we cannot yet be perswaded, that from a bare Transcendency of Nature, can spring a Right of imposing Obligation on others, who have in themselves a Power of being their own Governours and Directors. For neither doth a superior Nature always imply a Fitness to Rule an Inferior; nor do the different Degrees of Perfection, in Natural Substances, immediately denote a Subordination, and a Dependance of one upon the other. But rather, since the Person who is to receive the Obligation, hath in himself a Principle of guiding his own Actions, which he may judge sufficient for his turn; there appears no reason, why he should be suppos'd to stand presently convicted in his own Conscience, if he acts rather by his own Pleasure, than at the Will of another, who in Nature excels him. And therefore tho' that Notion of the Epicureans, was most senseless and impious, in which they describ'd the Gods, as enjoying their own Happiness with the highest Peace and Tranquility, far remov'd from the troublesome Care of Human Business; and neither smiling at the good, nor frowning at the wicked Deeds of Men; Yet they rightly enough infer'd, that upon this Supposition, all Religion, and all Fear of Divine Powers, was vain and useless. For who will worship another, that is neither willing to assist, nor able to injure him? The Contemplation of so Noble a Being as this, may indeed excite Wonder in us, but it can never produce Obligation. Besides, we Christians confess, that there are created Spirits indued with a Nature far surpassing our own; and yet we acknowledge no Sovereignty that they bear over us, immediately on their own account (a). The Instance about Brutes is nothing to the purpose; for they are not held by Obligation, but only by force, or by the Enticement of Food: Neither would they act contrary to their Natures, should they endeavour to throw off the Yoke and the Authority of Men. As to the Argument about the Soul, when that is said to bear a Sovereignty over the Body, the Speech is Figurative: For Sovereignty or Command is not properly understood, but between two Persons, or two compleat Natures; and the Body is subject to the Soul, by virtue of the Physical Combination, not of any Moral Tie. Lastly, for the Citation from Aristotle, if a King were to be constituted by Free Election, the Crown ought to be given to the most deserving Person (b); yet would not he bear the Sovereignty by a Right deriv'd purely from his superior Gifts and Excellencies, but by virtue

VI. c. 44.* If the Gods do not at all regard or order Human Affairs (which yet it is the highest Impiety to imagine) to what purpose are our Sacrifices, our Supplications, and our Oaths, and our other Acts of Worship, by which we suppose the Divine Powers to be ever present and conversant amongst us? Cicero de Natur. Deor. l. I. c. 2. There have been Men in the World, who thought the Gods not in the least concern'd about Human Affairs. Were this Opinion admitted for true, there could be no such thing as Piety, Holiness, or Religion amongst Men: For to pay these Regards to the Divine Natures, is most agreeable to Goodness and to Purity, provided they take notice of our Actions, and are the Authors of any Benefits and Advantages in our Lives. But if the Gods are neither able nor willing to help us, nor at all bestow their Care and Observation on our Proceedings, and so derive no Blessings, no Favours upon Mankind, to what end is our Worship, our Honours, and our Prayers, the Tribute which we now pay to the Immortal Beings? As no Virtue can subsist in Hypocrisy and Shew, so especially Piety would be soon lost in that Disguise; and then farewell to all Holiness, and all Religion; which being once banish'd the World, what could follow but the Misery of utter Disorder, of Universal Confusion; And again, What Piety can you owe to him from whom you have receiv'd no Benefit? Or how can he claim any thing as his Due, who hath no Merit to plead in his Behalf? Idem de Nat. Deor. l. 2. The common Title which our Ancestors gave Jupiter was Optimus Maximus, most eminent in Goodness and in Greatness: in which we find Goodness, or Beneficence prefer'd to Greatness; it being a more Noble, and more Excellent, as well as the most Acceptable Prerogative to be Good, than to possess the highest Degrees of Majesty and Strength. *Ovid. de Pont. l. 2. of the Donation made him by the Consent of the Electors.

XII. It must be acknowledg'd therefore as a certain Truth, That neither Strength, nor any other Natural Pre-eminence, is alone sufficient to derive an Obligation on me from another's Will; but that it is farther requisite, I should either have receiv'd some extraordinary Good from him, or should voluntarily have agreed to submit my self to his Direction (a). For, as we naturally yield and give up our selves to some singular Benefactor; so if it appears that this Benefactor both intends my Good, and can consult it better than I my self am able, and, farther, doth actually claim the guidance of me, I have no reason in the World to decline his Government and Sway. Especially if it so happen, that I am beholden to him for my very Being (b). For he who first confer'd on Man the Benefit of Free Acting, why may not he, by his own Right, retrench that Freedom in some Particulars? And then, as for the other Case, he that consents to admit another for his Sovereign, declares by this his own proper Act, that he will conform to his Sovereign's Pleasure. Though indeed to make a Lawful Sovereignty arise from Consent, it is farther necessary, that by this new Subjection, no prejudice be offer'd to the well-grounded Right of a third Person, and that the one Party may justly have such Subjects, and the other Party as justly such a Governour. From these two Springs we conceive all those Obligations to flow, which do, as it were, cast an inward Tie and Restraint upon the Liberty of our Wills. But because 'tis beyond the Power of any Moral Bonds, utterly to suppress our Natural Freedom of acting; and because such is either the Lightness or the Wickedness of most Mens Minds, that they despise these Grounds of Dominion, as feeble Reasons for Obedience; hence there ariseth a necessity of adding some further Motive, which may work on our disorderly Lusts with a stronger effect than the bare Sense of Decency and Honour.

And this Addition is the more requisite in as much as, generally speaking, the Wickedness of one Man tends to the Damage of another: Whereas we should be more willing to leave a Man to his own Guidance, provided his Sins would incommode no Body but himself. Now there is nothing which could have such an Effect as this, but the Fear of some Evil, to be inflicted upon our violating an Obligation, by some stronger Power, whose Interest it was, that we should not have thus offended. So that Obligations receive their final Strength and Authority from Force, and from a Supposition, that he whose Business it is to see them observ'd, is furnish'd with so much Power, either originally inherent in himself, or confer'd upon him by others, as to be able to bring some considerable Evil on the Disobedient. For amongst wicked Subjects He must needs be a very Precarious Ruler, whom they can despise without Danger. On the contrary, His Dominion is settled on a firm Bottom, who in the first place, bears a just Title to it, and, besides this hath so much Force always at his Command, as is sufficient to reduce the Seditious, and to restrain the Transgressors (c).

From our Disquisitions on this Head, some Temper may be found and applied to that Maxim, which some have more crudely utter'd, that Right and Law is nothing else but what pleaseth the stronger Party: For indeed, Laws can hardly obtain their outward end and effect, unless they are supported and arm'd with Strength, so as to be able, upon occasion, violently to force a Compliance (d). Even all that Pleasure, and Joy of Conscience, upon Performance of our Duty, and those Horrors and Tortures of Mind, which are the constant Attendants of Sin, both which we are in Piety, oblig'd to admit and acknowledge, proceed from the Strength and Power of Almighty GOD, who can easily make such Wretches their own Punishers, as contemn the Authority and the Restraints of other Men (e). And indeed it highly concerns the common Good of Mankind, that all Men believe and confefs the Certainty of a Divine Tribunal, incapable of the leaft Corruption, where Judgment is to be pafs'd on thofe, who by means of Cunning, Collufion, or Strength, have declin'd the juft Performance of their Duty (a).

They, therefore, who would prefcribe Laws to others with any Effect and Validity, muft build their Power on the Foundations which we have here eftablifh'd.

XIII. But that a Law may be able to exercife its directive Force, there is requir'd in the Perfon for whom 'tis made, a Knowledge both of the Law-giver and of the Law. For how can any Man pay Obedience, who neither apprehends to whom it fhould be paid, nor to what Duties his Obligation binds him? And here, it will be fufficient, that a Man hath once been Mafter of fuch a Knowledge: For he that forgets what he once knew, is not at all loos'd from his Obligation, fince he might well have secur'd his Remembrance, had he taken up, as he ought to have done, a real Defire and Refolution of obeying. Now to the Knowledge of the Legiflator, 'tis hardly poffible any Man fhould be a Stranger. For, as to Natural Laws, that they have the fame Author with the Univerfal Frame of things, none can be ignorant, that will but make ufe of their ordinary Reafon. Much lefs can the Author of Civil Laws be hid from the Apprehenfion and Notice of his Subjects: Since he is conftituted, either by the exprefs and open Consent of thofe Subjects, or elfe by their tacite Agreement, whilft they any way fubmit to his Command. How we arrive at a Senfe of Natural Laws, by the Contemplation of Human Condition, we fhall hereafter have occafion to explain. Civil Laws are convey'd to the Subject's Knowledge, by a Promulgation, publickly and perfpicuoufly made. In which there are two Conditions which ought to be clear and certain, firft, that the Laws proceed from him who hath the chief Command in the State; and fecondly, that the meaning of the Laws is fuch, and no other. The former Condition is then known, when the Sovereign promulgates a Law either by his own Voice, or by Perfons of his Deputation. That thefe Perfons publifh Laws by the Command and Authority of the Sovereign, there is no Queftion to be made, if it appear, that they have been employ'd by the Sovereign in declaring his Will; if the Laws are brought into ufe at judicial Proceedings, and if they contain in them nothing derogatory to the Sovereign's Power. For it is not to be fuppos'd that a Minifter fhould vent that for a durable Decree of his Prince, which is not fo, or that he fhould impudently ufurp fo extravagant a Power; fince in an Enterprize of this Nature, there could be no hopes of Concealment, or of efcapeing due Punifhment for fo Insolent an Offence. As to the other neceffary Point, that the Senfe of a Law may be clearly apprehended, it is incumbent on the Promulgators, to ufe the greateft Plainnefs that the thing is capable of: Contrary to that Management of Caligula, who wrote his Laws in fmall Letters, and fix'd them in a High Place, in this manner only, fhewing them to the People (b).

If any thing in the Laws feems obfcure, the Explication of it is to be fought, either from the Legiflator, or from thofe Perfons, who are by him appointed to judge according to the Laws. For it is their Bufinefs, obferving a right Interpretation, to apply the Laws to particular Cafes, or upon the Propofal of fuch or fuch a Fact, to declare the Sovereign's Pleafure concerning it (c).

We cannot here but obferve, that the Notion maintain'd by fome Authors, That the Consent of the People is requifite to make Laws oblige the Subject in Confcience, is neither true in the Laws of Nature, nor in the Civil Laws of Monarchical or of Aristocratical Rulers; nor indeed at all, unlefs it be underftood of Implicite Consent, as a Man by agreeing to the Sovereignty of another, is at the fame time fuppos'd to have agreed to all the future Acts of that Sovereignty. Though it would really be very ufeful, and contribute much to engaging the Subjects in a voluntary Obedience, if the Laws could be made with their Consent and Approbation; efpecially fuch as are to pafs into their Lives and Manners (d).

XIV. As in the Sovereign, or in him who is to govern another by Laws, two things are requifite, that he underftand what is fit to be prefcrib'd, and that he have fufficient Strength to denounce and to execute fome Evil on thofe who fhall not conform to his Rules: (for we fuppose the Perfons for whom the Laws were made, to have both Power and Inclination to difobey them) So every Law confifts of two Parts; in one is defin'd and declar'd what is to be perform'd, or omitted; in the other is fignify'd what Evil fhall be incur'd by thofe who tranfgrefs in either refpect; and this latter part is ufually term'd the Sanction of a Law: About which Bifhop Cumberland (e) hath open'd a wide Field of Enquiry, whilft contrary to the General Opinion of the Lawyers, 'He maintains that the Sanction of Laws is made, not only by Punifhments, but by Rewards too, and more principally by the latter than by the former. That, as to the Sanctions of the Laws of Nature, it is impoffible by any Natural Signs more openly and more forcibly to perfwade Men, or to

 ‘is commanded by the Governour of the ‘World, than if such Acts are grac’d by him ‘with Natural Rewards. That, altho’ in the ‘Sanction of Laws by Men, use is made of ‘Negative Conceptions and of Words properly ‘expressing them; yet in the Nature of things, ‘that which drives us on to Action, is some ‘positive Good, which we hope to preserve,
 ‘or to acquire upon keeping off those things ‘that would have a contrary effect. That, ‘Privations and Negations do not move the ‘Will of Man, and that the avoiding of Evil ‘is by no means its Object any farther than as ‘it denotes the Preservation of some Good.
 ‘That, whatever Strength is usually ascribed ‘to Natural Punishments and Evils, in engage-‘ing Men to shun and decline them, is all to ‘be resolv’d into the attractive and impulsive ‘Force of those Goods which the Punishments ‘or Evils would deprive them of. That, thus ‘all those things which are commonly said to ‘be done for the sake of escaping Death or ‘Want, might be more properly affirm’d to ‘proceed from the Love of Life, or of Riches.
 ‘That, unless Life went before it, Death would ‘signifie nothing, and that the former would ‘never be fear’d, if the latter were not first ‘desir’d. That, the Nature of things moves
 ‘our Affections more strongly with the Love
 ‘of a Present Good, or the Hope of a Future, ‘than with the Hatred of a Present, or the ‘Fear of a Future Evil; and that good things
 ‘are desir’d upon account, not of the opposite ‘Privation, but of their inward Agreeableness ‘to our Natures. That, Civil Laws receive a ‘firmer Establishment from their End, the ‘Publick Good, a part of which is commu‘nicated to every honest Subject, than from ‘the Penalties they threaten, the Fear of ‘which can prevail only on a few Men, and ‘those the most wicked in the Commonwealth.
 To this purpose Bp. Cumberland discourseth.
 On whose Opinion we may first observe, that if we would comprehend under the Term of Sanction even the good Things and the Rewards following the Observation of Laws:
 it is requisite, that those good Things should really proceed from our Obedience, and be, as it were, bought or purchas’d by it. But now ’tis apparent, that all the good things we possess we do not obtain by conforming to Laws; and therefore those which we any other way acquire, do not come under the Notion of Rewards. Thus, our selves, our Lives, and all the Natural Benefits we enjoy are not paid to us as the Rewards of our fulfilling any Law; but the Divine Goodness freely confer’d them on us, before we could so much as think of any Law to be fulfill’d.
 Neither is the Continuance of these good Things, (since it proceeds from the inward Force of Natural Substance,) deriv’d from any Performances of ours, but is the Gift of our Great Creator, who (1) makes his Sun to shine on the Evil and on the Good, and sendeth Rain on the Just and on the Unjust. Thus likewise, what a Man gets by his proper Labour, and Industry, he doth not directly and principally ascribe to his own Obedience, but to his Creator who gave him the Strength, and to himself who rightly employ’d it. Yet this Effect indeed, we may obtain by Laws, both the Preservation of those good Things which either the free Bounty of Heaven, or our own Diligence hath procur’d us from the Incursions and Assaults of other Creatures that might otherwise hurt or destroy them; and likewise the Increase of the same Enjoyments by various Methods and Means: And therefore these Advantages only, in as much as ’tis in the Power of the Legislator to make them good, are properly to be esteem’d Rewards. And that these may have a perfect Force in disposing Men to Obedience, the Legislator is to signifie, that such Effects will most certainly follow such a Cause.

We may observe farther, That altho’ the Will may be incited to an Action, by the Proposal of some Good likely to proceed from that Action; yet this Consideration doth not impose any Necessity (2) of Performance, unless it be strengthen’d with the Commination of some Punishment, to be incur’d upon Non-Compliance. And therefore, that any good Effect proceeds by natural Consequence from any Action, is indeed a Token of the Superlative Bounty of our Creator, who is so willing to confer that Good on us, and so kindly invites and perswades us to imbrace it. Yet this must not presently be thought a necessary Argument, that He at the same time commands us, by performing the Action, to acquire such a Good. He might perhaps judge it sufficient to have offer’d us so fair an Occasion of receiving his Munificence. But if some Evil be farther pronounc’d against us upon Omission, then there can remain no doubt, but that the Action is really and directly enjoin’d. To which we may add, that the Minds of Men are mov’d more forcibly by the Infliction of Evil, than by the Possession of Good. It must be confess’d, that the Acquisition of Good hath very powerful Charms: especially when it is fresh, and join’d with the Deliverance from some present Evil. But the Sense of this Pleasantness wears off in a long Course of Possession; and when once that Motion of Mind ceaseth, which either the Absence of the Good, or the fresh Enjoyment of it rais’d, there remains scarce any thing, but a dull Acquiescence and Contentment. Whence it comes to pass that many Persons, then only begin to value their good things, when they either have lost or are in danger of losing them. But Grief, into which all Evils and all Privations of Good are at last resolv’d, is not it self a bare Privation, but a thing of a most positive Nature, and of such prodigious Strength, as to be able so far to extinguish all Sense and Value of Happiness, as sometimes to make us desire so severe a Remedy as Death, for its Cure.

(1) Matth. V. 45.(2) See Lock of Human Understanding, l. 2. c. 21. f. 35, &c.

Hence, we think, Civil Legislators have sufficient Grounds and Reasons for chusing to make the Sanction of their Laws consist rather in Punishments than in Rewards. The Observance of Human Laws is indeed advantageous enough in general, as it secures the Possession and Enjoyment of those Blessings which attend a Civil Life: But were the Exercise of common Virtues enforc'd by the Proposal of particular Rewards, 'twere impossible to furnish stock enough for supplying so profuse a Bounty. On the other hand, the denouncing of Punishments was the surest way to make Men shake off that heavy Drowsiness with which most of them are besotted and benumm'd: And because generally the Transgression of the Laws is join'd with the Hurt of others, and with some imaginary Good of the Offender, therefore it seem'd most expedient to repress the enticing Allurements of Sin, by representing the frightful Image of that Pain and Grief which was unavoidably to follow it. Thus we find that Civil Laws do always come enforc'd with a Penalty denounc'd against Transgressors, either expressly defining the kind of Mulct or Punishment; or else intimating that it is left undetermin'd to be settled by the Discretion of the Judges, and of those who are to take Care of putting the Laws in Execution. Indeed the Roman Lawyers tell us of some Laws which were imperfect (1), or which wanted this Penal Sanction. Such a one they reckon the Lex Cincia, which had no other Clause added at the end to enforce it, but this, He that doth otherwise shall be accounted to have done wickedly. But I should conjecture, that in that Law either the Infamy alone was thought a sufficient Punishment, or it was left to the Power of the Censors to fix some further mark of Disgrace on the Delinquents in this point. That such Persons were not altogether unpunish'd, we may fairly conclude from Tacitus (a). Livy (b) gives us an Instance of another Law seemingly Imperfect. The Valerian Law, says he, when it had forbidden the Scourging, or the Beheading of a Man, who should make an Appeal, only added, that whoever acted thus, acted wickedly. This I suppose, (so great was the Modesty of Men in those Days) might be thought a sufficient Tie for a Law: But in our times such a Simplicity of Expression would be us'd in no Threats, but those which were design'd for Jest. In the same Rank we may place the Law of Zaleuchus mention'd by Diodorus Siculus (c). Let no Citizen prosecute his Enemy with implacable

Hatred, but let him so maintain Enmity with him, as if he were shortly to return into Favour and Friendship. He that doth otherwise, let him be reputed a Man of a Fierce and Barbarous Disposition. Unless you'll say, that in this Case, as well as in the former, the Infamy may well be interpreted as a Punishment. And so likewise in those other Laws, recited immediately after by the same Author (d). Let not a Free Woman, unless she be drunk, go attended with above one Maid. Let her not stir out of the City in the Night time, unless when she goes to prostitute her self to her Gallant. Let her not wear Golden Ornaments, nor Garments interwoven with Gold, unless she designs to act the Courtesan. Let not a Man wear a Ring allied to Gold, or a Garment approaching near to the Milesian Richness, unless he be guilty of Fornication, or of Adultery. Thus, (as the Historian proceeds to observe) by such Scandalous Exceptions and Conditions, he easily diverted his Subjects from the Pursuit of Luxury and of Intemperance. For no one could bear the exposing himself to his Fellows by so foul a Disgrace (e).

Thus then, there are two Parts of a Law, one Definitive, and the other Vindicative, which is the Penal Sanction. These, we say, are two parts of the same Law, and not two Species of Laws. For as it is lost Labour to say, Do this, if nothing follow besides, so it is absurd to say, You shall undergo such a Penalty, unless it have been before signified by what means we shall render our selves obnoxious to this Suffering. We must therefore take notice, that the whole strength and force of a Law, properly consists in declaring what our Superior is pleas'd we should perform or omit, and what Penalty we shall incur upon Default. Whence also it may be understood in what sense the Power of obliging is attributed to the Law. For, properly speaking, the Power of obliging, or of laying an inward Necessity on Persons to act in such a manner, is in him who bears the Sovereign Command. But the Law is only the Instrument of Sovereignty, by which the Ruler makes his Pleasure known to his Subject, which being once discover'd, an Obligation to Obedience is produc'd in them by Virtue of his Supreme Authority. Hence too it appears, that the vulgar Distinction of the Power of a Law, into Directive and Compulsive, was ill made; unless by the Compulsive Power we understand the Penal Clause. For the proper Efficacy of a Law consists in directing, as it declares the Will of the Sovereign, and denounceth Threats against the Subject, if he prove Disobedient. But the Compulsive Power, or the Power of exacting from the Subject a Conformity to the Rule prescrib'd, by decreeing and actually inflicting Penalties, is properly in the Person of him who made the Laws, or of him who hath the Care of their Execution (a). Though 'tis a common thing with Writers, to attribute to the Laws themselves such Effects, as in a strict sense belong to the Supreme Power. Of which kind of Speech, that one Passage of Apuleius (1) may be a sufficient Instance, Quod Lex est in Urbe, &c. What the Law is in a City, what the General is in an Army, such is GOD in the World. When Livy (2) says, The Commands of the Laws are more Powerful than those of Men; this is so far true in Democracies only, that the Magistrates cannot recede from the Laws, nor over-rule their Force.

Legislators, as such, are said to compel, only Morally; not that by any Natural Violence they so constrain a Man, as to render it impossible for him to act otherwise than as they direct; but because, by declaring and exhibiting a Penalty against Offenders, they bring it to pass that no Man can easily chuse to transgress the Law; since, by reason of the impending Penalty, Compliance is in a high degree, preferable to Disobedience.

XV. Now by attributing thus to Laws the Power of Obliging, we immediately exclude Permissions from the Number of true and proper Laws: Though Modestinus (b) tells us, the Virtues of Law, are to command, to forbid, to permit, to punish. For Permission is not properly an Action of the Law, but the Negation of an Action. Whatsoever things the Law permits, those it neither commands nor forbids, and therefore it really doth nothing at all concerning them. Some maintain, that there is nevertheless, a kind of Obligation in Permissions; not indeed affecting him to whom we say a thing is permitted, but binding up a third Person from giving him any hindrance, in case he undertake what the Law thus permits. Though this is by many restrain'd to such things as are fully and perfectly permitted, so as not to take in those lesser and imperfect Permissions which may be more properly stil'd Indulgences or Connivances. Thus, for example, the Laws of some Countries permit the killing of a Wife taken in Adultery; yet they do not forbid others, from using their utmost to hinder her Death. But if we would be accurate and exact in our way of Talking, even this Effect doth not properly result from the Permission of the Law, but from every Man's just Liberty. For about those things in which the Law gives me no stop or hindrance, I have a perfect Freedom of acting, the chief Effect of which is, that no Man ought to disturb me in the harmless Exercise of it. So that for a Law expressly to permit those Things, to which we claim a sufficient Licence by their not being prohibited, which cannot well fall under Doubt or Dispute, seems little better than useles and superfluous. As likewise, it is not always necessary, that when any prohibiting Law is repeal'd, an Act hitherto forbidden, should by an express Ordinance be declar'd permitted: Since upon removal of the former Impediment, our natural Liberty doth, as it were, revive and recover it self. There are indeed two special Cases, in which Civil Lawgivers are wont to use express Permission; First, when Licence and Impunity is indulg'd to such an Act, within such a Measure; and secondly, when the Licence or Impunity is to be purchas'd by some Fine or Burthen. Of the former Case, some give an Instance in the Laws of most Countries permitting Usury, within such a fix'd Degree: Of the latter, in the Constitutions of some Places, where Women are allow'd to prostitute themselves, upon Condition of paying a certain Tax: which whether it be well or ill done, we are not now to dispute (c).

Legal Permission is divided into Plenary, which gives a Right of acting, and makes the Deed altogether lawful; and less Plenary which either affords Impunity, or Freedom from Impediment, or both. Now that several things find an Impunity amongst Men, is occasion'd by some of these Reasons. Either, that the Matters exceed the Reach of Human Courts and Cognifance, as do the Faults of Kings; or, that Human Law hath either determin'd nothing plainly about such an Action, or hath declar'd it shall be Lawful; or, lastly, because Civil Ordinances frequently leave many things to the Modesty and common Honesty of every particular Man (3).

Some have more accurately observ'd concerning these Permissions of Civil Laws and Civil Courts, that they are made either by the Action of the Law, or only tacitely. To the former they refer the Omission, or passing by of a Matter, not simply, and, as it were, by accident, but when the Design and the Form of the Law run in such a manner, that the Legislator shews his Intent of making a full Enumeration of Particulars. For in such a Case, he is suppos'd to have permitted whatever he hath not expressly reckon'd up amongst things prohibited; provided the matter be not repugnant to Natural Honesty. Those things are understood to be tacitely forbidden, which the Civil Power lets pass by conniving at, tolerating, or dissembling; either for the present only, or for a longer time, so as to let them obtain the Force of Customs. Yet a Permission granted by a Civil Law, cannot

(a) *Liban. Orat. V. Laws were of no Force without Judges to put them in Execution. cause that an Action shall not be contrary to the Divine Law, or set it beyond the Fear of the Divine Punishment.

We may farther remark, that when a thing is said to be permitted, which is not determin'd by the exprefs Command of any Civil Law, we are not to cavil at the Words of the Law, but to consider the Scope and Intention of it. For many things are contain'd in the sense of the Laws, and are suppos'd to be really implied by them, either as they are necessary Consequences, or upon Account of their near Affinity and Resemblance to the determin'd Cases. Regard is likewise always to be had to Natural Law, or to common Honesty, which is the perpetual Supplement of Civil Decrees. Lastly, those things which are tolerated only for a time, or upon the Score of Necessity, cannot fall under the proper Notion of Rights. All which Observations are chiefly to be understood of the most perfect or Plenary Permission (a).

XVI. The Matter of Laws, in General, is whatever can be done by those Persons for whom the Laws are made, at least at the time of their Promulgation. For if any Man afterwards by his own Fault, loseth his Ability to fulfil the Law, the Force of the Law doth not thereupon cease and expire; but the Legislator hath Power to punish him, for rendering himself thus incapable of conforming to the Rule prescrib'd him. But, otherwise, to make such a Law as a Subject cannot fulfil, and yet hath not lost his Power of fulfilling by his own Fault, is not only a most vain, but a most unjust Design (1). As to the subject Matters which employ the particular Species of Laws, we shall more conveniently consider them in their proper place.

XVII. To know who is capable of being oblig'd by a Law, we need seek no further than to the Right of the Legislator; which certainly takes in all those who are subject to his Command. What Persons the Legislator intended to oblige is plain enough from the Law it self. For in all Laws it is signified whom they concern; either by exprefs Determination, made sometimes by a general Sign, sometimes by a Restriction to certain Individuals; or else, by some Condition or Reason which a Subject finding in himself, at the same time apprehends that he therefore stands oblig'd by such a Law. Regularly then, a Law obligeth all Persons subject to the Legislator, whom the Reason of the Law reacheth, and to whom the matter of it may be applied. For otherwise, Tumults and Confusions would continually arise amongst Subjects, the Prevention of which Disorders was a principal Reason why Laws were first introduc'd. And therefore no Body shall be esteem'd exempted from a Law, unless he can shew his peculiar Privilege. Yet this indeed frequently happens, that a Man may be exempted from the Obligation of a Law, after the time of its being enacted, and this we call being dispens'd with. For if the Legislator may rightly abrogate or repeal a Law, he may as fairly suspend the Effect of it in some certain Person. Dispensation differs from Equity (2), with which it is generally confounded, in this respect, that the former cannot be granted but by one indued with Legislative Power; whereas an Inferior Minister of Justice not only may, but ought to apply the latter; so that if he follow the strict Letter of the Law, in a Case where there is room for an Equitable Construction, he shall be judg'd to act contrary to the Mind and Intention of the Legislator. Dispensations therefore depend on the free Grace of the Law-giver, but Equity on the Office and Duty of the Judge. In granting Dispensations, great Prudence is to be us'd, lest by a promiscuous Indulgence, the Force and Authority of Law be enfeebled; or lest, if the same happen to be denied to Persons of the like Condition, occasion should be given to Anger and Repentment, whilst Men of Equal Circumstances are not admitted to Equal Favours. Plutarch hath recorded several Instances of very nice and subtile Dispensations. As when Agessilaus suspended the Laws for one Day, with this Form, Let the Laws sleep to day (b); to hinder those Persons who had fled in an Engagement, from suffering the usual Disgrace. So when Demetrius desir'd to be admitted at once into all the Athenian Mysteries, whereas it had ever been a Custom to celebrate the Greater Mysteries in November, and the Lesser in August, Stratocles publish'd a Decree, that the Month March, in which Demetrius visited Athens, should be call'd, first November, and then August (c). What the same Author reports of Demosthenes, is more plausible. Demosthenes, upon his being recall'd from Banishment, lay under a Pecuniary Mult, and the Law forbidding, that he should be entirely discharg'd from it without Payment, they invented this way of eluding the Law; they had a Custom of giving Money to the Man who prepar'd and adorn'd the Altar, at the time of sacrificing to Jupiter the Deliverer: This Office and this Money they decreed Demosthenes; and under that pretence allotted him fifty Talents, the Sum in which he had been amerced. The Lacedemonians made use of much such another Evasion in Reference to Lyfander. It was a Law amongst them, that no Man should bear the same Office above once; but now resolving to let Lyfander have again the Chief Power in a Naval Expedition, they gave Aratus (3) the Formal Command of the Fleet, but join'd Lyfander with him in a private Station, with exprefs Orders, That the General should never act contrary to his Advice (a). I know not whether the Spanish Custom mention'd by Naudæus (b), may not be reckon'd likewise amongst these nice Permissions. 'In Spain, he says, when they deem 'a Man to be guilty of Treason, they appoint 'Judges to sit on him in secret, who form a Process and condemn him to suffer Death; after 'which they seek by any means to put the Sentence in Execution. And this they practice as a 'Salvo to their Consciences; that they may not 'be accus'd of Injustice in punishing Men capitally, without a Legal Knowledge of their Crime.

(3) Our Author must have meant Aratus, for Aratus was a General of

XVIII. LAW may be best divided, with Reference to its Original, into Divine and Human; the former having GOD, and the latter Man for its Author. But if we consider Law as it bears a necessary Agreeableness to the subject Matter, in this respect we divide it into Natural and Positive. The former is that which is so exactly fitted to suit with the Rational and Social Nature of Man, that Human Kind cannot maintain an honest and a peaceful Fellowship without it: or, in other Words, that which carries in it a Natural Goodness, or a Usefulness arising from its internal Efficacy, towards Men in General. Though there be also a farther Reason of this Denomination; in as much as this Law may be found out, and known by the ordinary Sagacity of Men, and from the Consideration of Human Nature in Common.

Positive Law is that which doth not by any means flow from the general Condition of Human Nature, but from the sole Pleasure of the Law-giver; tho' these Laws ought likewise to have their Reason and their Uses: in reference to that particular Society for which they are enacted.

Some are us'd to call Positive Law by the Name of Voluntary: Not as if the Law of Nature did not proceed from the Will of God, but because no Positive Law had such an Agreeableness with human Nature, as to be necessary in general for the Preservation of Mankind, or, as to be known and discover'd without the Help of exprefs and peculiar Promulgation. And therefore the Reasons of this Law are, not to be drawn from the General Condition of Human Race, but from the Particular, and sometimes the temporary Advantage of separate Communitie (c). So that upon the Union of Men in Societies, they are fix'd and determin'd by the Pleasure of Superiors. We may improve our Notion of Positive Law by that Passage of Aristotle (1), where he says, That Laws proceeding from Institution and Usefulness, bear some Resemblance to Measures: For the Measures of Wine and Corn, for instance, are not every where the same; but Greater where the Merchants buy, and Lesser where they sell.

Divine Law is again divided into Natural and Positive (2): But Human Law strictly taken, is only Positive. Of the particular Species, we shall discourse in their Place.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Qualities of MORAL ACTIONS.

OUR next Business is to consider the Qualities of Moral Actions: Now according to these, Actions are said to be Necessary, or not Necessary, Lawful or Allow'd, and Unlawful or Disallow'd, Good or Evil, Just or Unjust. So that the Qualities of Moral Action must be Necessity, Licence or Allowance, and the Opposites of these, which want proper Names; together with Goodness and Illness, Justice and Injustice.

II. A necessary Action is that which by Virtue of the Law or the Command of a Superior, the Person to whom the Law or the Command is given, is bound absolutely to perform. For in this consists the Necessity of Moral Actions, that they ought not to be omitted, nor yet to be done in another manner than what is enjoin'd; though by our Natural Power and Strength we are able either to omit them or to do them in another manner. Yet it is usual for the Lawyers to say absolutely, that a thing which wants only this Moral Necessity, cannot be done (1). To a Necessary Action is oppos'd not only a Forbidden Action, expressly prohibited by the Laws or other Orders of the Superior; but likewise a Lawful or an Allow'd Action, which the Laws neither command nor forbid, but leave it to every Man's Pleasure, whether he will undertake or decline it (a). Now by common Usage of Speech, not only those things are said to be Lawful, which neither Divine nor Human Law forbids, and which therefore may be undertaken without Sin or Blame, but likewise those things which

(1) Nam quæ facta ledunt pietatem, Existimationem, verecundiam nostram, & (ut generaliter dixerim) contra bonos mores sunt: nec facere nos posse credendum est. Dig. l. 28. t. 7. (a) Cicero pro Balb. There are some things which we ought not to do, though we might lawfully do them: But on the other hand, whatever we cannot lawfully do, it's every certain we ought not to do. Liban. Declam. 16. The Law by not commanding me to do a thing, cannot be said to forbid me the doing it.

although prohibited by the Laws of Nature, yet the Laws of particular States so far permit, as not to impose a Penalty on them in Human Cognisance; leaving them to every Man's Private Conscience and Honour. Tully's Observation is admirable to this purpose, It is not lawful (says he) for any Man to sin; but we commit an Error in Speech, whilst we say that such a thing is lawful, which is indeed tolerated or allow'd (a). The former kind of Actions, we may call perfectly lawful, the latter imperfectly.

But farther than this, we sometimes in a very loose Sense, term even those things lawful, which all Men agree and confess to be the most base and vile; whensoever the Person who performs them is Master of so much Strength, as to be too Big for Human Punishment, or Reprehension (b).

III. We call that Action Good Morally (c), or in Moral Estimation, which is agreeable to the Law, and that Action Evil which is disagreeable. In as much as the ratio formalis, the proper and distinguishing Nature of the Goodness or Illness of Actions, consists in a Relation determining them towards a Directive Rule; and this Rule is what we term a Law: (under which Name we here mean a necessitating, and not a permitting Law, and if it be Human we suppose it not contrary to those which are Divine,) For as a design'd Action proceeds from the Rule prescrib'd, and is by it so form'd as exactly to agree with it, it is said to be Good: As it is undertaken against the Prescrib'd Rule, or varies from it, it is call'd Evil, and, in one word, Sin. Now it is plain, that any Directing Rule, for instance the Mariner's Compass, is said to be the Cause of his right Sailing, and of his coming to the Port; not so much in regard that the Ship takes a Course falling in with its Direction, as because the Pilot guides himself by it in managing the Steerage: In like manner, a Law is said to be the Cause of Rectitude in an Action, not when the Action, however intended, is agreeable to it; but when the Action proceeds from the Dictate of the Law, and from some Dependence on it; that is, from an Intention of paying Obedience to its Injunctions. Whence, if a Man by chance, or without thinking of any Obedience to a Law, performs a thing prescrib'd by that Law, he may indeed be said to have done rightly, or not ill, in a Negative rather than in a Positive Sense, but he cannot be said to have done Morally well: No more than one that by discharging a Gun at venture and random hath brought down a Bird, can be said to have shot skillfully, and like a Marks-man.

IV. Farther, since the Law determines either the Disposition of the Agent, or else the Object, or the End or the Circumstances of the Action; an Action is Morally Good or Evil, for one of these Reasons, either because the Agent is so dispos'd as the Law requires him to be, or otherwise; or, because the Action is directed towards the proper Object, with that End and those Circumstances which the Law prescribes, or with the contrary. But here it must be observ'd, that to make an Action Good 'tis necessary, that it not only conform to the Law in all its Material Requisites and Conditions: but likewise, that, in respect of its Formality, it be exercis'd, not out of Ignorance, or any other Cause besides the Intention of paying Obedience to the Law. And therefore an Action, though otherwise on the account of the Matter of it Good, may by reason of the Bad Intention of the Agent, be imputed to him, as Evil. For a Man who designing an ill Thing doth a good one, hath by no means a Title to any Reward for his Service: As he in Valerius Maximus (d), who intending to kill Jason, luckily broke his Imposthume. Upon the same account, he who mispends his lawful Power in ill Service, is guilty of Sin: as a Judge, suppose, who abuseth his Authority of punishing Offenders, to the satisfying his own Private Resentments. For which reason the Carthaginians sentenc'd their Generals to Death, if they had undertaken an Enterprize, though with Good Success, yet with ill Counsel and Design (e). But, on the other side, an Action as to the Matter of it Evil, cannot by Virtue of the Honest Intention of the Agent, be turn'd into Good. Whence the Reason is clear, why a Man cannot use his own Sins as means for the Attainment of any Virtuous End, or why we must not do Evil that Good may come of it (1). For to render an Action Evil, it's sufficient that it be incongruous to the Law, in any one Point or Condition, whether Material or Formal: That is, if either the Disposition of the Agent, or the Object, or the End, or any one of the Circumstances contradict what the Law directs. 'Tis a most vain Distinction of some Men, when they affirm that an Action, as to the Substance of the Work, may be good, although the End required by the Law be not intended by the Agent. For the End makes a main part of the very Essence of a Moral Action; in as much as it enters into the Intention, which is a Principle of the greatest Force in determining the Action's Quality. Hence it is sinful to direct an Action, not only to an Ill End, but likewise to any other End, than what is prescrib'd

(a) Lampridius reports of the Emperour Severus, that he had some thoughts of prohibiting the Publick Professors of Lewdness: But he fear'd this might rather increase Debauchery in Private: Men naturally affecting what is Unlawful, and pursuing with Eagerness and Fury any Practice which hath been forbidden them. (b) Senec. de Clement. l. 1. c. 18. Though we commonly say, All things are lawful towards a Slave, yet there are indeed some things which common Nature forbids us to act towards a Man: one of our own Species and Condition. (c) For the other kind of Goodness, term'd Natural or Material, by which a Thing or an Action tends to the Benefit or Perfection of any one, is explain'd in another place. Though we must observe, that in the Precepts of Natural Law, and in most Civil Constitutions, it goes along with this Moral Goodness, and amongst Rational Creatures, seems to give the first Spring or Occasion to it. See B. I. c. 4. f. 4. and B. II. c. 3. f. 21. (d) L. 1. c. 8. f. 6. Extern. (e) L. 38. c. 48. Val. Max. l. 2. c. 7. f. 1. Extern. (1) Rom. chap. 3. ver. 8.

by the Law (a). Nor is an accomplish'd Fact only, or such as hath obtain'd its End, accounted Wickedness, but even a Commenc'd Enormity: And this latter is by Civil Laws sometimes punish'd with equal, or however with little less, Severity than the former; according as they find it necessary to repress a Villany in its first Rise and Appearance.

V. This Goodness and this Evil of Actions as they consist formally in such an Agreeableness or Disagreeableness to the Law, as we have been speaking of, so they depend entirely on him as their efficient Cause, who performs an Action which the Law either commands or forbids. For his Determination so constitutes the Action in the Rank of Moral Beings, that it must be imputed to him, and to him only. And therefore those Men have tormented themselves with a needless Fear, who, lest they should seem to make GOD Almighty the Author of Sin, have plac'd the ratio formalis of an Evil Action; in the Privation of Conformity to the Law. For though the Position of any Form necessarily infers the Privation or Absence of the contrary Form; yet how mistaken must he be in his Opinion, who would seek for the Essence of a thing in this Privation? Nor will he find himself any great Proficient in Wisdom, who hath arriv'd to know that Streightness is the Privation of Crookedness, and Crookedness the Privation of Streightness. But these Inventions and these Fears of Men, both proceeded from their Ignorance of Moral Things. GOD, the Author of all Natural Beings, need not and ought not to be esteem'd the Author and Cause of all Moral, all Notional and all Artificial Beings. Some loose Thinkers must needs be touch'd with a strange Itch of Wit, when they imagine they have given us an extraordinary Specimen of their Philosophical Subtlety, in numbring GOD amongst the Causes of our sinning. For a Man who hath the least Insight into the Constitution of Morality, will judge nothing more absurd, than to enquire whether or no He be the Cause of an Action, who forbids it by a Law, and punisheth it for being done after his Prohibition. As for GOD's concurring to the Physical part of an Action, he can with no more reason be on this account stil'd the Cause of Sin, than one who hath furnish'd an Artificer with Materials to work upon, can be reckon'd the Cause of a Deformity in his unskilful Work. Wherefore, to the Term or Name of Cause into a Signification so very improper, and so remote from common Sense, is to join our Pride and Ambition, in offering an Irreverence to the Divine Nature (b).

VI. We are, in the next place, to discourse of Justice, concerning which it ought to be our first Observation, that the Signification of this Term as applied to Persons, is very different from that, by which it denotes an Attribute of Actions. For when we use it with regard to Persons, to be Just imports as much as to delight in acting justly, to study after Justice, or to endeavour in every thing to do what is just: And to be Unjust, is to neglect Justice, or to think it should be measur'd, not according as it is really due, but as it suits with present Advantage. So that a Just Man may perform several Unjust Actions, and an Unjust Man several Just Actions. For he is to be esteem'd a Just Person, who doth Just Things in Obedience to the Law, and Unjust Things only through Infirmary, and he an Unjust Person, who doth Just Things in fear of the Punishment annex'd to the Law; and Unjust Things either out of Perverseness and Pravity of Mind, or for the procuring of Glory, or any other seeming Benefit (c). Hence it appears, that the Definition of (1) Justice so much in vogue with the Roman Lawyers, in which they call Tyr. Dissertat. 3. *These dreadful Names, of Furies, Fates, and Destinies, what are they but the specious Pleas and Excuses of Human Wickedness, by the means of which we are wont to charge our own faults upon the Providence of Heaven? Philemon in Stobaeo. Serm. IX.

He is not Just who barely acts no Wrong,
But he who spares when fraught with Power to harm;
Nor will the Conquest of a Puny Lust
Ensure his Triumph; but a Strength of Soul
Fit to sustain th' united Force of Sin,
And foil Temptation in its last Attack.
Solid in Worth, and Generous Honesty,
Nor bent with crooked Guile, nor bribed with Praise,
He courts the Virtue and contemns the Fear.

Architas de Viro bono & beato. As he who hath some time or other been guilty of Immodesty, Injustice, or Timorousness, is not to be reckon'd in the number of Bad Men? so neither is he who hath perform'd some Acts of the opposite Virtues, immediately to be rank'd amongst the Good. But the true Judgment of Persons is to be made, not from any short Period of acting, but from the whole Course and Tenour of Life. Agathias (l. 5.) hath left a very judicious Censure of those People in Constantinople, who upon a terrible Earthquake in the City, had contended with each other in the Performance of Good and Pious Works. All this they did (says he) for a certain Time; so long as the Impression of the Fright was fresh and strong upon their Apprehension. But when the Calamity began to abate, most of them return'd to their former looseness of Practice. Now such a sudden motion of the Mind, such a Fit, as it were of Goodness, cannot be call'd true Justice, or solid and fruitful Piety, such as is wont to be form'd in Men by Right Opinions and Constant Application; but an Unnatural Disguise, an ill-contriv'd Stratagem, a meer Huckstering in Holiness, taken up as a Preservative against the Common Evil. Virtue upon Necessity is just as long liv'd as the Fear that occasions it. (1) Instit. l. 1. tit. 1. Dig. l. 1. tit. 1. f. 10.

it, a Constant and Perpetual Inclination to give every one his Due, belongs to the Justice of Persons, not to that of Actions. And this we take to be very Inconvenient: In as much as the Science of Law is chiefly employ'd about the Justice of Actions, and toucheth on the Justice of Persons only by the by, and in some few Particulars.

VII. The Justice of Actions differs from their Goodness chiefly in this, that Goodness barely denotes a Conformity to the Law, but Justice farther includes a respect to those Persons towards whom the Action is perform'd. So that we apprehend that Action to be Just, which with full Design and Intention is applied to the Person to whom it was due. And therefore Justice, in this Sence, will be nothing else, but the right Application of the Action to the Person. We shall chuse to divide Justice chiefly with regard to the Matter which is owing, or which bears a relation to Another by way of Debt or Due.

But we must observe beforehand, that some Actions may be call'd pure and others mixt. The former are perform'd and finish'd by the Motion of some of our Powers applied in such a certain manner to the Object; of this kind are Honouring, Paying Duty and Respect, Loving, Hating, Comforting, Praising, Dispraising, &c. the Product of all which is nothing else but the causing the Object to be really affected, or to be thought affected by the Action in a certain way, either with Complacency or Dissatisfaction. But the latter, or the Mix'd Actions, are join'd with the transferring of some Advantage or Disadvantage on the Person towards whom they are exercis'd; and therefore their effect consists principally in some Operation, either profiting or hurting another Man in his Person or in his Goods (1). Again, there are some Actions which make a part of Commerce amongst Men, and are valu'd at a certain Rate; others have no Price or Rate impos'd upon them: Concerning which difference, we shall enquire farther hereafter (2). Lastly, We must take notice, that some things are Due to us Perfectly, others Imperfectly. Those things which are due to us in the former manner, if voluntary Payment be not made, we may constrain the Debtor to discharge; if we live in a Natural State; by Arms and main Strength; if we are Members of the same Civil Society; by preferring an Action against him in Courts of Justice. But what is due to us in the latter way, we ought neither to claim by Methods of Hostility, nor to extort by Legal Procefs. It is usual with Authors to express Perfect Right, by the help of the word Suus, as when they say a Man claims such a thing suo jure, By his own Right (3). Now that some things should be thus due to us Perfectly, and others Imperfectly, the reason amongst those who live in a State of Natural Liberty is, the great Diversity of Precepts in Nature's Laws, of which some conduce to the very Being, others only to the well-being of Society: And therefore since there's lets Necessity of Performing these latter than the former, Reason shews that the former may be requir'd and executed by more severe Courses and Means; whereas in regard to the latter, it is meer Folly to apply a Remedy more grievous than the Disease. Besides, there usually passeth between Men some Covenant about the former, but not about the latter; and consequently, since they are left to every Man's Conscience and Modesty, it would be very improper to extort them violently from another, unless in Cases of extraordinary Necessity. In Civil Communities, this difference ariseth from the particular Laws and Constitutions allowing or disallowing an Action in such or such Cases. Though most Commonwealths do in these Points follow the Tract of the Law of Nature; except where they have some particular Reasons advising the contrary.

VIII. When then, we exhibit to another either Actions or Things due to him only by Imperfect Right, or when we exercise towards another Actions not coming under the Head of strict Commerce, we are said to have observ'd General or Universal Justice. As when a Man supplies another with his Counsel, Goods, or Help, as he hath need; or when he performs the Offices of Piety, Reverence, Gratitude, Humanity or Beneficence, towards those to whom he is in Duty bound to pay them. This kind of Justice only enjoins that the Debt be paid, not considering whether the thing given in Payment be equal to the Reason why it is due or not. Thus a Man sufficiently dischargeth the Duty of Gratitude, if he make all the return that his Abilities will allow; though perhaps the Kindness he hath receiv'd were in value much greater.

But when we perform towards Another Actions falling under Commerce, or such as transfer any thing on Another to which he had Perfect Right, this is call'd Particular Justice.

IX. Now this Perfect Right accrues either to single Persons by a Covenant (tacite or express,) made with some Society, in order to their being admitted Members of it; or to a Society by a Covenant made with single Persons, in order to the receiving them into the same Community: Or, lastly, from (4) Pacts made between any Parties concerning Things or Actions falling under Commerce. When we pay those things which are due upon the Pact of a Society with a Member, or of a Member with a Society, upon the accounts just now specified, we are said to exercise Distributive Justice. For whenever a Man is receiv'd into a Society, a Pact is either expressly, or at least tacitely, made between the Society and the Member now to be introduc'd, by which the Society engageth to give him a just Share and Proportion of the Goods which it enjoys as a Common Body; and the Member promiseth, that he will bear his proper and equal part of those Burthens which conduce to the Preservation of the Society, consider'd as such. The exact Determination of the proper share of Goods to be assign'd to the Member, is made according to the Rule and Value of the Pains or Charges employ'd by him, towards preserving the Common Society, in Proportion to the Pains or Charges contributed by the other Members. On the other hand, the Determination of the proper Share of Burthens to be laid on the Member, is made according to the Value of the Benefits receiv'd by him from the Society, consider'd in proportion to the Advantages which the rest of the Members enjoy. Hence, since it generally happens, that one Member contributes more towards the Preservation of the Society than another, and that one likewise exceeds another in deriving Advantage from it, the reason is very apparent why, upon the supposal of Many Persons, and of this Inequality amongst them, we ought in the Exercise of Distributive Justice, to observe a Comparative Equality: Which consists in this, that what Proportion the Merits of one Person bear to the Merits of another, such Proportion shall his Reward bear to the others Reward (a). Thus, for Instance, if Six Things of the same Value are to be Distributed amongst Caius, Seius, and Titius, upon Supposition, that Titius exceeds Caius in a triple Proportion, and Seius in a double, Titius shall have three, Seius two, and Caius one. Nor is it Requisite to this Equality, that the Reward fully answer and come up to the Merits of the Person; but 'tis sufficient, that what Proportion the Service of the one bears to the Service of the other, the same Proportion there should be between their Shares of the Common Benefits. And the same Rule must be follow'd in distributing Burthens.

As for what Mr. Hobbs (b) alledgeth, to overthrow this Respective Equality, that I may of my own Goods distribute least to him that deserves most, and most to him that deserves least, provided I Pay but for what I Bargain'd for; and useth the Authority of our Saviour in the XX. of St. Matthew, v. 13, &c. to confirm his Opinion: All this if rightly consider'd, makes nothing to the purpose. For in the place of Scripture above-cited, it is shewn indeed, that he doth not offend against Commutative Justice (which governs the Contracts about Hire, &c.) who out of his Liberality gives to some a larger Reward than their Service deserves; or who,

to the Wages due upon this Commutative Justice adds something out of free Bounty, which is comprehended under Universal Justice. But how doth this Affect our Distributing Justice, the Business of which is nothing else, but to assign to many Persons their proper Shares of a thing, to which all of them have a Perfect, though (in regard to the Quantity) an Unequal Right? And then as for the Word Distributing, which occurs in the Instance alledg'd from Scripture, this doth not in the least make the Act fall under Justice, strictly call'd Distributive; but only hints, that the Labourers were Many, to every one of whom their Wages were to be paid according to Commutative Justice (1).

To clear the Doubts rais'd on this Head by Grotius, in his first Book and first Chapter, we need only observe, that his (2) Expletive Justice doth not exactly come up to Commutative, nor his Attributive to Distributive; and that his Division is not founded on the same Bottom as ours. For ours is chiefly taken from the Matter which is owing, and from the Cause of owing it; but his from the Manner and the Degree in which a thing is ow'd. Whence the Reason is evident why the parting of Gain in Contracts of Societies, is by him referr'd to Expletive, and by us to Distributive Justice. The observing of (3) Geometrical Proportion in these Cases, is indeed only Accidental; since 'tis not necessary, that the Members should have contributed unequal Shares, but they might as well have contributed equally, and then in parting the Gains a simple or strict Equality must have been follow'd. As for that Case stated by Grotius, If one Man only be found fit for a Publick Office, his Reward shall be assign'd him according to Simple, or Arithmetical Proportion; it must be farther enquir'd, whether the Man had a Perfect or Imperfect Right to this Office. If the latter, the Case will then belong to Universal Justice: if the former, we agree to Grotius's Remark, that Species of Proportion call'd Geometrical, is though generally, yet not always follow'd in Distributive Justice. Nor have we taken the difference of our two kinds of Justice from their making use of a different Proportion. And so, for the other Instances of Grotius, the assigning of Legacies belongs not to Distributive Justice, but to Universal: And when a City or State repays out of the Common Stock, what some particular Members have expended on the Publick Account, Commutative Justice is exercis'd, and not Distributive. Because the Reason of the Debt ariseth, not from that Pa&t by which the Society first admitted the said Members,

(a) For as Philo Judæus, l. 2. p. 640. Ed. Genev. (de Monarch;) observes, 'tis high Inequality to give equal Honours to those who are not equal in Merit. Arrian. Epictet. l. 3. c. 17. This is a settled Law of Nature, that he who is more excellent, should on that very account, have a larger share of Good Things, than he who is less. (b) De Cive, 3. l. 6.

(1) Hobbs gives another Example, See the next Section. (2) Our Author will Explain and Examine more largely this Definition of Grotius in Section the XI. of this Book. (3) To understand what Geometrical Proportion is, the best way is to give an Example of it. When I say then, Six is to Two, as Twelve is to Four, there is a Geometrical Proportion; because, Two is as often found in the number Six, as Four is found in the number Twelve.

but from a particular and a very different Contract.

X. When we exhibit to another Things or Actions due upon Reciprocal Pact, and coming into Commerce, this is call'd Commutative Justice. And since Pacts of that kind tend to this Issue, that for a Thing or Action of my own falling under Commerce, I receive from another an Equivalent Thing or Action, at least such as I esteem Equivalent; the Reason is hence obvious, why in this Species of Justice a simple Equality is requir'd which we commonly call (1) Arithmetical Proportion, but that the strict Mathematicians will allow it that Title we dare not engage (a). The Thing or Action then, coming in Commerce to another, ought to be answer'd by somewhat exactly of the same Value in Moral Estimation. For, the Objection of Mr. Hobbs (b) that if we sell our own Goods at the highest Price that can be, we do no Injury to the Buyer, who inclin'd and consented to the Bargain, shall be examin'd at large hereafter (2). As for Vindicative Justice, which according to our Notion constitutes a particular Species, it will be Consider'd in a more convenient Place (3).

XI. It may be worth our while to take farther Notice of (4) Grotius's Opinion concerning Justice, which he, neglecting the usual Distinction of General and Particular, divides into Expletive and Attributive. This difference is founded on the Diversity of that Right which one Man hath to receive any thing from another, which, as we have already observ'd, is either Perfect or Imperfect; the latter being also term'd Amplitude in Opposition to strict Right. Therefore an Act belongs to Expletive Justice, when we render that to another which is due to him by a Perfect Right; but to Attributive Justice, when we render that which is due to him only by an Imperfect Right. Now the Reason of these two Appellations of Justice seems to be this; whatsoever is due to me by Perfect Right, is conceiv'd to be already in some measure my own, and consequently so long as it is withheld, somewhat of my own is suppos'd to be wanting. (Thus even Names and Titles are reckon'd part of our Patrimony, and may pass in Payment to others.) So that if a Man pays me what is my Due by a Perfect Right, he gives me no new thing, but only fills up the place of a thing which before was absent, and which in the mean time was supplied by an Action. For Example, a Man who hath borrow'd a Book out of my Study, when he restores it, doth not properly increase my Study, but only fills up a place made empty on his account. But such things as I have only an Imperfect Right to receive, I cannot reckon my own, nor put them into my Patrimony; since they depend entirely on the Modesty and common Honesty of another Man, who may not, by any violent means, be compell'd to pay them. And therefore 'twould be ridiculous, if a Beggar, for Instance, should make over to a Shoe-maker for the price of a Pair of Shoes, an Alms which he expects to receive from some Rich Person. Thus then, he who renders to another any thing due by Imperfect Right, doth properly attribute, give or add to him somewhat which he could not before call his own. For this Reason Grotius calls Attributive Justice the Companion of those Virtues which tend to the Benefit and Advantage of others, as Liberality, Mercy, Humanity, and the like. For these Dues Men receive only by Imperfect Right. When he adds to these, Providentia rectorix, or State-Providence, he is, in our Judgment chiefly to be understood of the Distribution of those Rewards, to which the Subjects have only an Imperfect Right; in which though a greater Liberty may be taken than in giving those which are due upon Contract, yet it would be perhaps most adviseable to proportion every Man's Share to his Merits, as the surest way to prevent Strifes and Complaints (c).

Why Grotius forbore the use of the Common Aristotelian Terms, he himself gives this Reason: because the Word συμβαλληκη doth not come up to the full import of Expletive; for, that he who is possess'd of my Goods should restore them again, doth not proceed from any συμβαλληκη or Commutative Contract, and yet it belongs to Expletive Justice: that is, though I have a Perfect Right of retrieving what is my own' from any Possessor, yet my Action is not founded upon any Contract made between us about the Restitution; but 'tis sufficient to my purpose, if I can prove my self to be the true Master and Proprietor of the thing thus withheld. It is clear then, that there may be an Act of Expletive Justice, without any συμβαλληκη or Contract. Neither doth the other Term δωρεα fully answer that of Attributive; because it supposeth a necessity of many Persons amongst whom the Distribution is to be made. But now attributive Justice may be exercis'd towards a single Person, when he alone is fit to receive such an Honour or such a Reward.

XII. Aristotle's Opinion concerning the Species of Justice, as far as we can apprehend, seems to be this. General Justice, which He (d) calls the Universal Exercise of Virtue towards others, is a Duty which belongs to all

(1) See l. 12. (a) Yet Plutarch (de Amore Fraternali) useth the Phrase in this Vulgar Sense. (b) De Civitate, c. 3. f. 6. (2) See B. V. c. 3. (3) See B. VIII. c. 3. (4) L. I. c. 1. § 8. (c) Thus Isocrates (Areopagit.) p. 247, 248. Ed. Paris. observes of the old Athenian Ministers, One thing which prov'd of great advantage to them in the Management of the Commonwealth was this; that whereas there are two sorts of Equality, one which gives exactly the same Portion to each Man, and another which proportions Mens Shares to their particular Merits, they were not ignorant which of these two was most Beneficial to a State: But rejecting that as unjust, which deals out the same Allotment to Good and Bad Men without Distinction, they chose the other which assigns Honours and Rewards according as every Man deserves, for the surest Guide of their Proceedings. (d) Ethic. l. 5. c. 5.

Men. Particular Justice he divides into three kinds. First Distributive, which takes in the Partition of Honours or Money, or other things capable of being divided amongst the Members of the same State. Secondly Corrective, which consists in rectifying Commutations: And of these some are voluntary, others Involuntary. The former are made without Consent, as Buying and Selling, Hiring and Letting to Hire, in Loans, Usury, and Suretyship. The latter consist in (1) Crimes, when Men are forc'd to a Commutation against their Wills: For instance, when my Goods pass to a Thief; for then there ariseth an Inequality, he having more, and I less than we ought. The Correction then of this Inequality is made by taking from him what he had above his Due, and restoring it to me. Thus, suppose a Man, by the Fraud of the Seller, gives nine Shillings for a thing that's worth but Six; three Shillings are to be taken from the Seller and given to the Buyer, to make an Equality. Now between these Numbers 3, 6, 9, there is properly an Arithmetical Proportion, the third Number exceeding the second just as much as the second exceeds the first (a). These two kinds of Justice belong properly and principally to those who bear some High Command in a State. For 'tis the Duty and Office of such, and not of private Persons, to distribute the Publick Goods amongst the particular Members; and to correct the Inequalities which arise either in Contracts or Crimes, by reducing them to a Parity (b).

The third Species of Justice assign'd by Aristotle is Retaliation, which serves to regulate the Commutations made between Man and Man, by comparing things that are different and unequal, and reducing them to a Geometrical Proportion. To give an Instance, were a pair of Shoes to be exchange'd for a Horse, the Question would be how many times the Price of the Horse contains the Price of the Shoes, which supposing to be twelve times, the Rule of Retaliating or compensating is, that twelve Pair of Shoes be given for one Horse (c). And this Species of Justice belongs as well to Men of Private as of Publick Capacities. As for our former Remark, that the other Species assign'd by Aristotle concern'd principally the Magistrates and Judges; this will be easily granted by any who take a closer view of his Moral Works: For they will find that in ranging and marshalling the Virtues, he had always in his Head the Idea of some Grecian State; in which time all the Subjects had not the same Duties to perform, 'tis no wonder that he hath given us some Virtues applicable only to Men of particular Quality and Degree.

XIII. Mr. Hobbs (d) hath advanc'd one single Notion of Justice to comprehend every kind;

making it nothing else but a keeping of Faith, and fulfilling of Covenants; which Opinion he borrow'd from Epicurus (e). Commutative Justice, he says, takes place in Contracts, as in Buying and Selling, Hiring and Letting to Hire, Lending and Borrowing, Exchanging, Bartering and the like. Distributive Justice, (tho' improperly so call'd) is, he says, the Justice of an Arbitrator, when being trusted by them who make him Arbitrator, if he perform his trust, he is said, to distribute to every Man his own. Nor will he allow any other Equality to be observ'd but this, that since we are all equal by Nature, one Man ought not to arrogate to himself more Right than he allows another, unless he hath obtain'd a greater Right than ordinary, by the Intervention of Covenants. Farther, since according to his Sentiments, an Injury or an Unjust Action, or Omission, is nothing else but the Violation of a Covenant; he hence infers, that we cannot offer an Injury to a Man, unless we have before Covenanted with him. This Assertion is founded on his old Maxim, of the Right of every Man to all things, which he hath stretch'd far beyond its just Limits; so that he imagines, before any Covenant is made, by which one Man might transfer his Right to another; every Man hath a Right of doing to others what he pleaseth; and thus, only using his Right, he cannot be said to commit an Injury (f). But we shall by and by (2) shew, that this Right of every Man to all things can be extended to no farther Sense than this, that Nature allows a Man to use all such means as Reason shall judge conducive to his firm and lasting Preservation: As indeed Mr. Hobbs himself, in his Definition of Right (3), inserts the Use of Reason. But now sound Reason will never advise us, out of our own Pleasure and Humour to put such Affronts on another, as cannot but provoke him to War, or to a Reciprocal Desire of hurting us. Besides it implies a manifest Contradiction to say, that upon the Supposal of many Men equal in Rights, each of them hath a Right to all things; since the Right of one Man to all things, if it hath any effect, must extinguish the Rights of the rest; and if the Right hath no effect upon the others, it is useless, absurd, and ridiculous; For in Moral Account, not to be, and not to be effectual are much the same. And indeed, how can we call that a Right, which another may oppose with an equal Right? Who would say, I had the Right of commanding a Man, if he by the same Right might despise my Orders? Or, that I had the Right of beating another, when he too had a Right of turning my Blows, and if he pleas'd, with Advantage and Increase? 'Tis certain therefore, that he that doth these things to another, hath no Right of doing them, and consequently is injurious. On the contrary, the other Party hath a Right that such things should not be put upon him, and is therefore injur'd. Thus we see, that such Right as being violated produceth an Injury, is not only acquir'd by Covenant, but was given at first by Nature, without the Intervention of any Human Act: And so the Assertion, that an Injury can be done to no Man unless we have transfer'd something on him by Covenant or Gift, is false and unreasonable.

(1) By Crimes we understand all sorts of Injury done to Another. (a) Vid. Felden ad Grot. l. 1. c. 1. f. 8.

The other Position of Mr. Hobbs (1), that Justice as well as Property owes its Original to Civil Constitutions, we shall hereafter consider and refute.

Indeed so far is it from being rational to resolve all Justice into Performance of Covenants, that on the contrary, before we can know whether any Covenant is to be perform'd, we ought to be certain that it was entered upon, either by the Command, or with the Permission of the Laws of Nature; that is, that it was justly made (a).

From what hath been here offer'd it is farther evident, that although otherwise Damage and Injury are very different things, and though it be possible that the Injury of an Action may redound to one Man, and the Damage to another; yet the Inference which Mr. Hobbs draws from this Consideration will not hold, that a bare Damage and not an Injury is done to him, who is either hurt or hath somewhat taken from him, by a Man with whom he had pass'd no Covenant. Nor do the Instances which he brings to countenance this Conjecture, make very much to the purpose (2). When the Master, says he, commands his Servant to give Money, or to do a kindness to a third Person; if it be omitted, the Injury is done to the Master, but the Damage to the third Person. But indeed, if the Servant does not pay the Money which is due as he is order'd, the Creditor shall suffer no Damage, since his Action remains good against the Master. Nor, if a Servant being commanded to do a kindness to another Man, fails in performing it, shall the other Man incur any Damage (b). For, besides that from the not receiving of a Kindness which is not strictly due, Damage properly so call'd cannot arise (c), the other Person may complain to the Master, who will be sure to compel the Servant to his Duty. And though we suppose the Servant to have been never so far from doing an Injury to the third Person, yet for all this, 'tis certain he did not what by Right he ought to have done; because he affords the other Man sufficient grounds of a Complaint against him. His other Instance Mr. Hobbs thus proposeth in his Leviathan (3), Private Men may remit to one another their Debts, but not Robberies, or other Violences whereby they are endamag'd:

Because the detaining of a Debt is an Injury only to themselves, but Robbery and Violence are Injuries to the Person of the Commonwealth. Which we are willing enough to admit, provided he will not hence infer, that in Crimes, an Injury is not likewise done to the particular Person who is hurt. But as he proposeth the same in his Book de Cive (4), it is by no means to be endur'd. He says, that in a State, if any one hurts another, with whom he hath not covenanted, he damageth the Party on whom he brings the Evil, but he doth an Injury only to him who holds the Sovereign Power in the State. For, if one of my Fellow Subjects hurts me by Violence, doth he offer an Injury to the King only and not to me? Or suppose we should grant, as Mr. Hobbs desires, that when Men live in a Natural Liberty, each of them hath a Right to all things, yet will this hold good amongst the Members of the same Republick, who own one Common Master? As to what he subjoins, that if the Person who receiv'd the Damage, should accuse the other of injuring him, he would be answer'd in this manner, what are you to me? why should I act according to your Pleasure, rather than my own since I don't hinder you from acting by your own Will rather than by mine? 'Tis so far from being true, that if no particular Covenants have interven'd, this way of speaking will not be free from Reprehension, that we should rather imagine a Man to be out of his Senses, who should hope by such a way of arguing to satisfy the Complaints of one whom he had hurt. Yet one thing Mr. Hobbs hath well remark'd, that the Term of Injustice signifies with reference to the Law, but the Term of Injury with reference both to the Law, and to the particular Person. For, when an Unjust thing is done, all may call that unjust, or it is unjust to all. But an Injury may have been done, not to me, or to him, but to a third Person, and sometimes to no private Subject, but to the State only; as when a Man is kill'd in a Duel, for Instance, upon a fair Challenge. For in this Case, the Party who receiv'd the Hurt cannot complain of having an Injury done him, since he himself agreed to the Chance of the Unlawful Combat: But the Legislator may, however, prosecute the Survivor for transgressing his Prohibition.

XIV. Having arriv'd to know what Justice is, we may easily settle our Notions of Injustice, and of its several Species. An Action then, is Unjust, either when we apply it designedly, to a Person to whom we ow'd a different Action, or when we deny another somewhat which was really his due. That is, we are equally guilty of a Breach of Justice, by doing any Evil to another which we had no Right to do, and by taking from another, or denying him any Good which he had a fair Title to require. For good things are of that Nature, that they may be given to any Man without a Reason, provided a Third Person is not defrauded thereby: And the Evils likewise which a Man hath merited, we may without Injury withhold from him, if at the same time we do not endamage others by our Forbearance. An unjust Action therefore, either brings upon another Man what it ought not to bring upon him, or denies and withholds what it ought to give him. For the Denial or Omission of an Action, is in Moral Account, it self an Action.

XV. But an Unjust Action proceeding from Intention, and trespassing on the perfect Right of another, is in one Word call'd Injury. Which if we would exactly state, we must again observe, that a Man may be hurt Three ways: either, if he be denied what he ought to have (a), or if that which he now hath for his own be taken from him, or if some Evil be put on him by another, who had no just Right of doing it. As to the first of these ways, things may be said to be due to a Man, either by the bare Law of Nature, yet so as that he hath no perfect Right to them; of which kind, are the Offices of Humanity, Beneficence and Gratitude: Or else by Covenant, and that either such as is express and particular, or such as is contain'd under our Obligation to Civil Laws, by which we engage our selves to perform those things towards others, which the Laws command us to exhibit. If things of the latter kind are denied a Man, an Injury is properly done; but there is no proper Injury in the Denial of things which belong to the former kind; though there be a Sin indeed committed against the Law of Nature. Yet neither doth the Law of Nature it self allow of compelling another by Violence to pay these Duties, (especially if the compelling Party have no Power and Authority over the other;) unless upon urgent Necessity: Since the Nature and Property of those Offices requires that they be perform'd voluntarily, and without the Motive of Fear. Thus far therefore, and no farther, will the Maxim of Mr. Hobbs hold true, That an Injury cannot be done, but to a Man with whom a Covenant hath been made. But when we studiously and industriously bring an Evil on another Man, unconsenting and unprovoking, either by taking from him any Good which he possesseth, or by positively inflicting on him an Evil; in these Cases an Injury is always done, whether a Covenant hath interven'd or not. For Nature hath given this Right to every Man, that no Evil be offer'd him from another Man without his own preceding Demerit: Nor is it allowable for any Person, unless when provok'd to hurt another, any further than the due Exercise of Government shall require (b).

XVI. In an Injury, properly so call'd, it is farther requir'd, that it proceed from Intention and deliberate design of hurting or vexing another. And therefore the harm which is done casually in Ignorance and unwillingly, is not us'd to come under the Name of Injury. As suppose a Soldier that is exercising himself, in the usual Place, at casting his Javelin, should strike it through a Man that pass'd by accidentally: Or, if a Lopper of Trees should let fall a Bough upon a Person who had no Right to be in that Place (c).

Aristotle (d) tells us, That the doing of a thing justly or unjustly depends on its being done voluntarily or involuntarily. And again, that when we do a Hurt beside Reason, it is only a Misfortune; but when we do a Hurt which is not beside Reason, and yet not out of Malice, then we commit an ἄδικημα, or Trespass; on which place Michael of Ephesus thus comments. Of Hurts, some are done out of Ignorance and against our Wills, others with our Knowledge and Consent. Those which are done out of Ignorance, are again divided into such as are done without any Likelihood and beside all Expectation, and such as are done, though involuntarily, yet not beside all Expectation and Probability. Therefore after the Philosopher hath said, that all Hurts proceeding from Ignorance fall under the general Name of Errors or Trespases, he then makes a kind of Subdivision, and tells us, that those which are done beside Reason are Misfortunes, and those which are done not beside Reason, are properly Trespases. Now those things are beside Reason, which happen very rarely and unexpectedly; as if a Man by suddenly thrusting open a Door, should strike his Father, who stood accidentally behind it; or if, whilst he is exercising himself at his Javelin in a place through which none are wont to pass, he wounds some body who happen'd to come by when the Weapon was flying. For these, and such like Accidents, fall out beyond all Thought and Expectation. But Actions done indeed ignorantly, but not beside Likelihood or Probability, are call'd Trespases. For, Man who exercising his Bow and Arrows in a Place commonly frequented, strikes any Person, doth properly trespass; as a Man is then always said to do, when he himself was the Principle and Cause of the Unluckiness of the Action: But now the Man whom we speak of, was no doubt the Principle and Cause of what

(a) Marc. Anton. l. 9. f. 5. It often happens that there may be Injustice in the not doing of a thing, as well as in the doing.

(b) We add unless provok'd, because to make an Action properly Injurious, there is requir'd the τὸ ἀπορέειν, that it be done first: For Aristotle, Eth. Nicom. l. 5. c. 15. tells us, that he who returns another what he first suffer'd from him, cannot be said to do an Injury.

(c) So Antiphon, Orat. 7. p. 56. Edit. Hanov. defends the Soldier who had unfortunately kill'd a Youth with a Cast of his Javelin: He was engag'd, says he, in no forbidden Exercise, but in his proper and necessary Business; nor by himself, but with his Companions in Arms: Nor did he strike the Youth by an unskillful Throw, at a distance from the Mark: but he guided the Weapon with exact Art and Care, and was so far from doing any thing amiss, that he rather suffer'd, in having his Throw spoil'd, and in being hindred from hitting what he so well aim'd at.

(d) Ethic. l. 5. c. 10.

he did, since he voluntarily chose such a place to shoot in, where it was probable some body or other would pass by.

An ἄμειπμα or Trespass of this Nature, is what the Civilians properly term Culpa, or a Fault; which they say is committed through Negligence or Unskilfulness, when a Man is either careless or ignorant of such things as he ought, and was able, to have known, and to have observ'd. Of Faults they make three Degrees, answerable to the Degrees of Diligence, by the Omission of which the Fault is contracted. First then, there is a General Diligence of all Men, not work'd out by Labour and Wit, but deriv'd, as it were, from common Sense. Next to this, there is a Diligence more improv'd, proper to every Man in his own Affairs; and which is requir'd by Nature in the Management of Human Life, according to each Person's Capacity and Parts. Lastly, there is a Diligence of the greatest Exactness and Accuracy, us'd only by the most knowing and experienc'd Men in their own Business and Concerns. To this last kind of Diligence they oppose their Culpa levissima, to the second, their Culpa levis, and to the first, their Culpa lata. As to this Culpa lata, they observe, that it is equivalent to Malice and Deceit, in Contracts and other Civil Business, and in Cases of Reparation for Damages: But that in Criminal Matters it bears not so hard an Interpretation; where however it doth not take away, but only extenuate the Guilt. The Effects of the Culpa levis and Culpa levissima they shew at large, when they treat about Performances of Contracts.

The Trespases we have hitherto spoken of, are suppos'd to be done without Intention. But now if a Man through the Violence of his Passions, and only with an Imperfect or Semiplenary Intention is driven to hurt another, this Hurt shall not be exempted from the Name of Injury, altho' the Man be not immediately for such a Fact, branded with the Character and Style of Unjust. Aristotle's Distinction is excellent in this Case, An ill thing, says he, done with Knowledge, but without Deliberation, is unjustly done; such are the Effects of Anger and of other Natural and Necessary Passions. For Persons who offend on such accounts, commit Injustice indeed; yet they are not for this Reason accounted Unjust and Wicked Men, because the Hurt did not proceed from any meditated Malice. But when a Man hurts another out of Choice and Design, then only he incurs the Name of Unjust and Wicked. Hence Facts proceeding from Anger, are always interpreted as done unadvisedly; for the Principle and Cause of such Mischances, is not the angry Person, but he who provok'd him to Anger.

XVII. Lastly, It is requisite to the making an Action properly Injurious, that it be done to a Person against his Will. For 'tis a Maxim in every Man's Mouth, that volenti non fit injuria, Nothing can be an Injury when the Party is willing to receive it (a). The reason of which is, that both the Good which I take from a Man, and the Debt which I withhold from him, with his Consent, are, as it were, Gifts from him to me: But now who will say I do an Injury, by taking what is given me? Nor can that be esteem'd Evil, which a Man desires to receive; since all Evil necessarily includes an Abhorrency of the Will from embracing it. But then it must be suppos'd, that the Man enjoys the full use of his Reason, and is not transported with the Violence of any extravagant Affection (b). Hence Aristotle (c) gathers, that a Man who in a Passion lays violent hands on himself, doth an Injury not to himself, but to the State; which he robs either of a General, or a Soldier, or an Artificer, or the like, according as his Station was. Upon which account it hath been a Custom in most Commonwealths, to punish such Offenders even after their Death, by affixing some Mark of Disgrace on their Bodies, and on their Memory (d).

(a) Arist. Ethic. l. 5. c. 11. A Man with his own free Consent may be Hurt, or may suffer things which are in themselves Unjust; but he cannot properly be injur'd, except it be against his Will. See Dig. l. 50. tit. 17. De divers. reg. Juris. Nemo videtur fraudare eos, qui sciunt & consentiunt. (b) Add. Ant. Matth. de Crimin. Proleg. c. 3. f. 2, 3. Mr. Hobbs's Definition which he gives in his Book de Cive, c. 3. f. 7. is founded upon a wrong Supposition, that Injury consists in nothing but the Violation of a Covenant. (c) Ethic. l. 5. c. 15. (d) Add. Mich. Ephes. ad loc. dictum. Though Aristotle's Reasoning in that place, (the Law commands not a Man to kill himself; but what it doth not command it forbids;) is false and absurd; unless we say, that by κλέβει commands, he rather means permits.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Quantity of MORAL ACTIONS.

HAVING done with the Quality, it comes next in our way, to say something of the Quantity of Moral Actions; or to consider on what account they fall under different Rates and Measures. Now we find the Voluntary Deeds of Men to be Capable of undergoing a double Measure or Valuation, either absolutely in themselves or relatively towards one another. As to the absolute Estimate, the Case is very different in Good and in Evil Actions. For in a good Action, if we consider it formally and precisely, we discover nothing which bears any Analogy to Quantity: Since the Goodness of it consists only in an Agreeableness or Conformity to the Law, which doth not appear capable of Measure. Hence

Hence good Actions consider'd, as we said, precisely as to their Form, are not better one than the other; though they surpass each other in Excellence as to their Matter, with regard to the Condition of the Object, and to the Intensity or Strictness of the Obligation. But now, an Evil Action, as declining from the Legal Rule, is conceiv'd to bear a greater or a less distance from it; and on that account, may, even consider'd formally and in it self, be esteem'd greater or less: In the same manner as one crooked Line may recede farther from a Right Line, than another doth. For Zeno's Argument, in Diogenes Laertius (a), is not worth confuting: All Sins, says he, are Equal; for as nothing is truer than Truth, nor falser than Falsity, so neither can Deceit be greater than Deceit, nor Sin than Sin. As he that is an hundred Furlongs from CANOPUS, and he who is only one Furlong distant from the same City, may be said both alike not to be at CANOPUS; so he that sins less and he that sins more, are both at an equal distance from doing well.

II. Farther, since to the Goodness of an Action it is requisite, not only that what the Law commands be fully done, but likewise, that it be done with such Intention as is agreeable to the same Law; it appears hence, that to make an Action be esteem'd perfectly Good, there is a Necessity, not only that the Prescription of the Law be answer'd in all its Parts; but besides, that the only thing which prevail'd on the Mind of the Agent, and put him on such a Proceeding, was a Desire of paying ready Obedience to the Legislator. And for this reason, since we are, in the Divine Law, commanded to love God, with all our Hearts, and with all our Souls, and with all our Strength; and our Neighbour as our selves (1); 'tis manifest, that no Action can be approv'd by God Almighty as entirely Good, but such an one as was undertaken with the fullest Intention, and in which the Agent propos'd nothing else to himself, but a Compliance with the Pleasure of his Creator. Especially, since the Divine Searcher of Hearts cannot but discover the least wavering in our Resolutions, and the smallest Obliquity in our Designs. Whoever considers this Point as he ought, will find in himself but very little Inclination to boast of his Uprightness towards God.

III. But in human Account, so exact a Diligence is not requir'd. For since our Earthly Lawgivers propose as the chief end of their Constitutions the Benefit of their Subject, which commonly proceed from the outward Performance and Exercise of the Actions, whatever the Intention of the Actor may be; hence they are usually satisfied, if the exterior Action be conformable to their Injunctions. And so much the rather, because they are unable to dive into the Recesses of Mens Minds, nor can at all understand the Intention of any Agent, but by Conjectures and by Signs obvious to their Senses, which are by no means infallible Guides, in discovering our inward Sentiments and Purposes. Therefore they value Good Actions only as they appear to Sense, or so far as the Reach and Condition of Human Sagacity and the Use of Civil Life do admit or require; and are not very solicitous how full or sincere the Intention of the Agent was, provided his exterior Work deserve their Approbation. Yet in Evil Actions, even amongst Human Judges, more regard is had to the Intention. And where this shall appear to have been absolutely wanting, as happens in things done upon invincible Ignorance or Error, the Action shall be accounted involuntary: and such an Action as it is not usually imputed to the Agent, so is it conceiv'd to be destitute of all Moral Quantity. But otherwise, an Evil Action undertaken upon Knowledge and Deliberation, as it proceeds from a former and fuller Design. And since an Ill Intention is to Mortal Judges scarce more evident than a Good one, by reason of their Incapacity to search into the Heart; they are us'd to settle this point by the help of various Indications and Conjectures, which we shall elsewhere explain at large (2).

IV. With regard to the Matter of Moral Actions, that Good Action is esteem'd Perfect in its kind, which hath attain'd its utmost Complement, or to which no part is wanting that it ought to have. Those which decline this Perfection are reckon'd Inferiour in a greater or less degree, according to their Distance from it; whether the Cause of this Defect be, that the Action was destitute of some part which should have made it compleat, or that it was only attempted and not actually perform'd. On the other hand, of Evil Actions, that is reckon'd the worst in its kind, which hath fully arriv'd at the end propos'd; and every one is less Evil, according as it falls shorter of this final Completion.

And here we must observe a twofold difference in the Objects (3) of Actions, as set down in Laws. For some admit of a Division, others do not: or, to speak more plainly, some are so constituted, that when we exercise an Action about them, we must either entirely perform, or entirely omit them, or do what's directly contrary to them: But in others, it is possible to perform some one part only, and to omit the rest; or something may be done which is opposite to them not directly, but in an inferior Degree. We may likewise consider Objects under a second Distinction. For some of them contain things into which they may be divided as into so many Species. Thus the Affirmative Law of the sixth Commandment enjoining us to succour our Neighbour in all Necessities and Distresses of his Body, con-

(a) L. 8. See Cicero. Paradox. c. 3. (1) Mark XII. 30, 31. (2) See B. 8. c. 3. f. 19, 20. (3) Our Author must mean the Matter of Actions, for the Object of Actions is not a thing order'd or prohibited, but it is the Person, with respect to whom we do, or do not any thing. And so our Author understands this Term in the next Paragraph.

tains under it in the manner of different Species, the Preservation of his Life, of his Members, of his Health, the turning away of any thing that doth or may grieve, or molest him, the supplying him with Food in time of Famine, &c. And the Opposite or Negative Law, in the same Commandment, forbidding us to hurt the Body of our Neighbour, comprehends, in like manner, Murther, Maiming, Wounds, Stripes, Threats (a), &c.

Thus too the Affirmative Law, in the Seventh Commandment, enjoining Chastity, contains under it, Purity of Thoughts, Modesty of Words and Gestures, Abstinence from unlawful Love, &c. And the opposite Law forbidding Unchastity, comprehends Adultery, Fornication, obscene Speeches and Gestures, and impure Imaginations. For, to give an Instance in this case, obscene Words do not respect Adultery in the way of a Part or Degree: But because the Divine Lawgiver was pleas'd, for Brevity sake, to comprehend many Special Acts under one General Law, hence it comes to pass, that he who commits simple Fornication, doth as fully and entirely sin against the Seventh Commandment, as he that is guilty of Adultery. Therefore, as to these Objects, when what the Law commands is not perform'd, we must of Necessity either quite omit or do directly the contrary. But other Objects of Actions, as determin'd in Laws, are in such a manner divisible, that they seem to consist of Integral Parts. So that here it is not necessary we should do all, or omit all, or perform the contrary, but 'tis possible to perform one part, and to let the rest alone. For Example, the Law commands me to pay the Labourer his full Hire; now I may perhaps pay him some part of it, and keep back the rest. But when I not only deny a Man his Due, but farther take something from him, or bring any Evil upon him, this Act will be quite of another Species, and bear no Reference or Affinity to the former.

V. Besides all this, since one may be concern'd about a more Noble, another about a more Ignoble Object; and since one may produce more Good or Evil than another; it is plain, that upon this account likewise, amongst Good Actions some are far better than others, and amongst Ill Actions, some far worse than others. Horace's (b) Instance may serve to illustrate this Truth;

Qui teneros caules alieni fregerit horti,
Et qui nocturnus divum sacra legerit.—*

Reason will never call't an Equal Sin,
To rob an Orchard and a Sacred Shrine (c).

(a) Vid. l. 47. t. 10. D. de Injuriis. (b) B. l. Sat. 3. v. 115, 116, 117. (c) Add. Cicero pro Muræna: Where he smartly refutes the Stoicks Notion, that All Sins are Equal. Yet in many Cases, Horace's Reasoning will hold good, L. 1. Epist. 15.

— *De mille fabæ modis quum surripis unum,
Dammum est non facinus pacto mihi lenius isto.*

When from a Thousand Pecks you steal but one,
Less Loss is felt, but no less Guilt is shown.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Imputation of MORAL ACTIONS.

WHAT Conditions are required to make an Action capable of being imputed, or of being consider'd as really belonging to a Person, we have formerly shown at large: It remains, that we see how and by what means it may be actually imputed, so as to produce some Moral Effect either in the Agent, or in some other Man. And here we must first of all distinguish between those Actions which are directed by Law, and those which are left to every Man's free Pleasure. Actions of the former kind are then said to be imputed to the Agent, when the Legislator or Sovereign declares him to be the Author of them, and at the same time decrees, that the ordinary effects of such Actions shall redound on him, or shall be conceiv'd as inherent in him. But the latter kind of Actions are then said to be imputed, when he, who without being bound by any necessity, hath exercis'd them for the Use and Benefit of another Man, doth signifie, that he undertook such an Action for the other Man's sake, and out of an Intention to oblige him. The latter Sense of the Word Imputatio is most frequent in Claffick Authors, and the former more in use with the Divines and Moralists. But there is between them this manifest difference, the former tends from the Legislator or Sovereign toward the Agent, but the latter proceeds from the Agent, and rests in the Person for whose sake or use the Action was perform'd.

II. The former kind of Imputation is subdivided into Imputation of Favour, and Imputation of Debt. Imputation of Favour is when a Man, out of pure Benevolence, derives upon another the Effects of an Action perform'd by a third Person; which Effects the second Party had no Right to, without the Grant of the first. Or, when one, out of free Kindness, makes a larger Effect redound to the Performer of a certain Action, than the Action would other-otherwise of it self have produc'd. But this last Instance will hold good in Matters of Reward only (1), not in Matters of Punishment. For, as such is the Nature of Good Things, that they may be given to another gratis, without any Colour or Condition; so, if a Man is not willing to confer a good thing on another by the Name of a Pure Gratuity, he may lawfully do it under the Notion of rewarding him for some Imputed Action, which either did not otherwise belong to him, or could not have given him a Right of demanding such a Benefit. But on the other hand, Common Reason will not allow me on the same pretence, to derive on another the Effects of an Evil Action, which he is not really guilty of, and without the Imputation of which, these Effects would not follow his Natural State and Condition. And therefore 'tis very incongruous and absurd, that either for a Fault purely anothers, I should have those things taken from me which Nature gives every Man on the very account of his being a Man; or that, under the same Colour, such things should be impos'd on me, as Nature, by an Indulgence Universal to all Mankind, hath forbidden us to suffer without Reason. A Prince, for Example, may impute the Father's Merits to a Son not Illustrious by his own Atchievements; and may, on the account of those Merits load him with Honours not otherwise his Due. But to punish the Innocent for the Father's Crime, is (strictly speaking) unreasonable (2). This indeed may happen, that the Father's Fault shall be the occasion of not conferring on the Son, or of taking from him, those things which he was neither to receive, nor to retain but under certain Conditions. But a Person thus dealt with, cannot be said to suffer an Evil, which his Natural State would otherwise have made him a Stranger to. For Nature, in this Case, gave no Security to the Children, that they should certainly possess the Parents Goods, or that they should be admitted to the like Posses of Honour: But their Right to those Goods, or those Honours, proceeded on these Conditions and Proviso's, that the Parents should deliver them down safe and untainted, and should not fall under such and such Penalties by their Crimes. Nor can he by any means be said to be in a worse Condition than Human Nature admits or allows, who having no Paternal Inheritance, is forced to work out his Fortunes by his own Industry.

It is Just likewise so far to proceed against Innocent Children upon account of their Parents Demerits, as to oblige them to quit the Kingdom or State. For no Man hath a Right from Nature of living in this or that Territory; but every one attains to such a Right by some Act of his own, or of other Men: And it may be a Condition of keeping this Right, that he shall lose it in case his Parents are found Guilty of some particular and High Offences. It is not being repugnant to Reason, that the Possession of a Right should depend on Contingent Terms. Though, that the Laws of some Countries are too rigorous and severe in this point, no Man can pretend to deny.

III. Imputation of Debt consists in this, that those Persons whose Interest it concerns, that an Action be done or not done, do declare that the said Action belongs to the Agent, and that the Effect assign'd to that Action shall redound or fall upon him. Hence, if in any Law, a certain Reward be decreed to such or such a Good Action, so soon as the Sovereign or the Guardian of the Laws shall understand that particular Action to have been perform'd by any Man, 'tis manifest, that the Man hath immediately a Right of demanding the promis'd Reward. But when a Man is enjoind to do a thing, solely by the Authority of the Commander, and without any such Proposal of a Reward, he ought to rest satisfied with the bare Approbation of his Superior, and to esteem it a very sufficient Recompence, that he hath avoided his Displeasure, which would necessarily have follow'd upon default. On the other side, when an Ill Action hath been committed, so soon as the Author of it is discover'd, he hath reason to fear the Execution of the Legal Penalty.

As to inferior Persons, to whom neither the Guardianship, nor the Execution of the Laws do belong, if they either approve a Good Action, or reprehend a Bad one, their Judgment can affect only the Credit and Character of the Agent. According to that Elegant Saying of Diodorus Siculus (a), Praise is a kind of a Reward of Virtue putting us to no Charges, and Dispraise is a Punishment of Vice inflicting no real Wound.

It is farther to be observ'd, that when the Interest of many Persons is concern'd in the doing or the not doing of an Action, if one of those Persons shall forgive and not impute it to the Agent, he cannot by this means abate any thing of the Right of the other's, which he hath no Power to controul. Thus, if a Man hath done me an Injury by an Illegal Fact, I may forgive him for my own Part and Concern, but at the same time I do not in the least derogate from the just Pretensions of the Publick, and of the Sovereign Authority. And thus too the Pardon which GOD Almighty is pleas'd to vouchsafe to repenting Sinners, doth not at all impair or hinder the Proceedings of Human Judicature. But when all the Persons, whom the doing or the not doing of a thing concerns, agree that they will not impute it, in such a Case the Deed is conceiv'd to be Null and Void as to all Moral Effects. Now the Persons concern'd in a thing's being done or not done, are either the Objects or the Directors of the Action; that is, those towards whom the Action is perform'd, and to whom it brings either Good or Evil, and those who have a just Power of guiding and supervising such an Action. For which reason, if in case of an Injury, the Deed be forgiven by the Person to whom it was offer'd, by the Civil Magistrate, and by GOD Almighty, in Moral Estimation it shall be suppos'd undone, and consequently shall be attended with no ill effect.

IV. Very different from the Imputation of which we have been speaking, is that by which the Agent is said to impute an Action, which he might have omitted, to the Party for whose sake and use he perform'd it. A Man who hath exactly fulfill'd the Command of his Superior, may indeed expect the Approbation of his Performance as from all others, so especially from him who enjoin'd it. But he cannot lay claim to any farther Reward, unless such as is expressly promis'd in the Law (a). For the same reason, no Man can demand that it should be imputed to him, in order to the giving him any Right, that he hath abstain'd from a Bad Action, forbidden by the Laws, or by any Command of his Superior; but he must be satisfied, that his Obedience hath pleas'd him who requir'd it. For since upon acting contrary to the Law, he would have justly incurr'd a considerable Evil, to escape such a Punishment must pass with him for a Reward. Hence in Seneca's Controversies (b), when a Man, who being taken in Adultery by a Tyrant, had forc'd the Sword out of his hand and kill'd him, desir'd a Gratification from the State, he is put off with this Rebuke, imputat nobis quod deprebensus in adulterio mori noluit. He reckons we are indebted to him, because being taken in Adultery he had the Sense to save his own Life: And Tully in his second Philippic, denies himself to have any Obligations to Antony upon account of his not being murder'd by him: Where lies the Kindness to me (says he) in your keeping your self from so horrid a Villany. Others maintain the Reasonableness of our present Assertion from this Topick, that the Omissions of Ill Actions are purely non Entia, and consequently can have no Positive Affections or Properties. Though to such an Argument it might perhaps be answer'd, that even these Omissions may, in Moral Account pass for Entities, as they are the real and actual Restrictions and Confinements of our Natural Powers.

But now, if for the sake of another Man, I do what I might rightly and properly have omitted, or omit what I might fairly and conveniently have done, it is highly reasonable, that I should impute my Service to him; or, that I should by Virtue of my Right, demand of him to acknowledge my Kindness; and his own Obligation according to the Quality and Condition of it. This Imputation cannot rightly be laid, unless there was in the Actor a real Intention of procuring some Good to the other Man; and in the Receiver an express, or at least a presumptive Consent to admit it. For no Man can impute or reckon to us a Service forc'd upon us against our Will: And it would be a much higher degree of Impudence, to charge such a Fact to us for a Kindness, as was perform'd either without any regard to our Benefit, or perhaps with a design to hurt us. Thus he must be extremely Foolish, who would desire a Reward from a Man whom he had restor'd to Health by breaking an Impoſtem, otherwise incurable, whilst he intended to give him a Mortal Stab. Yet Marius Celsus, in Tacitus (c), when he was brought before Otho as one of Galba's Servants and Confidants, immediately confessing his Loyalty to his old Master, propos'd it as an Example, how faithful he would be to the New Emperour; and thus reckon'd he had already oblig'd Otho, by sticking resolutely to Galba. And thus Eudoxia, when she was married to the Emperour Theodosius, sent for her Brothers by whom she had been formerly expell'd her Father's House; and was so far from resenting their Injury, that she rather paid them Thanks, as the Authors of her Promotion: Since unless she had been driven from Home, she had never seen Constantinople (d).

When the Parties concern'd and interest'd do agree in defining the Rate at which a thing shall be reckon'd or imputed, in this Case a Covenant intervenes, expressing how far, or to what value the Imputation shall extend, and beyond which it shall not reach in any Business or Transaction (e). For Merit (as Mr. Hobbs (f) observes) presupposeth a Right, and implies, that the thing deserv'd is due by Promise.

V. Hence 'tis easy to gather what is the Force of Merit, or what Actions are properly Meritorious, which some Men would vainly set to the account of GOD himself. Now the main Spring of all Merit, is the Performance of a Work which we did not owe; or, which the Person towards whom it is exercis'd had no Right of requiring from us. For he that performs a thing which he lay under a full and perfect Obligation of doing, only dischargeth his necessary Duty, and lays no Foundation for any consequent Merit (g). Neither is it fair to impute a thing which we do not owe to a Person against his Consent;

(a) See Luke XVII. 9, 10. (b) L. 4. Controv. 7. (c) Hist. l. 4. (d) Zonar. Tom. 3. Add. Genes. 45. 5. 50. 20.

(e) Comp. Matth. XX. 13, 14. (f) Leviath. c. 10.

(g) M. Senec. Controv. l. 1. c. 8. Give me leave to perform some Service to my Country, which may properly be a Piece of Merit. What I have hitherto done in the common Course of Arms, is not owing to me, but to the Laws. Julius Capitolinus, in his Life of Antoninus Pius, reciting the Reason of the Emperour's obtaining that Title, from lending his Hand to support his Ancient Father-in-Law, in the Presence of the Senate, adds, This Action was really no great Argument of Piety: Since the Debt we owe our Parents is such, as rather denominates a Man Impious if he neglects, than Pious if he pays.

and much less, if our doing of such a thing did not turn to his Benefit. Whence it is clearly apparent, that no Man can pretend to any Merit with reference to Almighty G O D, even though it were possible for him to pay a full Obedience to all the Divine Laws. And that therefore, G O D cannot any other way become a Debtor to Mortal Men, but upon account of his free Promise, the Breach of which would be repugnant to his Goodness; (1) not that any Right, properly so call'd, is thence deriv'd to us. Indeed no Actions enjoin'd by Virtue of a supreme Authority do produce Merit towards the Enjoiner. For though both the Sovereign of Heaven, and the Inferior Rulers of the Earth, are wont frequently to confer certain Good things on those who comply with their Commands, in order to the encouraging and exciting their Obedience; yet to the Payment of these good things, they are not bound by the Merits of the Agent, or as in the manner of Covenants; but by their own free Offer and Promise: And therefore they cannot be so properly call'd Rewards as Gratuities in the strictest Sense of that Word (a).

But notwithstanding all this, if the Legislator do expressly declare, that upon the Performance of such or such an Action, the Agent shall have a Right of demanding such a Reward; there's no doubt to be made, but he may fairly and justly require it. But the bare Omission of forbidden Actions is utterly unable to produce any Merit, or any Matter for Boasting or for Praise (b).

It remains then, that the only Actions whereby we can obtain Merit towards other Men are such as we do not owe to them; at least, not by a full and perfect Obligation: Whether Natural Reason either commands or adviseth them in general, leaving the Application of them to particular Persons in our Power; or whether they are only not enjoin'd by the Civil Laws. For whatsoever I owe another as a full and proper Debt, to that he hath already a Right, and therefore when I pay such a Due, I do not, properly speaking, part with any thing which I have then a Right of retaining or of otherwise applying, because upon denying and keeping it back, I should bring a real Injury and Damage on the Person to whom I stand engag'd. And therefore since things which I owe in this manner, do already belong in some respect to another Person, and I have no longer a Power to dispose of them as I please, they cannot be proper Matter for the founding of Merit. But when I perform any thing towards another Man, which I was not bound to pay by any perfect Obligation, such a thing really passing from me, and accruing to him, leaveth in me either a perfect or an Imperfect Right of receiving an Equivalent Return. And this is properly Merit (c); the Retribution or Payment of which, when it is determin'd by Express Covenant we call Wages: But when as to the manner, the time, and the Quantity, it is left to the Equity of the other Party, it bears the Name of Reward. Now upon such accounts and Considerations we may receive four kinds of things, Corporeal, Incorporeal, Moral, and Notional. Of the first sort are, Money, Land, &c. of the second, the Grant of Privileges and Immunities; of the third, Honours and Dignities; of the last, Statues, Inscriptions, Crowns, and the like Tokens and Testimonies of Worth (d).

And thus, as hath been shewn, Merit ariseth from those Actions which we do not owe to others; and chiefly as they are useful and beneficial to them. On the contrary, from Evil Actions, especially such as damage or injure others, ariseth Demerit; by Virtue of which, a Man is oblig'd to make Satisfaction for the Harm he hath done; But in general, all Evil Actions produce a Guilt, by which the Agent is suppos'd liable to undergo some Penalty: Which Point we shall hereafter find more room to explain (2).

VI. As the actual applying of Imputation causeth the Effects of Moral Actions to exist; so the ceasing and as it were the recalling of it, doth dissolve and extinguish those Effects. And as to this Matter, the Case is very near the same in Good Actions and in Evil. For both Good and Evil Actions whilst they are such, or so long as they are enjoin'd or prohibited by the Laws, must necessarily be attended with Imputation; at least in the first and plain import of that Term. But when a Law is repeal'd, the Action about which it was concern'd can no longer be imputed. The Imputation of an Action not properly due, he alone can remit, whose Interest it is that the Effect or Consequence of the Action should be made good. Therefore if he who hath perform'd a Work remits the Imputation, the Wages otherwise due cannot on any account be demanded. But to make this Release or Remission, is not in the Power of the Person for whom the Work was done; it being the Creditor's part to forgive, and not the Debtor's. So likewise to take off the Imputation of an Ill Action, as to any Force and Efficacy, belongs to those whose Interest it is that such an Action be attended with its due Effects; that is, to the Party Injur'd, and to the Maker and Guardian of the Law, not to the Author of the Fact.

The Civilians reduce the chief Ways by which Crimes are cancell'd or extinguish'd in

(1) Or rather his Veracity: For it is properly out of his Goodness that God at first promises a reward to our imperfect performance; but his Veracity that he performs such Promise. (a) Euripides. Rhes. Rewarded Virtue gives a Double Joy. (b) Philostrat. de Vit. Apollon. l. 6. c. 11. It is not an Act of Justice to abstain from Injustice, nor an Act of Prudence to have declin'd a Foolish Resolution, nor of Valour not to desert ones Colours, nor of Temperance not to fall into the base Effeminacy of the Medes; nor will a bare Negative Goodness entitle you to any Commendation: When we escape Punishment, but yet do nothing worthy of Honour and Reward, such an Indifference cannot reasonably be call'd Virtue. Add. Luk. XVIII. 11. Amnian. Marcell. l. 30. c. 11. To forbear Plunder and Rapine, is a false Foundation for Praise. (c) Add. Senec. de Beneficiis l. 3. c. 21, 22. (d) Add. Montaigne Ess. l. 2. c. 7. (2) See lib. VIII. c. 3.

Human Courts, to these Five. First, when the Punishment defin'd by the Law shall be compleatly undergone: For no Man is punish'd twice, and with equal Severity for the same Individual Fault. Though many Punishments indeed leave a kind of lasting Stain behind them (a): And frequently after the Completion of a Corporal Punishment, Moral Punishment, or Infamy with its scandalous Marks continues. Secondly, he whom the Judges have acquitted, passeth in Human Esteem for an Innocent Person. The third way is, when the Delinquent dies. Though sometimes in extraordinary Crimes, for a Terrour to others, Severities are shown on the Body, the Goods and the Memory of Wretches after they are dead. Fourthly, by length of time Crimes are so far taken away, as that the Author cannot be afterwards try'd on the same Account (b). The Fifth and last way is the procuring of Pardon for the Offence from the Sovereign Power (c).

As the Effects of an Evil Action do so long lie dormant, as the Action is either conceal'd, or thoroughly dissembled or pardon'd (as it were) before-hand: So when once these Effects have broken out in Publick, their Moral part may indeed be effac'd, but not their Physical. For what is once done, cannot in a Physical or Natural Sense be rendred undone; but it may be so order'd, as that it shall no longer have any Moral Effect in Civil Life. Thus a Man who hath been whipp'd for a Misdemeanour, must still keep the Scars and Signs in his Back, though all the Disgrace and Scandal of the Punishment may be remov'd by a Decree of the Government. And when the Imputation is taken off, the Action is to all Intents and Purposes, no more than if it had never been done (d).

We need only add by way of Remark, that those Authors are strangely overseen, who in order to the taking away the Guilt of an Evil Action, besides the Non-Imputation, or the Forgiveness of it, require the Infusion of some contrary Quality, or of the Habit of Justice and Honesty. In the same manner, as by plaistering over a Wall we rid it of the Spots that were in it before; and as we drive away an ill Smell by burning Frankincense in a Room. Which Mistake was occasion'd by their Ignorance of Moral Things, and because they imagin'd that Moral Qualities were produc'd and destroy'd in the same way as Physical: The Absurdity of which Notion is plain enough from what we have before deliver'd.

LAW of NATURE AND

BOOK II.

CHAP. I.

It is not Agreeable to the Nature of Man, that he should live without LAW.

I. HAVING in the preceding Book explain'd the Condition of Moral things in general, together with the most frequent Uses of the Common Terms, (which Notices if inserted otherwise, and only as Occasion serv'd, would have interrupted us in our Business, and broken the Series of our Undertaking;) we come now to fall more directly on our main Design; and the first Enquiry we are here to make is, whether it would be convenient or not for Men to pass their Lives without the Restraint of any Law. Whence it will evidently appear, why the All-wise Creator hath not invested them with such a wild Liberty, as should empower them to act merely as they list, and as their wandring Inclinations lead them; without being under the Restraint of any Rule, Necessity or Law. For since God Almighty has been pleas'd to endue Man with a Will, (that is, with a Power working by a kind of internal Impulse, and enabling him to incline towards such things as appear agreeable to him, and to Turn from such things as seem Inconvenient or Unpleasant;) and with such a Will as cannot be compell'd; a Doubt may be rais'd, whether it did not become the Divine Goodness, to allow him the full range of this flexible Faculty, without any Limit or Impediment. For to what purpose, some will say, did God first make us entirely free to all things, and afterwards confine us to certain Bounds and Rules? And as the Motion of our Joints is render'd useless by the Restraint of Chains and Fetters, so may the Liberty of the Will seem vain and of no manner of use, if we can incline to many things which must of Necessity be forborn, and if we can be averse to many things, which we must as necessarily pursue and undertake.

II. In tracing this point to its proper Spring, we think it convenient first of all to show, that an absolute Liberty would be so far from being useful, that indeed it would be destructive to Human Nature; and that therefore the binding and restraining it with Laws is highly conducive to the Good, and to the Safety of Mankind. And this Consideration rightly pursued, will at the same time discover what Scope may be fairly indulg'd, and how far the Reins may be given to our Freedom. Here then we must know, that Liberty in general implies an Internal Faculty of doing and of omitting things according to the Direction of our Judgment. When we call it a Faculty or Power, we intimate that the Person to whom this Liberty is applied, is Master of sufficient Strength for many Performances, and has a Force and Ability not only to move himself, but to imprint Motion on other Things, and to affect them in a certain manner. We term this Faculty Internal, to signify that its Force and its Motion arise from an inward Principle, contrary to that outward and violent Impulse which is the Cause of Movement, rather in a Log than in a Man. Lastly, we add according to the Direction of our Judgment, to hint that the Motion is not rais'd at a venture, or by some blind kind of Force; but that the Agent is suppos'd, in some degree at least, to have had a Knowledge of the Object, and to have determin'd himself to Action after some fort fort of Deliberation, so that the immediate Reason of his acting shall be, because he was pleas'd to act. At the same time it will be understood, that all Rubs and Hindrances which may either prevent the Motion, or turn it another way, ought to be suppos'd absent, when we state the Notion of Liberty in Perfection and without alloy.

III. Matters being thus settled, if we cast our Eyes over the universal Frame of Things, we shall find that many have no Liberty at all, such as are all Inanimate and Vegetative Creatures. Others enjoy several kinds of Liberty, and in several degrees. An universal Liberty void of all Hindrance and of all Defect, is applicable only to God Almighty; this is conceiv'd as the most Noble Attribute of his most perfect Essence, admitting no Bounds or Circumscription, and intimately join'd with Omnipotence. And therefore, the reason why God doth not do some things, or why he doth not always do all things, is not to be fetcht from the Deficiency of his Liberty, but from his own absolute Pleasure (a). So likewise when we say He cannot do all things, this does not proceed from any outward Impediment whether Natural or Moral, but from his own Intention and Design, which we Mortals endeavour to conceive in Proportion to his Greatness and his Excellency. In which sense we are to interpret that common Saying, That God is a Law to himself. Thus too the Justice which we ascribe to God, is not to be suppos'd to bear a regard to any Obligation, or to any Right in another Person, as the Nature of Human Justice necessarily implies. But in as much as he has shown both by his Works and by his Revelations, that such a manner of acting is suitable to his most compleat Nature, hence we come to express it by the same Term which denotes our own equitable Dealings towards other Men. Thus the reason why God's Promises do not fail, is not because his Liberty was restrain'd by any Obligation arising from his Promise; but because it is agreeable to the Divine Excellency to let us not expect in vain, what he commands us to expect; or because to violate a Promise, implies some kind of Imperfection, from which the Supreme Nature is most immensely remov'd. Upon which account, we Men do not challenge the Divine Promises as of Right belonging to us, but receive them with Humility and Reverence, as Gratuities proceeding from God's Free Pleasure. For 'tis not here as in Human Promises, where there lies an Obligation to Payment, where the Promise turns into a Debt, and what was before free, is brought under a Necessity: But those things which God performs upon Promise, do as fully retain the Nature of Gifts and Benefits, as those things which he dispenses, without any such seeming Engagement. Thus may we weak Mortals faintly represent the Divine

Liberty; but that alone which we can determine with Certainty about it, is, that it surpasses in an infinite manner, both our Notion and our Condition (b).

IV. Brute Creatures which are plac'd below our Degree of Being, do however enjoy a Liberty proper to their Nature and State. But this Liberty cannot be otherwise than very Ignoble, since the Power of these Animals is confin'd to such Narrow Bounds, and since such is the Dulness of their Senses and such the Lowness of their Appetite, that they are concern'd about very few Objects, and regard even those but very negligently and superficially; nor are excited by any thing but what is extremely gross and perpetually obvious, and tends to the Service of their Belly. As to other Matters, they have no Custom, no Law, no Right to bind them in transacting either with one another, or with Mankind. Amongst a few of them there is some Semblance of Marriage, but of such as is observ'd in the bare Act of Conjunction and in some shew of Love or Liking, not in any strictness of serious and constant Fidelity. Most of them, as soon as they have satisfied their Lustful Desires, retain no farther Mark of Love, no Sense of Shame, no Regard to Off-spring. Some indeed are most passionately fond of their Young, but then their Kindness continues no longer than till they are able to provide for themselves. After this Period, all Love is lost and forgot on both sides; the Dams take no Care or Notice of their Progeny, and the Progeny do not show any Gratitude, any sense of Debt or Duty to their Dams. Those Beasts which feed on Flesh, tear and devour without Distinction, whatever is agreeable to their Palate; and many when they fall out, pull one another in pieces without Regret. Being Ignorant of the Laws of Propriety, whenever a sharper Hunger than ordinary pinches them, we may see them fighting furiously for the common Pasture or Prey; and what some have laid up or seiz'd for their private use, the others make no scruple to invade and to devour. Nor is there among them any such thing, as Esteem, as Honour, as Command, as Prerogative, unless such as is deriv'd purely from Superiority of Strength. It must be confess'd, that Likeness of kind does produce in some Creatures a shew of Friendship and of Society. Hence many delight to live in Herds, and those which are more fierce than others, have some Aversion to preying on their own Kind. Thus Juvenal observes, Sat. 15.

Fortior eripuit vitam leo? quo nemore unquam
Expiravit aper majoris dentibus apri?
Indica tigris agit rabida cum Tigride pacem
Perpetuam: sævis inter se convenit ursis.*

(a) See Psalms 115. 3. Ephes. 1. 11.

(b) Add Cumberland, de Legg. Nat. c. 7. f. 6.

From spotted Skins the Leopard does refrain,
 No weaker Lion's by the Stronger slain:
 Nor from his larger Tusks the Forest Boar

 In Leagues Offensive and Defensive join'd.

Mr. Tate.

But not to say that there's something of a Poetical Figure in these Expressions, we may only take notice, that this seeming Relation is but a very weak Bond for a lasting Friendship: since 'tis immediately broken whenever the Concerns of the Belly intervene. Thus you shall see a Litter of Puppies play very lovingly together, but throw a piece of Meat amongst them, and you breed a dangerous and a general Quarrel. The reason why some Creatures exercise a little shadow of Duty, Love, Faith and Gratitude towards Men, is purely to be referr'd to Custom, and to their desire of being supplied with Food. If these Obstacles are once remov'd, and if they find themselves of sufficient Strength, Man himself cannot escape their Violence, if he unhappily provokes them. The Liberty of Brutes then is not restrain'd by any Intrinsic and Moral Tie: Tho' their External Motions are often violently put under Confinement by Men. Now if any one is so curious as to enquire on what account Brute Creatures are allow'd so unbounded a Freedom, the plain reason seems to be, because GOD ALMIGHTY has not given them a Mind capable of the Knowledge of Right and of Law. There was indeed no occasion to be so very careful and exact in enforcing the Safety and Preservation of such Beings, as are not only produc'd by Nature with such vast Fertility and with so little Pains, but are likewise denied the Privilege of an Immortal Soul; and whose Life consists in nothing else, but in the curious and accurate Disposition of the little parts of Matter, with the additional Benefit of Motion. Hence GOD is pleas'd, in producing and in destroying these Inferior Animals, to give us frequent Instances and evident Tokens of his Power. Another reason why Brutes had no need of the restraint of Laws, is, because their Appetite is rais'd by nothing else but by Hunger, or Thirst, or by falacious Desire, for their Satisfaction in all which Enjoyments, Nature has made such large Provision. Neither is it likely, that their unlimited way of proceeding should render them very hurtful and destructive to Mankind, since we are enabled by our Superior Strength and Cunning to prevent any such unhappy Effects (a).

V. Now why the Great Creator should not indulge us Men in so lawless a Liberty, many Reasons may be given, arising both from the Primitive and from the Accessory State and

Condition of Human Nature. The Dignity of Man and his Excellency above all the other parts of the Animal World, made it requisite that his Actions should be squar'd by some Rule; without which no Order, no Decorum, no Beauty can be conceiv'd. Hence it is his greatest Honour that he has obtain'd an Immortal Soul, indu'd with the Light of Understanding, with the Faculties of judging and of choosing things, and with an admirable Capacity for Arts and Knowledge. On which account he is justly term'd

an Animal blest with Loftiness of Mind and with Sanctity of Reason, and fram'd for the Dominion and Sovereignty of all the rest (b).

Farther, That the Soul was design'd by the All-wise Creator for a much nobler end than to serve only as Salt to keep the Body fresh, may be gather'd from this Consideration, that the greatest and the most shining part of its Faculties are such as contribute either little or nothing to the Preservation of the Body, which might be secur'd without any such mighty Parade, without so Great and Pompous a Provision. It's plain, that the Power and the Activity of the Rational Soul, is chiefly exercis'd about such things as belong to the Worship of GOD, and to a Life of Society and of Civility. And 'tis principally for the Service and Furtherance of these Great Ends, that it can from known things infer and explain those which are less known, that it can discern and judge what is agreeable and what disagreeable to it; that it can form Universal Notions by Abstraction from Singulars; that it can by proper Signs communicate its Notions to others, can form Inventions, can apprehend the Nature of Numbers, Weights and Measures, and compare them with one another; that it can perceive the Beauty and the Force of Order and Method; that it can either raise, or repress, or moderate Affections; that it can hold in Memory an endless Compass of things, and call out as it were at its beck, any part of the Stock which it has occasion to use; that it can turn its Sight inward upon it self, recollect its own Dictates, and by them judge of its Actions, whence arises the Force and the Authority of Conscience. Of all these Powers and Abilities there would be very little use, or rather none at all in a Lawless, a Brutal and an Unsocial Life (c). Now the more Gifts GOD has bestow'd on Man, and the greater Inlargements he has granted to his Wit and Mind, the more base and unseemly would it be, that all these noble Endowments should rust for want of Culture and Regulation, should be vainly spent and squander'd away without Use, without Order, and without Grace. Nor was it altogether in vain, that GOD indued Man with a Mind apprehensive of Accuracy and of Decency; but it was without doubt intended, that he should so employ the Powers he had receiv'd as to manifest the Glory of his Creator, and to promote his own true Interest and Happiness. The Heathen Poet was able to make such an Inference as this :

(a) Add Charron of Wisdom, B. I. c. 34. (b) Solinus (Cap. 3.) calls Man a Being whom Nature has prefer'd to all others, in Excellency of Sense and in Capacity of Reason. (c) Add Cumberland de Legg. Nat. c. 2. f. 4; who likewise in the 33d Section of the same Chapter, has drawn most admirable Proofs from the Frame and Structure of Human Bodies.

— *Quis dubitet hominem conjungere cælo ?
Eximiam natura dedit linguamq; capaxq; (unum Ingenium, volucremque; animum; quem deniq; in Descendit Deus atq; habitat, seq; ipse requirit.*

Then who can doubt that Man the Glorious Pride Of all, is nearer to the Skies alli'd? Nature in Men capacious Souls has wrought, And given them Voice expressive of their thought. In Man the God descends, and joys to find The narrow Image of his Greater Mind.

Mr. Creech.

VI. Another reason why it was inconvenient to allow Man the same extended Liberty as Brutes, was his prodigious Corruption and Degeneracy so many degrees beyond theirs. That we charge him thus, no one will wonder who has had the Curiosity to reflect a little on the various Pursuits and Inclinations of Mankind. Beasts are sollicitated only by their Belly and by their Lust: And then their Lust has some shew of Temperance, provoking them only at certain Times and Seasons, and being exercis'd not for empty and superfluous Pleasure, but for Increase and Propagation of their kind (a). But the Carnal Desires of Men do neither observe any set times for their Eruption, nor are by any means so moderate in their heat, as to make no farther Efforts than are necessary for the Preservation of Human Species. Again, the Hunger of Beasts is easily satisfied with such Food as Nature has spread in all places for their Sustainance; nor do their Meals stand in need of the Formality of Furniture, or of the Incentives of Sauce. And when they find this Appetite reliev'd and quieted, they put an end to their Business and their Care. (Nor are they very forwardly dispos'd to Rage or Mischief, provided they are unprovok'd, and that their two chief Desires are at rest.) But now the Food of Man must not only satisfy his Belly but tickle his Palate. Nature has taken Care, that Beasts should have no need of other Clothing besides what she has given them. But Man turns the Infirmary of his Nakedness into an occasion of Vanity and of Pride. Besides, do not Men float in a whole Tide of Affections and Desires utterly unknown to Beasts? Covetousness, Ambition, Vain-Glory, Envy, Emulation, Contentions of Wit, Superstition, the Care of future things, and the Spur of Curiosity do all claim Entertainment in Human Breasts, and yet are Strangers to the Dumb Creation (b). Whoever considers and examines the unhappy Variety of Contentions and Quarrels that continually arise amongst Men, will find that the greatest part of them proceed from such Inclinations and Propensions, as never disturb the Peace of Brutes (c). Now in so violent a Fierceness, and in so wide a Diversity of Affections and of Desires, what a Life would Men lead, were they destitute of the Benefit of Law to unite and to compose them? We should see nothing but a furious Multitude of Wolves, of Lions, of Dogs tearing and destroying one another. Every Man would indeed be a Lion, a Wolf, a Dog, to his Neighbour, or rather a Monster more pernicious and more spiteful than the fiercest of these Creatures; since Man of all Living Things is the most able to hurt Man, and if left to his own furious Passions, the most willing. And since Men are continually bringing so many Evils and Mischiefs on one another, while they now

Liban. Declam. IX. Is not Man a Mild and Peaceable Animal, so far as Words go; but in reality Savage and Ungovernable? For when do we hear of Lions undertaking an Expedition against Lions? When do Wild Beasts war against their own Kind? What Injury do we find amongst them? What Breach of Covenants? What Perfidiousness and Avarice, what Insatiable Love of Riches? What Intemperance, what Adultery can we lay to their Charge? (c) Add. Charron Of Wisdom, B. I. c. 34. n. 12. and c. 39. n. 11.

live under the Force of Law, and under the Fear of Punishment; what would become of the World, if they were left to the wild sway of their Corruptions, if they had no inward Bridle to curb their Inclinations and to check their Pursuits (a)?

VII. It is still farther observable to our purpose, that a much greater Variety of Dispositions may be discover'd in Men than in Beasts. All the several Kinds of Irrational Creatures are for the most part indu'd with the same Inclinations, and rais'd and incited by the same common Appetites and Affections. We may understand a whole Species by the Knowledge of one single Member of it. But amongst Men there are not more Heads than Wits; and every one is equally zealous in giving the Preference to his own Opinion, and to his own Possessions (b). Nor are all mov'd with a simple and an uniform Desire, but with Propensions as vast in their Number, as they are various in their Mixture and Compositions. Nay, the same Man is very frequently unlike and unequal to himself, and what he most eagerly desir'd, he shall at another time most strongly abhor:

— *magno curarum fluctuat aestu,
Atq; animam nunc huc celerem nunc droidit illuc;
In partesq; rapit varias, perq; omnia versat* (c).

This way and that he turns his Anxious Mind, Thinks, and rejects the Counsels he design'd. Explores himself in vain through ev'ry part, And gives no rest to his distracted Heart.

Mr. Dryden.

Neither is there a less difference in their Studies, their Institutions, and their Inclinations to employ and exert their Vigour of Mind, as appears from the numberless Professions, and the endless Methods of Living (d). Now as the more Voices there are, the more harsh and unpleasant would be the Sound, unless they join'd in Confort and Harmony; so would Human Life be nothing else but Noise and Confusion, were not the jarring Dissonance compos'd and sweetned by Law, and turn'd into a Musical Agreement. As things stand, this exceeding Variety of Parts and of Dispositions, is at the same time an Ornament and an Advantage to Mankind; since when it is thus rightly temper'd, there naturally results from it so admirable an Order and Grace, as could not have been produc'd by an Universal Likeness. And besides, there was likely to be much less clashing and Contest in so vast a Multitude, whilst their various Humours and Inclinations led them to quite different Objects of Choice. The same wise Counsel Providence seems to have us'd in spreading so wonderful a Distinction of Features over the Faces of Men. For since different Offices are to be discharg'd, and different Behaviour to be us'd towards different Persons, there would arise a most wild and fatal Disorder, if all Men exactly resembled one another, and could not be distinguish'd but by Artificial Marks, which would be liable to so many counterfeiting Cheats (e). And there lies this farther Secret in that Natural Distinction, that one Face pleases the Fancy of one Man, and one seems more agreeable to another; so that out of the Universal Stock, every Man may chuse what he thinks most beautiful, and what may engage his Affection with the sweetest Confort and Delight.

VIII. Besides all this, it was inexpedient for Man to live without Law upon account of his exceeding Weakness; which is our last Reason. A few Days will set a Brute Creature in a Condition of providing for himself; nor is he in any great need of the Company of others for his Assistance and Support. But Man from his first coming into the World, undergoes a long, and tedious Course of helpless Infirmary (f). What a length of Years is requir'd, and what diligence of Information, to enable him by his own Strength to accommodate himself with Food and Clothing? Let us suppose a Man bred up by another, just so far as to be able to walk, and without hearing a Word spoken, insomuch that he shall be destitute of all Instruction and Discipline, and enjoying no Knowledge, but such as sprouts naturally from the Soil of his Mind, without the Benefit of Cultivation. Let us suppose the same Man to be left in a Wilderness or Desert, and entirely depriv'd of the Company and of the Assistance of others. What a wretched Creature should we at last behold! A mute and an ignoble Animal, Master of no Powers or Capacities, any farther than to pluck up the Herbs and Roots that grow about him; to gather the Fruits which he did not plant; to quench his Thirst at the first River, or Fountain, or Ditch, that he finds out in his way; to creep into a Cave for Shelter from the Injuries of Weather, or to cover over his Body with Moss and Grass and Leaves: Thus would he pass a heavy Life in most tedious Idleness; would tremble at every Noise, and be scared at the approach of any of his Fellow Creatures, till at last his miserable Days were concluded, by the Extremity of Hunger or of Thirst, or by the Fury of a Ravenous Beast. That Mankind therefore do not pass their Age in a more forlorn and a more deplorable Condition than any other living thing, is owing to their Union and Conjunction, to their Intercourse with the other Partners and Companions of their Nature. The Divine Saying, 'Tis not good for Man to be alone, is not to be restrain'd to Matrimony, but seems to belong in general to any Society with other Men. But now without Law, 'tis impossible that any Society should be either introduc'd or maintain'd in Strength and Quietness. And consequently unless Man had been design'd for the basest and the most wretched part of the Animal Creation, it was not by any means convenient that he should live loose from all Direction and Obligation of Law. Plutarch's Philosophy could teach him, that a general and unbounded Licence of acting, was disagreeable to the Condition and to the Dignity of Man. Those Persons only (says he (a) who live in Obedience to Reason are worthy to be accounted Free. They alone live as they will, who have learnt what they ought to will. Those who give the Reins to unworthy practices and pursuits, use an imaginary Freedom, to purchase a real Dissatisfaction.

From all these Remarks it is sufficiently evident, that the Natural Liberty of Man, such as really and truly agrees to him and not only in an abstracted Sense, must always be understood as guided and restrain'd by the Ties of Reason, and by the Laws of Nature (1).

CHAP. II.

Of the Natural State of Man.

I. BY the Natural State of Man in our present Enquiry, we do not mean that Condition which is ultimately design'd him by Nature, as the most perfect and the most agreeable; but such a State as we may conceive Man to be plac'd in by his bare Nativity, abstracting from all the Rules and Institutions, whether of Human Invention, or of the Suggestion and Revelation of Heaven; for the Addition of these Assistances seems to put another Face on things, and to frame Human Life anew, by an exacter Model. By this wide Exemption we do not only exclude all the various Arts and Improvements, and the Universal Culture of Life, but especially Civil Conjunctions and Societies, by the Introducing of which Mankind was first brought under the decent Management of Order and Regularity. That we may be able to form clear and distinct Notions of this suppos'd State, we will first consider it in itself, and examine especially what Rights and what Inconveniencies attend it; that is, what would be the Condition of particular Men, if there were no Arts or Inventions set afoot, and no Communities form'd and establish'd in the World. And then secondly, we will consider it in order to other Men, whether in this regard it bears the Semblance of Peace or of War; that is, whether Men who live in a Natural Freedom, so as neither to be Subject to one another, nor to acknowledge a Common Master, are likely to prove Enemies or Friends. In this second Consideration the State we are speaking of, is capable of a Subdivision, being either full and absolute, and so bearing an equal regard towards all Men in general; or else limited and restrain'd, as it has respect only to a certain part of Mankind. This double Notion of a State, is answerable to the Double manner in which we may consider the Men who are to compose it, either as each particular Man lives in a Natural Liberty towards all others; or as some Men have entred into a Society between themselves, but are join'd to all the rest of the World, by no other Ties, besides those of Common Humanity.

II. Now to form in our Minds some Image of this Natural State, such as it would be if destitute of all Arts and Assistances either invented by Men, or reveal'd by God, we must fancy a Man thrown at a venture into the World, and then left entirely to himself without receiving any farther Help or Benefit from others, than his bare Nativity; we must likewise suppose him to be furnish'd with no larger Endowments of Body or Mind, than such as we can now discover in Men, antecedent to all Culture and Information; and lastly, we must take it for granted, that he is not foster'd under the peculiar Care and Concern of Heaven. The Condition of such a Person could not prove otherwise than extremely miserable, whether he were thus cast upon the Earth in Infancy, or in Maturity of Stature and of Strength. If an Infant, he could not but have sadly perish'd, unless some Brute Creature had by a kind of Miracle offer'd its Duggs for his Support; and then he must necessarily have imbib'd a fierce and savage Temper, under the Nursery and Tutelage of Beasts. If in Perfection of Limbs and Size, we must however conceive him Naked, able to utter nothing but an inarticulate Sound, a Stranger to all Institution and Discipline, amazed and startled at the things about him, and even at his own Being: The Admonition of Hunger would make him seize greedily on any thing that was near him, his Thirst would direct him to the first Water, and Dens or Trees would afford a Refuge from the Injuries of Weather. Should we suppose a Number of such helpless Wretches thrown together by Nature on some uninhabited Soil, we cannot but think that they would so long however continue in a brutal Wildness and Disorder, till at last, either by their own Wit and Experience, or by some Hints and Instructions taken from the Conduct of Mute Creatures, they should by degrees arrive at some Method and Elegancy of Living, and as Virgil says,

— Varias usus meditando extunderet artes, Studious Need might beat out Useful Arts.

This will easily be acknowledg'd by any one that looks about on the numerous Improvements and Assistances which we make use of in our daily Actions, and at the same time considers how difficult it would be for any Man to invent all these of his own Head, if he were not put in the way by the previous Labour and Guidance of others; and how great a part of these Ornaments and Conveniences of Life, would at once enter into the Thoughts of the Generality of Mankind. Hence it is no Wonder that the Heathen Writers, who understood not the true Origine of Men as deliver'd in the Holy Scriptures, should make so foul a Representation of their Primitive State.

Then Man was hard, as hard as Parent-Stones,
And built on bigger and on firmer Bones.

Contented they with the poor easy Store
That Sun and Earth bestow'd, they wish no more:
Soft Acorns were their first and chiefest Food.
When

When thirsty, then did purling Streams invite
To satisfy their eager Appetite.

They knew no use of Fire to dress their Food,
No Cloaths, but wandred naked thro' the Wood.
They liv'd in shady Groves, and Caves confin'd
Were Shelter from the Cold, the Heat, and Wind.
No fixt Society, no steddly Laws,
No publick Good was sought, no common Cause.
But all at War, each rang'd, each sought his Food,
By Nature taught to seek his Private Good.
Then to renew frail Man's decaying Race,
Or Mutual Lust did prompt them to embrace,
Or else the greater Vigour of the Male,
Or some few treacherous Presents did prevail;
Some Acorns, Apples some, some Pears bestow,
The thing the same, the Price was less than now.

The most they dreaded was the furious Beast,
For those i'th' dead of Night did oft molest,
And lengthen into Death their slumbring Rest.

But when they built their Hutts, when Fire began,
And skins of murder'd Beasts gave Cloths to Man;
When One to One confin'd in chaste Embrace Enjoy'd sweet Love, and saw a num'rous Race;
Then Man grew soft, the Temper of his Mind
Was chang'd from rough to mild, from fiere to kind.
For us'd to Fire, his Limbs refus'd to bear
The piercing Sharpness of the open Air:
Lust weaken'd him, and the sweet playing Child
Tam'd his Wild Sire, and into Peace beguil'd.
Then Neighbours by degrees familiar grown,
Made Leagues and Bonds, and each secur'd his own.
And then by Signs, and broken Words agreed,
That they would keep, preserve, defend, and feed
Defenceless Infants, and the Female Train;
A Right which Pity urg'd them to maintain.

Tho' this fixt not an universal Peace,
Yet many kept their Faith, and liv'd at ease;
Or else, almost as soon as it began,
The Race had fall'n, this Age ne'er seen a Man.
Kind Nature power of framing Sounds affords,
And these at length convenience turn'd to words (a)

Mr. Creech

However fabulous these Accounts appear, yet so far the Authors of them were in the right, that upon supposal of such an Origine of Mankind, the Face of Nature would have born all these Features which we now esteem so monstrous and extravagant. In the same manner being ignorant of the State of Paradise, they pleas'd themselves in making Descriptions, of a singular and constant Temperateness of Air, and of a spontaneous Fertility of the Earth, in the first and the Golden Age of the World. Because they thought it impossible, that Human Race could have been preserv'd, as according to their Notion they were produc'd, if the Weather and the Seasons had been then as changeable and as unsteady as now, and if the support of Food had not been more easy to procure (b). And indeed, though it is clear from the Authority of Scripture, that the Primitive Mortals by the Divine Direction and Assistance (1) arriv'd at a very early Knowledge of the most necessary Arts, which they daily improv'd and increas'd by their own Industry and Application; yet the Condition of Men had been most deplorable and base, if no Societies had been set on foot, but every one reign'd a separate Prince in his own Family, and suffer'd his Children, when once grown up, to seek their Fortunes

(a) We have much the same Story in Prose from Diodor. Sic. l. i. c. 8. They tell us, that Men at their first Origine led an Irregular Life, in the manner of Beasts; scattering themselves about in Search of Food, which was presented them by the savoury Herbs, and the Fruits which grew of their own accord. But being infested on every side with the wild Beasts, they learnt by Use the Security of Mutual Assistance; and being forc'd in Fear to unite in Society, they came acquainted by degrees with their Similitude of Figure and Shape. The first Men, before any Inventions of Conveniency and Use, supported Life with great Labour and Trouble; being, as yet, destitute of Cloaths, and Dwellings, unaccustom'd to the Relief of Fire, and Strangers to all Sweet and Regular Food. Being Ignorant of Stores and Provisions, they neglected to secure so much of the Fruits of the Earth as was Requisite for necessary Sustenance. And thus many perish'd in the Winter, by Hunger and Cold. But being afterwards instructed by Gradual Experience, to spend the sharp Season in Caves, and to lay up a Stock of Necessaries, and finding out the Use of Fire and other Comforts and Supports, they began to introduce many Arts, and many Advantages of Living. Add. lib. i. c. 43. Cicero pro P. Seetio. Who amongst you does not know the Condition of Nature to have been once such, that Men, in those Days, before the Settlement of Natural or of Civil Laws, wandred separately about the Fields, and possess'd no more than what they could get or keep, by Mutual Force and Wounds and Slaughters. Now between our present way of Life polish'd with Humanity and Civility, and that Rude and Barbarous Course, the only distinguishing Marks are Law and Violence. Vid. de Invent. l. i.

(1) It is reasonable to believe, that God Almighty instructed Men at first in many things necessary to Life, which for want of Time and Experience they could not otherwise have found out. This appears particularly from Genes. 3. 21. where it is said, God made Coats of Skins and clothed them; or, as the Hebrew expresses it, taught them how to do it.

in a State of Natural Liberty. And then we might pronounce of all Mankind, as Euripides does of the Cyclops, they would be as Wandering Swains, never hearing, and never heeding one another. Hobbs has been lucky enough in painting the Inconveniences of such a State. Out of Society (says (a) he) we are defended only by our single Strength; in Society, by the Strength of all. Out of Society no Man is sure to keep Possession of what his Industry has gain'd; in Society every Body is secure from that danger. To conclude, out of Society we have the Tyranny of Passions, War, Fear, Poverty, Filthiness, Barbarity, Ignorance and Wildness; in Society we have the Sway of Reason, Peace, Security, Riches, Decency of Ornament, Company, Elegancy, Knowledge and Benevolence (b): And I believe there cannot be a more effectual way found out to silence the Complaints and Murmurs of the Common People, when they pretend to find fault with the Mis-carriages and the Impositions of the Government; than if we would lay before them a true Prospect of the Misery and Confusion which attends a Natural State. Which trouble those Persons had certainly a right Notion of, who brought into a Proverbial Saying, That unless there were such things in the World as Courts of Justice, Men would infallibly devour one another.

III. What kind of Rights attend Men in a State of Nature we may easily gather, as well from that Inclination common to all living things, by which they cannot but embrace and practise with the greatest Readiness and Vigour all possible ways of preserving their Body and their Life, and of overcoming all such things as seem to drive at their Destruction; as from this other Consideration, that Persons living in such a State are not subject to any Sovereignty or Command. For from the former Reflexion it follows, that Men plac'd after this manner in a Natural State, may use and enjoy the Common Goods and Blessing, and may act and pursue whatever makes for their own Preservation, while they do not hence injure the Right of the rest. From the latter Supposition it is clear, that they may use not only their own Strength, but their own Judgment and Will (provided they are form'd and guided according to the Law of Nature) for procuring their own Defence and Safety. And in this respect likewise, the State we are treating of has obtain'd the Name of Natural Liberty; in as much as, antecedently to all Human Pact and Deed, every Man is conceiv'd to be perfectly in his own Power and Disposal, and not to be controll'd by the Pleasure or Authority of any other. On which account too, every Man may be thus acknowledg'd equal to every Man, since all Subjection and all Command are equally banish'd on both sides. According to this Temperament, we ought to correct and explain those Assertions laid down by Mr. Hobbs, in the Beginning of his Book de Cive, That the first Foundation of Natural Right, is the Liberty which each Man hath, to preserve, as far as he is able, his own Life and Limbs, and to apply all his Endeavours towards the guarding his Body from Death, and from Pains. From which it follows, That since 'tis in vain to have a Right to the End, if one has not likewise a Right to the Means, therefore every Man has a Right of using all Means, and of doing all Actions, without which he cannot defend and ensure himself. But now since in a Natural State no Man is subject to another as to a Superior, to whose Pleasure his own Will and Judgment should be submitted, hence every Man is by Natural Right a Judge, whether the Means which he uses and the Actions which he performs, are necessary to the Preservation of his own Life and Limbs or not. For altho' in this case one Man should pretend to give Advice to another, yet the other not having subjected his Will and Judgment to his Control, may still judge of this Advice, whether it be proper and expedient to be follow'd or not. And therefore he may perhaps do according as he was advis'd, but then it will not be for the sake of the Counsellor, but because he himself approves of the Proposal; and consequently he will at last act by the Determination of his own Judgment. From all which he concludes, That Nature has given to every one a Right to all things; that is in a meer natural State, or before Men had bound themselves to one another by any Covenants, it was lawful for every one, to do all things whatsoever and against whomsoever he pleas'd; and to possess, use, and enjoy all that he would or could. Whence it may be understood, that in a State of Nature, Profit or Utility is the Measure of Right. Which Notions however Paradoxical they appear at first View, yet no Man can fairly draw from them a Licence of doing any thing to any Person, who considers that Hobbs even in this State of Nature supposes a Man Subject to the Laws of Nature, and to the Government of sound Reason. But since such an unbounded and injurious Licence could never by any Man in his Wits, be thought a likely Means for the lasting Preservation of himself, we must presume that it was never granted or intended by Nature. And suppose some Man should be so extravagant as to endeavour the putting it in Practice, it's plain his Experiment would turn in a high manner to his own Prejudice and Mischiefe. So that the only fair Sense of Hobbs's Principle is this; the things which make for the Preservation of Men, Nature has laid in common, before they have divided them amongst themselves by Covenant: And he that has no

Superior, may by the Direction of his own best and soundest Reason, do any thing that is truly conducive to his lasting Safety. But if that Philosopher really intended his Words, with the same Harshness and the same gross Appearance which their Countenance bears, and to reject our kind and favourable Interpretation, the Fault is his own, and let him shift how he can to escape the perpetual Censure and Reprehension of wise Men. This is evident, that the Author of the Theologico-Political Treatise, who goes commonly by the Name of Spinoza, has describ'd that Right of all Men to all things which attend a Natural State, in most horrid and barbarous Terms; and therefore it may not be improper to take the Trouble of discussing his Notions on the Point. By the Right and Institution of Nature, he understands nothing else, but the Rules of the Nature of every Individual thing, according to which we conceive every one of them to be naturally determin'd to a certain manner of Existence and of Operation. For example, Fishes are naturally determin'd to swim, and the bigger of them to eat the lesser; and therefore Fishes by the highest Natural Right, possess the Water, and by the same Right, the larger kinds of them prey on the smaller. Here it is observable, that by the Term of Right, he does not express any Law directive of an Action, but only the Power of acting, and what may be done without Injury, and that therefore 'tis by no means a fair Conclusion; that one ought necessarily to do all those things, which one has a Right of doing. Farther, as it is an improper Acceptation of the Term of Natural Law, to make it denote that according to which every thing acts by a certain and determinate manner, so is it likewise improper to apply the Name of Right to that Power and manner of acting which appears in Irrational Beings: For he alone can be truly said to have a Right of acting, who acts on previous Reason and Deliberation. He proceeds to tell us, that Nature absolutely consider'd has the highest Right of doing whatever it can; that the Right of Nature extends it self, as far as the Power of Nature: for the Power of Nature is the very Power of God, who hath the highest Right to all things. Here, if by Nature absolutely consider'd, he mean God in Conjunction with all created things, we grant his Assertion, and willingly acknowledge in God the highest Right to all things, yet such a Right as is suited to the Perfections of his Essence. But if by Nature he understand the University of Created Beings, as contra-distinguish'd to the Creator, then we may deny the Power of Nature to be the Power of God himself, or that these two Powers have the same Latitude and Extent. The Power of Nature is indeed produc'd by God, but not in such a manner as to exhaust all the Power of the Divinity, but to contain it self within the Bounds prescrib'd by its Author. His next Inference runs thus, Since the universal Power of all Nature is no- thing else but the Power of all the Individuals taken together, it follows that each Individual has the highest Right to all things that it can compass, or that the Right of each Individual extends it self as far as the determinate Power of the same Individual. But 'tis beyond me to apprehend the Conclusiveness of this Argument, The Power of all Nature is the Power of all the Individuals together, therefore each Individual has the highest right to all things. For is it not rather true, that each Individual has a certain and definite Share or Portion of Right; and that therefore no particular Individual can fairly arrogate to it self that Right, which is proper to all, as they make up one Universal Nature? He adds, And because it is a supreme Law of Nature, that every thing endeavour as far as it is able to continue in its own State, and this not without any regard or respect to other things, but only to it self, hence it follows, that each Individual has the highest Right to this Advantage; that is, to exist and to operate as it is naturally determin'd. Here, besides that Law of Nature is us'd in an improper Sense, it is apparently false as to Men at least, that their Nature is so determin'd, as to make them endeavour their own Preservation and Continuance with respect to themselves only, without any Care or Consideration for others. Properly speaking, those things are said to be Naturally determin'd which are tied to an uniform Method of acting, and are so contra-distinguish'd to Free Agents: And therefore Men as to those Actions which are left to their own Guidance and Direction, are determin'd to certain Ways and Courses not by Nature, but by some Law; and consequently they are not presently invest'd with a Right of doing all things within the reach of their Natural Powers and Abilities. But the Vanity of such Reasonings will more fully appear, if divesting them of their dark Turnings and Intricacies we thus clearly propose them; God has the Highest Right to all things; the Power of Nature is the Power of God, therefore Nature has a Right to all things: But the Power of Nature is the Power of all the Individuals together; therefore each Individual has a Right to all things. Let any Man judge whether the Connexion in this Argument be just or not. Spinoza very fallily declares, that in this Point no difference ought to be made between Men, and the other Individuals of Nature; or between Men who understand and exercise Reason, and those who do not; nor between Men in their Wits, and Fools and Madmen. For, as to the first part of this Assertion, the Question of Right ought not to proceed but about the Right of Men. And as to the latter part, although some Men may have a quicker and some a slower use of Reason, yet whoever has any use at all of that Faculty may at least understand thus much, that in order to his own Preservation he has no need of an unlimited Right to all things, and that therefore such a Right doth by no means means belong to him. As for those who have no manner of use of Reason, 'twould be frivolous to dispute about their Right; nor from the unhappy Circumstances of diseas'd Persons, can we pronounce any thing about the Natural Condition of Mankind: Nor is it impossible for any one of these poor Creatures to be preserv'd otherwise than by a Right to all things. The Reason which he subjoins is equally vain and fruitless, For whatsoever any thing acts by the Laws of its Nature, it acts with the highest Right; in as much as it acts as it is by Nature determin'd, and cannot do otherwise. Because we deny Man when he acts by the Laws of his Nature, to affect a Right to all things, or to be determin'd by Nature to the Exercise of any such Right. Spinoza's Conclusion therefore is false, Amongst Men, as they are consider'd to live only under the Command of Reason; he who is not come to a Knowledge of Reason, or who has not yet acquir'd a Habit of Virtue, doth as well by the highest Right live according to the Laws of his Appetite, as he who directs his Life by the Laws of Reason. That is, as a wise Man has the highest Right to all things, which Reason suggests, or according to the Rational Laws of living; so an ignorant and senseless Person has the highest Right to all things which his Appetite affects, or according to the Laws of living by Appetite. But now the Natural State or the Command and Dominion of Nature, supposes Reason in Men, nor are other Laws prescrib'd to the sagacious and others to the simple. Those who are govern'd purely by Appetite, are Subjects incapable of Right or Law. But when the Appetite in Men proceeds contrary to their Reason, they are so far from living by any Right, or by any Laws, that they are continually guilty of transgressing the Laws. The Corollaries which he deduces, are no truer than the foregoing Propositions. The Natural Right of each Man is not determin'd by sound Reason, but by Desire and by Power. For all Men are not naturally determin'd to operate according to the Rules and the Laws of Reason; but on the contrary, all are born ignorant of all things, and before they can attain to know the true and rational way of living, and acquire the Habit of Virtue, a great part of their Age, (although they have been well educated,) passes away; and yet notwithstanding all this, they are in the mean time bound to live, and to preserve themselves to the best of their Power; and this Obligation is fulfilled by obeying the sole motion of their Appetite, since Nature has yet given them no other Guide, denying them the actual Power of living by sound Reason; and therefore they are no more oblig'd to live by the Laws of true Sense and Judgment, than a Cat is oblig'd to live by such Laws as are proper only to the Nature of a Lion. For to make a Man oblig'd to live according to Reason, it is not necessary that he should be naturally determin'd to act according to the Laws of Reason, that is, that he should not be able to act otherwise; but it is sufficient that he has so much Natural Power, as may enable him to abstain from bringing Injuries and Troubles on other Men; than which nothing in the World can be more easy. Neither is the manner and method of preserving himself so very difficult and laborious, as to make him stand in need of a Right to all things. And then from him who through defect of Age is yet in absolute Ignorance, none can acquire a more accurate Direction of his Proceedings, than is consistent with his low Capacity, and his small and feeble Efforts of Reason. But that what is done in this State of Simplicity may not prove very hurtful or troublesome to others, Nature has carefully provided; by giving it so little Strength of its own, and by commending the Care and Guidance of it to those of maturer Years. The following Inference is as false as the former. Whatsoever therefore any one, consider'd only under the Command and Guidance of Nature, shall judge convenient for himself, either by the Direction of Reason, or by the Impulse of his Passions, this by the highest Natural Right he may desire, and may seize upon by whatever he can, whether by Force, or by Fraud, or by Entreaty, or the easiest way he can think of; and consequently he may reckon every one his Enemy, who would hinder him from satisfying his Inclinations. As also this, Whence it follows, that the Right and the Institution of Nature, under which all are Born and the most part Live, is averse to nothing, besides that which none can desire, and which none can hinder; not to Contentions, not to Hatred, not to Anger, not to Deceit, nor absolutely to any thing which it's possible for the Appetite to pursue. This Assertion if applied to Men is manifestly false and absurd. But if it includes all Living Creatures, and be meant in this Sense, that there is no way or manner of Self-Preservation, which some Animate Being doth not follow and make use of, out of Natural Instinct, then it is nothing to the purpose; since the only Question is, whether Men have such a Right to all things as they may use against all other Men. But that Spinoza intended the latter Sense is evident from what follows; And no wonder, for Nature is not restrain'd to the Laws of Human Reason, which concern only the true Profit and Preservation of Men; but Comprehends an Infinity of other things, which fall under the Universal Order of all Nature, of which Man is but a little part. He afterwards confesses, that it is more convenient for Men to live according to the Laws and infallible Dictates of Reason, which point out their true Interest and Advantage. But then what occasion was there for the feigning of such a Right, as Man, if he intended to be safe, must necessarily relinquish; while other Animals which exercise a kind of Right to all things, lie under no necessity of quitting it for their own Preservation? Neither indeed, could such an absurd Abdication be necessary for Man, upon supposal, that Nature

Nature had invest'd him with the same Right.

IV. We are ready to acknowledge it for a most certain Truth, that all Mankind did never exist together in a mere Natural State: In as much as upon the Divine Authority of the Scriptures, we believe all Human Race to have proceeded from one Original Pair. Now it's plain, that Eve was subject to Adam (a); And those who were born of these Primitive Parents, and so on, did immediately fall under Paternal Authority and under Family Government. But such a State might have befallen Mankind, if, as some of the Heathens believ'd, they had in the Beginning of their Being, leapt out of the Earth like Frogs, or had come up from Seed, like Cadmus's Human Crop (1). Which Fable is, methinks, a very exact Representation of that State of Nature, and of that War of all Men against all, which Hobbes would introduce; where

————— *furit omnis turba, suoq;
Marte cadunt subiti per mutua vulnera fratres.*

Rage hurries all; and in so Blind a Fray,
The sudden Brothers fall a Mutual Prey.

A State of Nature then did never naturally exist, unless qualified, and, as it were, in part; namely, while some Party of Men join'd with some more in a Civil Body, or in some Confederacy like that; but still retain'd a Natural Liberty against all others. (Tho' it must be own'd that the more and the smaller those Societies were, into which Men at first divided, the nearer Approach was made to a meer Natural State.) Thus of old when Mankind were parted into distinct Families, and now since they are fallen into separate Communities, those might have been then, and may now be said to live mutually in a State of Nature, neither of whom obey the others, and who do not acknowledge any Common Matter among Men. Thus in the Primitive Age, when Brethren left their Father's House, and set up Particular Families for themselves independent from any other, then they began to live in a Natural State or Liberty. Therefore not the first Mortals, but their Offspring did actually exist in such a State. Now a State of Nature thus temper'd and qualified is attended with none of those Inconveniences, which follow a meer Natural Liberty, especially if we apply it to Publick Communities: And besides, it passes for the highest pitch of Honour amongst Mortals, by Virtue of the united Strength of the whole Publick Body to acknowledge no Earthly Superior. So that Common-wealths, and the Governours of them, may fairly declare themselves to be in a State of Natural Liberty, while they are furnish'd with sufficient Strength to secure the Exercise of that Grand Privilege. Whereas, when Men live singly in a meer Natural

State, it is no manner of Pleasure or Advantage to them to own no Superior; in as much as upon account of their own small Force and Ability, their Safety must needs be in perpetual Doubt and Danger.

There are some indeed who maintain with great Eagerness, that such a Natural State either doth not at all exist, or is not rightly call'd Natural; and they form their Argument in the following manner. Nature inclines Men to an Orderly Society or Fellowship; now there being no such thing as Order without Government, it follows that there can be no Society without Government, and that therefore Government or Command, ought rather to be stil'd Natural than Liberty. To strengthen this Assertion, they alledge the Authority of Cicero; Nothing (says he (b), is so agreeable to the Right and to the Condition of Nature, as Government: Without which, no House, no State, no Nation, not Human Race in General, not the Universal Nature of things, not the World it self could stand. For the World obeys GOD, and the Seas and the Earth obey the Superior Frame of the World, and the Life of Man is led in Conformity to the High and the Sovereign Law. Hence they bring a general Accusation against Hobbes, for feigning such a State under the Name of Natural, as is unworthy of Human Nature, and more agreeable to that of Beasts, who are ignorant of Reason and of Speech. For that all Men should have a Liberty of doing, of desiring, of possessing all things, no Reason, no Nature truly and rightly judging can advise. Such Inclinations may indeed flow from deprav'd Nature, but cannot be the Dictates of right Reason, which by desiring Society, doth at the same time desire an Order in Society, and by that means cuts off all such licentious and irregular Motions. For what Order can be conceiv'd without tending to some first and principal Point? This first and principal Point must be Government, or the Sovereign Power in Society, without regard to which, no Society can be desir'd by Thinking and Speaking Beings. Nature it self instructs us, that Government is essential to all Society, but that such a Liberty as excludes all Government, tends to unnatural Confusion (c).

What may be return'd in answer to all this Process of Argument, is clear from the preceding Doctrine. A meer Natural State, is a Representation of Mens Condition abstracting from all Human Institution; but doth not suppose that Nature intended Man for such a way of Life. For by the same Allowance of Expression, an entire Ignorance of all things may be said to be Natural to Man, or to be born with him; without implying any such thing as that it should be repugnant to Nature for Man to acquire very high degrees of Knowledge. Besides, we have been so cautious as to attribute no such Natural Liberty to Man, as shall be exempt from the Obligation of Natural Law, or of Divine Commands. But such a Liberty as excludes all Human Sovereignty and Superiority cannot be said to contradict Nature, any more than it can be said to reach as far as Infinite it self. Government indeed is Natural; that is, it was the Design of Nature, that Men should constitute Governments amongst themselves. But this doth not make it e'er the less Natural, that he who himself bears the Supreme Government and Command amongst Men, should himself be exempt from all other Human Command, and in that Sense should enjoy a Natural Liberty: Unless in the same Order, we can fancy somewhat before the first, somewhat Superior to the Supreme. Upon the same account it is in General very agreeable to Nature, that he who hath no Lord or Master, should govern himself and his Actions, by the Guidance of his Private Reason.

V. There is a Dispute of much greater Consequence, whether this Natural State, in regard to other Men, bears the Semblance of War or of Peace: Or which comes to the same thing, whether they who live in a State of Nature, that is, who do neither obey one another, nor own a Common Lord, ought to be reckon'd Enemies amongst themselves, or quiet and peaceful Friends. And here our first and chief Business must be to examine the Opinion of Hobbes, who as he calls his meer Natural State not a single War, but a War of all Men against all, so he maintains, that when some Men have agreed to enter into a Society they immediately quit their hostile State in regard to one another, but still continue against all the rest of the World. Thus in his Book de Cive C. 9. §. 3. Every Man is an Enemy to every Man whom he neither serves nor obeys. (He ought to have added, and with whom he has no Common Master) And again, C. 13. §. 7. The State of Common-wealths amongst themselves, is Natural, that is, Hostile. And tho' they cease to Fight, yet this Intermiſſion muſt not be call'd a Peace but a Breathing-time, during which each Enemy, observing the Motions and the Countenance of the other, rates his Security, not by Covenants, but by the Strength and Designs of his Adversary. He should have added, and by his own force (a). He adds in his Leviathan, Cap. 13. that War consists not in Battle only, or the Act of Fighting, but in a Tract of time, wherein the Will to contend by Battle is sufficiently known: And that therefore the Notion of Time is to be consider'd in the Nature of War as in the Nature of Weather. For as the Foul Weather lyeth not in a Shower or two of Rain, but in an Inclination thereto for many days together: So the Nature of War consists not in actual fighting; but in the known Dis- position thereto, during all the time there is no assurance to the contrary. Nor indeed was Hobbes the first Inventor of these Notions; for we meet with somewhat much of the same strain in Plato's First Book of Laws; where Clinias a Cretan is giving the Reasons why the Law-giver of that Country introduc'd a great Number of Ordinances in Reference to Military Affairs, he concludes Ἄνοταν δὴ ποὶ δουρεῖ, &c. By which conduct he seems to me to have accus'd many Men of extreme Folly and Ignorance, in their not being sensible, that all Cities are in a perpetual War with all. And that which we call Peace is no more than a bare Name, while in Reality Nature has set all Communities in an Un-proclaim'd War against one another.

We may observe by the way, that some Authors have given a very unaccurate Explication of this great Question; while they tell us, that by a Natural State is understood that Condition by which we are conceiv'd to live singly, or out of Society; and that this is a State of War, that is, of Inclination to possess what another hath, and to drive the Owner from it; so that their whole meaning amounts to this, that if Men liv'd without all Society, they would be engag'd in a perpetual Quarrel; or, if Men did not lead a Social Life, they would continue in a State of endless Discord. But now here's a great Impropriety committed, the opposing a State of Nature to a Social Life; for those who live in a State of Nature both may, and ought, and frequently do, consent to live Socially.

But since upon this Question rightly stated, are founded almost all the Pretensions and all the Debates which can fall out between the Governors of one Common-wealth, and their Neighbours of other Countries or Dominions; we imagine it will not be lost Labour, if we proceed to a closer and a stricter discussion of the Arguments alledg'd on either hand.

VI. That the State of Nature then is a State of War, Hobbes endeavours in this manner to demonstrate. The reason why Man is continually in fear of Man, and consequently in a State of War with him, he draws from this Principle, that Men have both the Power and the Will of hurting one another. That they have the Power of hurting one another, he shews by observing, that Men of ripe and settled Age, are commonly equal in Strength. For tho' one may frequently have the Advantage of another in Bodily Force; Yet 'tis possible that the Weakest may kill the Strongest, either by secret Machination or by Confederacy with others; in as much as the Stoutest Mortal has his Vital Parts no better ensur'd from extreme Violence, than the most Puny and Impotent Wretch (b). Neither is it probable that a larger degree of Natural cunning (in which of two Men one commonly exceeds the other) should be able to secure a Man's Safety, while he has no Guard, and no Protector but himself. Farther, since the greatest Evil that Men can bring upon one another is Death, and since this may as well be brought on the stout by the weakly, as on the weakly by the stout, he says it follows that those who can bring on one another the greatest Evil, must, in effect, be of equal Power and Strength. As to the Will of hurting others, this, he says, is in some Men out of Necessity, and in some out of Lust and Pleasure. For while some are for living as they list, for arrogating to themselves undue Honours, and for petulantly setting on their quiet Neighbours, it's impossible but that those Neighbours, how modest soever they may be, and how willing soever to allow others an equal Liberty with themselves, must necessarily defend themselves against the Violence of their Assailants (a): Besides, he tells us, that the Will of hurting arises frequently from the Contention of Wit, while every Man thinks himself wiser than his Fellows, and yet at the same time cannot bear the same Arrogance in others. Hence, he says, it comes to pass, that it is not only odious to contradict, but likewise not to consent: For not to consent to another in a thing, is tacitely to accuse him of Error in that Matter; and to dissent in very many things, is as much as to count him a Fool, in not being able to apprehend such an evident Truth, as every one takes his own Opinion to be (b). Hence, since all Pleasure and Satisfaction of Mind consists in this, that one be able to prefer ones self to others, 'tis impossible but that now and then some Signs of Contempt towards others will break out; than which no Affront is more provoking to Human Minds (c). The last and most frequent Cause of a mutual Desire of hurting, arises, according to Hobbes, from hence, that many desire one and the same thing at once, which frequently they neither can nor will enjoy in common, nor yet divide: From whence it follows, that it must be given to the stronger; and who is the stronger can only be known by fighting (d). Upon all these accounts he declares it to be impossible but that Men should live in perpetual Fear and Suspicion of one another. And that since not only Natural Passion but Reason too, recommends to every Man his own Safety in the highest manner, and indulges him in the Use of all Means for the attaining of that end, the Fitness of which, no Superior being yet admitted, is to be determin'd by each Man's particular Judgment; hence there must necessarily arise a desire rather of preventing others, than of yielding to their Invasion: From whence there will at last result a State of Infinite War, of all Men against all; the Consequence of which is, that it shall be lawful for any Man to do to any Man either secretly or openly, whatever he shall think expedient for his own Affairs: In doing which, altho' his Reason should sometimes fail him, yet he would not offer an Injury to any Body, since Justice and Injustice have nothing to do but with Societies and establish'd Corporations: Tho' a Man may indeed sin against Reason, by using unfit Means for his own Preservation.

VII. These Notions are in some measure tolerable, if propos'd only by way of Hypothesis. And that Hobbes design'd them for nothing more, we may be apt to conclude from those Words in the 8th Chapter of his Book de Cive, But to return again to a Natural State, and to consider Men as if they were just now risen out of

(c) Cicero. Off. 1. Whatever is of that Nature, as not to admit more than to excel in it at the same time, usually proveth the Subject of so much Strife and Contention, as exceedingly to endanger the Sacred Peace of Society. It is a Perverseness not peculiar to the Grecian Levity, to reproach those from whom they differ in Opinion. Idem de Finib. 1. 2. Add. Charron de la Sageffe. 1. 1. c. 40. n. 6, 7, 8. (d) Thus Socrates discourseth Xenophon Apomnem. 1. 1. Men have partly a natural Propension to Friendship. For they stand in need of each others Assistance, and are comforted with each others Pity, and make the return of Mutual Thanks, upon receiving Mutual Helps and Favours. And partly they are inclin'd to Enmity; for taking a fancy to the same things, as good and pleasant, they must needs fall into Quarrel and Opposition about them. Now Anger and Contention are the proper Marks and Characters of Enemies. And then Envy, and Suspicion, and Covetousness, never fail to produce the most violent Hatred. Senec. de Ira 1. 2. c. 34. The desiring the same thing, which ought to be the Band of Love and Friendship, is often the Cause of Hatred and Sedition. For these which they affect being perhaps small, and not to be possess'd by one, unless he can take them forcibly from another, administer occasion to fighting and reviling. the Earth like a Mushroom, and of full Stature, without any manner of Obligation to one another. Yet in the 13th Chapter of the same Book, and frequently in other places, he calls the State of Publick Bodies, not by way of Supposition, but seriously and absolutely Natural, that is, as he explains it, Hostile. Which seeming Contrariety we may do him the Justice thus to reconcile; it shall be pure Hypothesis, that all Men did at any time live together in such a State of Nature, as they would have done if they had risen suddenly in a great Multitude from the Earth: But what he seriously maintains shall be only this, that such a Natural State doth really exist amongst some Men; that is, amongst such as are neither subject one to the other, nor to a Common Master, as is now the Case with all establish'd Communities. And this indeed is his own Judgment, as he has moderated it in his Leviathan. Though (says he) there never had been any time, wherein particular Men were in a Condition of War one against another; yet in all times, Kings and Persons of Sovereign Authority, because of their Independency, are in continual Jealousies, and in the State and Posture of Gladiators, &c.

But the contrary Opinion seems more reasonable, as what is clearly favour'd by the Origine of Mankind, as related in the Infallible Records of Holy Scripture; which represent the Natural State of Man, not Hostile, but Peaceful, and shew that Men in their true Condition are rather hearty Friends than spiteful Foes. From these Sacred Histories we learn, that the First Man being by Divine Power produc'd out of the Earth, a Companion was soon join'd to him different in Sex, whose Substance was therefore taken out of him, to engage him immediately in the deepest Love and Affection for her, as being Bone of his Bone, and Flesh of his Flesh. This Primitive and Original Couple GOD ALMIGHTY was pleas'd to unite in the most solemn manner, and with the most sacred Tie; and since from them all Human Race orderly descended, we may conceive Mankind mutually engag'd, not only by such a vulgar Friendship as might result from Similitude of Nature (a), but by such a tender Affection as endears Persons allied by a nearness of Race and of Blood: Altho' the Sence of this kind Passion may be almost worn off amongst the Descendants, by reason of their great distance from the Common Stock. Now if any Man should pretend to divest himself of this Affection, and entertain a temper of Hostility against all others, he ought to be censur'd as a Revolter from the Primitive and Natural State of Mankind. Nor will it signifie much here to object, that even from this Account of Matters it follows, that the Natural State of Men is a State of War; in as much as if Societies were therefore instituted at the beginning of the World, to make Men live peaceably together, it must be true on the contrary side, that without Societies Men would not have liv'd Peaceably, and that hence arose the Necessity of making Societies be born with them. To which we reply, that our present Enquiries are not made after such a Natural State, as may be conceiv'd by the help of Abstraction, but after such an one as really has been and is now in the World. And that therefore, since the first Mortals were plac'd in such a State as inspir'd them with Love and not with Enmity, and since from this State all the rest of Mankind descended, it is plain if Men were mindful of their first Original, they might be rather accounted Friends than Foes. Nor were Societies therefore establish'd amongst Men from the Beginning, to hinder a Natural State from taking place, but because Human Kind could not otherwise have been propagated and preserv'd. But a State of Nature did then arise, when Men being largely multiplied could no longer be contain'd in one Society. Hence it's Non-sence to say, that without the help of a Social Condition, Mankind at the beginning of their Being would have liv'd like Enemies one to another, unless we first suppose, that in the beginning of things a Multitude of Men started up together, without being beholden to one another for their Production (b).

VIII. As to Mr. Hobbes's Reasons they are easily answer'd. In the first place, those cannot immediately hurt one another, who are divided by distance of Place; for he who is absent cannot hurt me, except by some-body else who is present, and my Possessions cannot be destroy'd unless by one upon the Spot: Therefore, since those who live separately or at a distance from one another, can offer no mutual hurt so long as they continue thus distant, it doth not appear why such Men should not rather be reckon'd Friends than Enemies.

(a) And such as is spoken of in L. 3. D. de Justit. & Jure. (b) *Aristot. Rhetor. 1. 1. c. 11. Because whatever is according to Nature, is pleasant and agreeable, and because those things which are allied in their Original have a Natural Resemblance to each other, all things that are thus related and thus alike are, commonly speaking, as mutually delightful as Man to Man. Cicero de Fin. 1. 3. Nature hath given Men an Universal Recommendation to each other; on which account, every Man owes so much to his Neighbour barely for the sake of being a Man, like him self, as should hinder him from showing any Unkindness or Strangeness. Idem de Nat. Deor. 1. 1. Do you not see how full Nature is of Charms and Engagements, as if she intended to act the kind Procureess to her self? Do you imagine there is any Monster of Land or Sea, which is not delighted with the Fellow-Monster of its own Race and Shape? And is it any Wonder then, that she should have instill'd this Principle into Man (the most Noble Member of her Family) to think nothing so beautiful as Man? Quincil. Declam. 5. There is a Publick, or Universal, Kindred amongst Men, derived from Nature their Common Mother. Add. M. Antonin. 1. 9. f. 9. Where he prosecutes at large, the Argument of the Likeness of Nature, inclining Men to Unity and Love. Add. & D. Cumberland. de L. N. c. 2. f. 18. We must interpret only of particular Love and Hatred that Saying of Belisarius in *Procop. Hist. Vandal. 1. 2. By Nature Men have neither Mutual Affection nor Mutual Aversion. But their particular Actions, either by their Agreeableness inviting our Company and Friendship, or by their contrary Dispositions provoking our Hostility, render some the Objects of our Love, others of our Hate.

For if any Person is more inclin'd to call them Neuters, he ought to understand, that the Term of Friendship may be there fairly applied, where there is neither Will nor Power to injure (1). And then as for that Equality of Strength which Hobbes asserts, it is certainly more fit to restrain, than to provoke a Desire of hurting. For no Man in his Wits is very fond of coming to an Encounter with his Equal, unless he is either driven upon it by Necessity, or by the Fairness of the Opportunity put in hopes of Success. Otherwise, to engage in an unnecessary Fight, where the Blows one gives will be return'd with no less Force, and where the Event is merely dubious, is no better than Fool-hardiness. For when two equal Combatants are so far engag'd as to put both their Lives in danger, neither of them can possibly gain so much by the Victory, as he must lose who is kill'd in the Fight; nor is it so much to have taken away Another's Life, as to have hazard-ed ones own. For the Danger to which I expose my Life, takes from me more Good, than can possibly accrue to me from my Enemies Life being in the same Danger; nor is his Safety increas'd upon account of the Uncertainty of mine: But each Party is a Loser, and yet the Loss of neither turns to the Advantage of the other (a).

Besides, the Causes alledg'd by Mr. Hobbes, why Men must have a mutual Desire of hurting, are only particular, and therefore cannot infer a necessity of an Universal War of all Men against all, but only a War of some particular Men against some others. And then it doth not always happen, as he would suppose, that modest and civil Men, should have a more Fierce and Insolent Generation living near them; or if the case be so, yet it is not necessary that the latter should be in a humour of invading the former. Contention of Wit, prevails only amongst Men exalted above the Ordinary Level; the Greater and Vulgar part of Mankind have none or but very slight touches of that Disease. Nor has the All-wise Creator been so unkind or so sparing in his Provisions for Human Race, that two Persons must always lay claim to the same thing. Farther, the general Wickedness of Men may have so much effect as to hinder any one from rashly trusting, or offering (as it were) his bare Breast to another, especially if he has not a Knowledge of him (b): But that this Suspicion or Diffidence should proceed so far as to the seizing or the oppressing another, unless he hath declar'd a particular Desire and Design to hurt us, no Man of Sense will admit (c). Hobbes is the more inexcusable for maintaining that his Natural State cannot be remov'd and broken up, but by letting in the Sovereignty of another, and by uniting in the same Commonwealth. For that those Commonwealths how distinct soever, which are allied by Friendship and by Leagues, should still continue in a State of Mutual War, is a Contradiction evident to the common Sense of Mankind. Nor should we (as he would have us,) discard all Peace, as not deserving that Name, which is not sufficiently firm and certain, any more than we should forbear saying, that such a Man is in Grace and Favour with another, because the Wills of Men are subject to continual Alterations.

IX. We must likewise take special Care to observe, that we are not disputing about the Natural State of a meer Animal, govern'd by the sole Impulse and Inclination of the Sensitive Soul; but of an Animal whose Noblest and Chiefest Part is Reason, the Soveregin and Controller of all other Faculties; and which even in a Natural State has a common, a firm and an uniform Measure to go by; namely, the Nature of things; which lastly, is very free and ready in offering it self so far as to instruct us in the general Precepts of Living, and the Dictates of Natural Law. And those who would rightly design and represent a State of Nature; ought by no means to exclude the just use of this Reason, but should join it with the Operations of the other Faculties. For as much then as Man has not only the rash Cry of his Lusts, but also the sober Voice of Reason (not measuring it self purely by private Interest) to hearken to, if his wild Affections incite him to a War, such as that extravagant one of all Men against all, his Reason will be more powerful in dissuading him from it; and that chiefly by giving him these two Intimations, that a War undertaken without Provocation from the other Party, is both unseemly and unprofitable. For it is easy for any Man to gather thus much, that he did not exist of himself, but was produc'd by some Superior, who consequently retains a Power and Authority over him. And when he finds himself spurr'd on as it were by a double Principle, of which one is wholly fixt on things present, the other can embrace in its Thought what is absent or future; of which one drives him furiously

(1) This is contrary to Aristotle's Notion of Friendship, who makes it to consist, not only in doing no Injury to others, but in the real and outward performance of Kindness towards them. (a) See D. Cumberland de L. N. c. 2. f. 29. Thus the Scythians argue in Q. Curtius l. 7. c. 8. The firmest Friendship is between Equals, and those seem properly to be Equals, who have not made Experience of each other's Strength. So Cæsar (de B. C. l. 3.) admonisheth Pompey, that this was the only time to treat of Peace, whilst both seem'd Equal, and each had good confidence of his own Power. Florus makes the like Remark on another occasion. The ROMANS and the PARTHIANS, says he, having try'd their Force against each other, and CARSSUS on the side of the former, and PACORUS of the latter, having given them Examples of their Mutual Abilities, they renew'd their ancient Friendship with equal Deference and Respect. In Thucydides, l. 3. Mutual Fear is asserted to be the surest Guard of States, because on either side the doubting of their Safety would keep them from any open Attempt of Violence, though it were never so much in their Desires. (b) Plautus Asinar. A Man doth not shew himself a Man, but a Wolf, to another, whose Temper and Designs he is not acquainted with. (c) Cicero (Off. 1.) rightly calls it, an Injury out of Fear, when he that is contriving to do another Man mischief, doth it by way of Prevention, supposing he should otherwise suffer Hurt from the Quarter where he now offers it.

on Dangers, Doubts, and Disorders, the other conducts him to nothing but what is Comely and Safe, he will conclude without any Difficulty, that 'tis the Pleasure of his Creator, he should rather follow the latter Guide than the former. And when to this Consideration is added the exceeding great Benefit and Advantage of that quiet Condition which Reason advises, a Man cannot but naturally incline to Peace. Especially, since if at any time he should happen to neglect his Reason, and follow his blind Passions, he would find by the sad Event that he took wrong Measures, and would be ready to wish those things to be undone, which were done against the Orders and Directions of his Noblest Faculty. From all which we conclude, that the Natural State of Men, although they be consider'd as not united in Commonwealths, is not War, but Peace. And this Peace chiefly depends on the following Laws and Conditions; that no Man hurt another, who doth not assault and provoke him; that every one allow others to enjoy their own Goods and Possessions; that he faithfully perform whatever shall be covenanted for, and voluntarily promote the Interest and Happiness of others, in all Cases where a stricter Obligation doth not interfere. For since the Natural State of Man includes the use of Reason, we must by no means separate from it those Obligations which Reason tells us we lie under. And because every Man may discover it to be most for his Interest and

Advantage, so to manage his Behaviour as to procure rather the Benevolence than the Enmity of others; he may easily presume from the likeness of Nature, that other Men have the same Sentiments about the Point as himself. Therefore it is very foul Play, in describing this Imaginary State, to suppose that all Men, or however, the greatest part of them do act with Disregard and Defiance to Reason, which is by Nature constituted supreme Directress of Human Proceedings; and such a State cannot without the highest Absurdity, be call'd Natural, which owes its Production to the Neglect or to the Abuse of the Natural Principle in Man (a).

X. It will be in vain for any one here to object, the strange Barbarity which reign'd among most of the Ancient Nations and People; who seem to have had scarce any other Pleasure, or any other Business, but the Pursuits of Plunder and Prey; and amongst whom Robbery pass'd for one of the particular Professions and ways of Living. For thus Aristotle in his Politicks, reckoning up the several Callings or Lives of the Herdsmen, the Husbandmen, the Fishermen and the Hunters, adds to the rest the βίη ἀνοσιεύς, the Life of Thieves (b).

In return to this Vulgar Argument, 'tis sufficient to say, that in those blinder Ages of the World, the Dictates and Informations of sound Reason, were chok'd and stifled by the Prevalency of corrupted Manners. Yet

(a) This is most largely demonstrated by Bishop Cumberland, to whom the Reader is recommended for fuller Satisfaction. (b) And afterwards, War is in some sort, a Natural way of acquiring Possession. For Hunting, or violently pursuing, is one of its chief parts; and this may not only be used against Beasts, but likewise against such Men as tho' they were born to obey, do yet refuse Subjection. We have numerous Testimonies to this purpose in Ancient Writers. Vid. Homer. Odyss. g. v. 73. & Odyss. i. v. 252. on which place Didymus tells us, that the Profession of Robbers amongst the Ancients was not Infamous but Glorious. Diodor. Sic. l. 3. c. 49. The Libyans on no account observe any manner of Right, or any manner of Faith towards Strangers. Cæsar reports of the Germans, that those Robberies do not fall under Censure or Reproach, which are practis'd beyond the Bounds of each particular State: And the Excuse they alledge for them is, that they serve for the Exercise of Youth, and the Discouragement of Idleness. de B. G. l. 6. He tells us farther, that every State reckon'd it the greatest Honour and Glory to have as large Solitudes round them as possible, caus'd by their own Devastations: esteeming it a noble Testimony of their Valour, that their Neighbours were forced to quit the Country, and that none are so hardy as to live near them. Mela, l. 3. c. 3. gives the like account of the Germans in general: but Tacitus speaks in manner only of the Vendredi, a particular People amongst them. Of the Spaniards Plutarch, (in Mario) reports, that Robberies pass'd amongst them till that time for Gallant Adventures. And Thucydides says as much of the Ancient Grecians. l. 1. To the same purpose some produce the Roman Law, (l. ult. D. de Colleg.) where those Covenants are declar'd Valid which pass between ἄσθη λείων ἐρχομένων, or οὐρχομένων, Persons who unite on the account of Booty or Prey. Though Salmasius (de Usuris l. 1. c. 22.) corrects the ancient reading into εἰς ὑπὸ λείων, on the account of a Drinking Match. Polybius (l. 3.) mentions it as a Clause in a League between the Romans and Carthaginians, that the former should neither drive Booty to Mastia and Farseium, beyond the Fair Promontory, nor exercise Merchandize: As if both those Practices had been then esteem'd equally Lawful. Justin. l. 43. says of the People of Phœcis, that they supported themselves by Piracy, which at that time was look'd upon as Glory. Sextus Empiric. Hypot. l. 3. c. 24. To rob and spoil is reckon'd by no means disgraceful amongst many of the Barbarous Nations: Nay, the Cilicians are said to have accounted these Adventures most highly creditable and renown'd, so as to pay Honours to the Memory of such as died in their Prosecution. And NESTOR, in the Poet, having kindly receiv'd TELEMACHUS and his Company, asks them,

What, are you Rovers of the Plundering Trade — ?

Now if Robbing had been then scandalous, it is not likely he would have entertain'd with so much Civility Persons whom he suspected of such a Course. L. 2. D. de Captio & Postlim. If there be a Nation, with which we have no tie of Friendship, Hospitality, or League, we must not presently esteem them Enemies. Yet whatever of ours comes into their Possession belongs to them; and even a Free Man of our Country if taken by them, becomes their Slave. Comp. l. 118. de verb. Signific. Diocassius, l. 54. speaking of the Rhatians, often plundering, says he, their Neighbours the Gauls, they had driven Booty from the Borders of Italy, and had infested the Romans and their Allies in their Passage through those Parts: and it was then a receiv'd Custom amongst them, to deal in this manner with all those whom they were united to by Solemn Leagues and Agreements. Isocrates (Panathen.) observes of the Triballians, there are no Men who observe a stricter Concord amongst themselves; but then they endeavour utterly to destroy all besides; not only their Borderers and Neighbours but any People to whom they can force an Access. Add. Grot. l. 2. c. 15. f. 5. This Ancient Hostility, amongst other Reasons that are given for it, might proceed in a great measure from the gross Superstition and Idolatry of those Nations, by which every People imagin'd themselves to have peculiar Gods, and those only true ones. Vid. Juvenal. Sat. 15.

it doth not follow from hence, that there was no Man even in those Nations, sensible enough to apprehend that the Laws of Nature were violated by this Course of Robberies and Spoils, or to disallow that State to be Natural, into which wild and ungovernable Men had thrown themselves, in neglect and in contempt of the noblest Part of their Being. For that a promiscuous Liberty of Rapine doth not flow as a Consequence from a State of Nature, is evident, because the like ill effect is not seen in the State which different Commonwealths now bear to one another, which is really Natural. Nor must we admit what Hobbs farther asserts, that supposing Matters stood thus, Robbery or Pillaging would be contrary to the Law of Nature. For those who had plunder'd us in this manner without Provocation, we might have treated with the like Violence, and have made Reprisals on their Possessions for the Loss of our own: But then we could not have shown such rough Usage to a third Person, who had offer'd no Injury or Molestation to us before. The Impudence of some Persons in breaking the Law of Nature, is no justifying Example for us to imitate. Nor is the Remark more tolerable which Hobbs subjoins, that this kind of Life was not without Glory to them who exercis'd it Valiantly, and yet not Cruelly. As it was the Custom of some; who laid violent hands on every thing else, to spare the Persons Lives, and to pass by the Ploughing Oxen, and all the Instruments of Husbandry. Which they did not as if they were oblig'd to it by the Law of Nature, but purely consulting their own Glory, lest their Cruelty should betray their Cowardice. A wondrous Glory indeed, to accomplish only half a Villany, when to have carried it through, would not have turn'd to so much Advantage!

XI. When we affirm that the Exercise of a Peace towards all Men as such, is the Natural State of Man, we imply that it is instituted and establish'd by bare Nature, without the Intervention of any Human Deed; and that therefore it depends solely on that Obligation of Natural Law by which Men are bound as they are reasonable Creatures; and doth not owe its first Introduction to the Agreement and Covenant of Men. Hence to us it seems usefess to frame any Pacts or Leagues, barely for the Defence and Support of this Universal Peace. For by such a League or Bond, nothing is superadded to the Obligation of the Law of Nature; or, no Agreement is made for the Performance of any thing, which Men were not before by the Law of Nature bound to perform: nor is the former Obligation rendered streighter or firmer by such an Addition. For we suppose both Parties to remain in a Natural Equality, and consequently not to be held to their Covenant by any other Tie, than that of Reverence towards God Almighty, and Fear of such Evil as may fall on them, if they break the Agreement. Though indeed there appears somewhat of Baseness and Foulness, in refusing a thing which one has expressly engag'd to perform. As for the Power and Liberty which the injur'd Party hath, of proceeding against such a Violator of Nature's Law, this is altogether the same, whether any antecedent Covenant hath been made, or not. Men of any tolerable Culture and Civility must needs abhor the entering into any such Compact, the Heads and Conditions of which imply only thus much, that the Party concern'd shall not offend in some Point, which was before an express Command of Nature. Besides, we should be guilty of Great Irreverence towards God, should we suppose, that his Injunctions had not already laid a sufficient Necessity upon us, unless we our selves voluntarily consented to the same Engagement; as if our Obligation to obey the Divine Will, depended on our own Pleasure. Therefore in every Covenant, some Matter is to be inserted, the Performance of which the other Party could not have required from me, by a bare Right of Nature, or which by Virtue of that Right only I did not fully and perfectly owe him; tho' it now becomes a true and absolute Debt upon my Declaration, and his Acceptance of my Consent. Thus, as a Man who lets himself out to hire as a Servant to another, doth not set it down Expressly and Immediately amongst the terms and conditions of the Bargain, that he will not act perfidiously towards him, or that he will not pillage or plunder him; so that would be a shameful Agreement, in which a Man should only bind himself not to break the Universal Peace towards another; that is, not to use such a Right against him, as he obtains and exercises over Beasts. Yet supposing any such Robberies and Depredations, as we have been lately speaking of, to prevail amongst some Barbarous Nations, then in order to restoring the Universal Peace, there would be occasion to enter into Covenant, by which all Parties should tie themselves to the Practice of the Law of Nature towards one another. The Case is much the same, when two Nations hitherto engag'd in War, shall by Agreement, lay down their Arms on both sides; for supposing that they do not come to any Terms of Settlement about particular Matters and Performances; then the only thing concluded on and establish'd, is that General and Common Peace. We find indeed in History, many Examples of Commonwealths reduc'd to such Extremities, as to purchase of their Spoilers this Universal Peace and Forbearance of Injuries, not only by Compact, but by Tribute (a).

(a) Claudian de Laudib. Stilicon. L. I. v. 210, 211.

Mas erat, & fœda requiem mercede pacisci.*

Those dreaded Foes, Traders in Peace, and Hucksters of Repose.

If between Nations or People, hitherto not known to one another by Benefits or Injuries, by Peace or War, any common Leagues are made, without descending to particular Points and Conditions; such Leagues are suppos'd to be entred on for the Establishment of a Friendship, which is reckon'd to imply a clofer Union, than is produc'd by that General Peace of Nature. Or else we may take them only for solemn Proteftations made by both Parties, that they will for the future observe their Mutual Offices and Duties. In the same manner as Persons related, at their first Meeting, or their first Knowledge of one another, are us'd to make long Declarations and Promises to express their mutual Benevolence and Love.

XII. After all, it must be confess'd, that this Natural Peace is but too weak and uncertain, and such as without other Assistances, would prove but a very mean Defence to the Safety of Mankind; so that we might well enough express, and represent it in Ovid's Verse (1),

Pax tamen interdum est; pacis fiducia nunquam,
A Peace which all pretend, yet none can trust.

The Cause of which Unhappiness is the great Wickedness of Men, their unbridled Lust of Power, and their desire of inroaching on the Rights and Possessions of others. When Micipsa in Salust (2), grew Jealous of the growing Power of Jugurtha, we are told the chief things that frighted him and set him on his Guard, were the Nature of Mankind, covetous of Dominion and Government, and violently bent on gratifying its Desires; and then the Advantage of Opportunity, which by the fair Hopes of Gain and Success, is able to seduce Men to ambitious Practices, who were otherwise moderate enough in their Wishes and in their Pursuits. Indeed these pernicious Charms of Avarice and of Ambition have taken so fast hold on Human Minds, that even the most mild and gentle Doctrine of our Saviour CHRIST, which is perpetually inculcating the Rules of Peace, of Kindness, of Good Will, of Propension to forgive Injuries, of Humility, of Contempt of Riches and Worldly Power; hath not been able to extinguish the most unjust Oppressions, Treacheries, and Wars amongst the Professors of that Holy Religion. So that Plutarch's (3) Description will too exactly hit the Character of some Christian Princes, whose Desires, not Seas, nor Mountains, nor Desarts, can stop and conclude; not the Bounds which separate Europe and Asia can circumscribe. When such Ambitious Spirits border one another's Possessions, it is scarce possible that they should live satisfied with their proper Shares, and abstain from mutual Injuries and Invasions.

*In effect they are continually engag'd against each other, Envying and Plotting being the necessary Consequences of their Temper. As for the two Names of Peace and of War, they use them just as they do Money, not as they are determin'd by Reason, but according to Custom and Convenience. Nor doth Paterculus's Remark affect only the Romans and Carthaginians, when he says (4), Amongst those People, there was perpetually either a War, or a Preparation for War, or a deceitful Peace. Therefore, as it is the Duty of an honest and good Man to rest contented with his own Lot, and not disturb the Portion of his Neighbour either by actual Invasions, or by covetous Desires: So it becomes a cautious and wary Man, and one who has a true Care and Concern for his own Safety, in such a manner to believe all Men his Friends, as that they may soon turn his Enemies; in such a manner to observe this Peace with all the World, as a State which may suddenly be converted into War (a). And the famous Saying of Dionysius Halicarnassæus (5), should often run in your Thoughts: So long as wicked Men have the Power of doing Mischief, they can never want the Will. For which Reason Euripides (6) tells us, that a Prudent Diffidence is a most useful and advantageous Quality: And that a wise Man ought neither to act like a Sheep, nor like a wild Beast, to be neither tame in suffering Violence, nor furious in offering it (b).*

Tacitus, in describing the Manners of the German Nations, hath left these two Characters of the Chauci and the Cerusci, very remarkable for their Opposition (7). The former he calls a most Noble People, who chusing to maintain their Greatness by their Justice, live in Secrecy and Quiet, without Ambition, and without Insolence, by never inviting War, they never feel it; by never doing, they never suffer, Violence and Spoil. And this is the Principal Mark of their Virtue and of their Power, that their Superiority is not obtain'd by Injury. Yet they have always Arms ready at hand for their Defence; and upon occasion, could bring together a mighty Army: And their Numbers of Men and Horses make them Famous and Terrible, in the midst of their Peaceful Repose. The latter, he tells us (8), were too fond of cherishing a long and a decaying Ease. This was more pleasant to them than safe. For amongst Stout and Daring People, 'tis never the true way to lie still; and where Men are busie in Action and Contention, Honesty and Probity belong to the Titles of the Conqueror. Thus the Cherusci, who had once the Repute of Equity and Justice, now lie under the Imputation of Folly and Cowardice. So true is the Observation of Dio the Orator (9), that those who are best prepar'd for War, may most securely live in Peace.

CHAP. III.

Of the Law of Nature in General.

I. Since then it appears inconsistent with the Nature and the Condition of Man, that he should live entirely loose from all Law, and perform his Actions by a wild and wandering Impulse, without regard to any Standard or Measure; it follows, that we make enquiry into that most General and Universal Rule of Human Actions, to which every Man is oblig'd to conform, as he is a Reasonable Creature. To this Rule Custom hath given the Name of Natural Law, and we may call it likewise the Law Universal or Perpetual; the former, in regard that it binds the whole Body of Human Race, the latter, because it is not subject to change, which is the Disadvantage of Positive Laws. What this Law is, whence the Knowledge of it arises, what are the chief Marks and Tokens by which it is discover'd, what Matters are to be referr'd to that, and what to Positive Constitutions; are Points which require the more careful Examination, because if this Basis and Groundwork should be ill laid, whatever we afterwards build upon it, must fall of Course (a).

II. The Roman Lawyers defin'd the Law of Nature, to be that Law which Nature teaches all Living Creatures (1); which therefore is not peculiar to Man, but is apprehended and observ'd by other Animals. So that according to this Hypothesis, those things must be said to belong to the Law of Nature, which Brute Creatures either affect and pursue, or avoid and abhor: Whence it naturally follows, that there must be a Law common to Men and Beasts. Which Opinion it's likely might proceed from that famous old Notion about the Soul of the World, of which all other Souls were a kind of ἄτομα or Particles, being in themselves all of the same Nature, but exerting different Operations, according as they fell on different Bodies, and met with different Organs for the Conveyance of their Strength and Powers. Nearly allied to this Fancy was the μετεμύχσις or Transmigration of Souls, according to which Men and Beasts were thought to differ only in their Corporeal Figure, having Souls altogether of the same Nature, and mutually lending to each other (b). But the General Consent of Learned Men hath discarded this Common Law of Animate Beings: In as much as it is impossible to conceive how a Creature should be capable of Law, and at the same time incapable of Reason (c). And altho' there are several Actions of Men and Beasts very much alike, on the Performance of which the former are said to have fulfill'd the Law; yet in Strictness and in Reality, they are extremely different, since they are done by Brutes out of simple Inclination of Nature, but by Men out of Obligation, of which those other Creatures have no Sense. And therefore we must suppose Authors to speak figuratively, when they attribute to such inferior and dumb Animals, Justice, Fortitude, Pity, Gratitude or Chastity; only because they perceive in some of their Proceedings the Shadow and Semblance of these Vertues (d). For things which seem alike in their external Face and Appearance, are by no means the same, if they proceed from different internal Principles. As for Grotius's Opinion (e), that some Acts of other Creatures are dispos'd in an extraordinary manner by an external Reason or Principle, as the Works of Bees and of Ants, and the Frugality which some seem to use about what they have got, for the Benefit of their Kindred and Off-spring; this is allowable only if we mean by it, that the Nature of these Creatures is in such a manner temper'd by the Divine Creator, as to be capable of producing such Actions; not that any outward Principle violently guides and steers them, as a Pilot doth a Vessel. Nor is it difficult to understand why they do not discover the same Cunning in other Matters equally obvious; if we suppose with the New Philosophers, that whatever Form Irrational Animals enjoy, arises purely from the Figure and Disposition of Material Particles, and from the Variety of their Move-

(a) 'Tis a good Rule of Plato (in Cratyl.) p. 299, Ed. Francof. A Man ought to be very strict and accurate in examining the first Principle and Foundation of things, and no less copious and distinct in explaining them; in as much as these Points being once clearly settled, the whole Scheme of Doctrine regularly follows. And so much the more ought this Rule to be observ'd in our present Subject, the more Truth there is in that Remark of Lactantius (l. 3. c. 7.) p. 224. Ed. Oxon. Because in forming the Manners and framing the Model of Life, it is the highest and most fatal Danger to mistake; we ought to apply the stricter Diligence to the Study of our Duty. In this great Point there is no Allowance for Error or Disagreement, all ought to be of one Opinion, and to declare with a Common Mouth the same Doctrine: Since the least slip may overturn the Rule and Order of Living. To the same purpose Diogenes Apolloniast. (in Diog. Laert. l. 9.) Segm. 57. Every Discourse, in my Judgment, ought to take its rise from some clear and manifest Principle; and the Style first made use of, should be plain and grave. (1) See *Dig. B. I. t. 1. ments. Especially since even amongst Men we may find those, who are extremely quick and ready at some sorts of Business, yet strangely dull and heavy about others, not more difficult and abstruse: Which can proceed from nothing else, but from the particular Disposition of their Parts, especially of the Brain and Spirits (a). Those therefore who will have a Law of Nature in Brutes, because they see them acting now and then with some Appearance of Regularity and of Design, abuse the Term of Law, by an undue and unnecessary Application.

Besides there can be found no Dumb Creature which performs all the Duties and Offices of Man; on the contrary, there is scarce any Rational Proceeding, to which some Brutes do not act directly opposite. Yet in Harangues to the People, it is reckon'd a high Aggravation of a Crime, to show that even Brute Creatures abhor the Commission of such Enormities. Thus Plato (b) says, that in arguing against the Unnatural Vice of Pollution with the same Sex, it would be proper to appeal to the Nature of Beasts, in whom we do not discover the same foul and monstrous Practices (c).

III. Some Persons indeed (rather I believe to show their Wit, than out of any serious Design) have asserted this Community of Law between Men and Beasts, and back'd their Assertion with a numerous heap of Arguments, all which have been long since most solidly confuted. It shall be enough for us to touch lightly on the Proofs which they draw from Scripture. That Text then in Gen. 9. 5. Your Blood will I require at the hand of every living thing, according to some Expositors imports only thus much, that God would revenge the Murder of a Man committed, not only by the Hands or the Weapon of another, but by the Fury of Wild Beasts set on him by the others Command. In as much as in the Antediluvian Times, many violent Tyrants and Oppressors us'd to keep wild Beasts, to serve for Executioners of those who displeas'd or affronted them (1). Others give this Interpretation, that God will sometimes make even Wild Beasts the Instruments of punishing Murderers. Others again understand by every living thing, only every Man, as if God only declar'd that no Human Murderer should escape his Justice. In Leviticus XVIII. 23. and XX. 15, 16. Command is given, that if any Man or Woman are found guilty of Bestiality, the Beast shall be ston'd, without any difference of Age. Yet the Jews observ'd such a difference of Years in regard to the Human Parties of both Sexes; so that if a Boy were not above Nine and a Girl above Three Years old, they maintain'd that no Punishment ought then to be inflicted either on the Person or on the Beast; because they would not allow that the Pollution forbidden in the Law could be actually committed at such an Age. Now when they ston'd the Beast, they did not do it because the Beast had properly offended; but partly lest the Sight of that Creature should incite some other Person to the like Foul Passion, and partly lest the Beast remaining alive should keep up the scandalous Remembrance of the Human Offender, who had suffer'd Punishment (d). Thus too Deuteron. XIII. 15, 16. God commands the Israelites in rooting out the Idolatrous Nations to destroy the very Beasts; only to show the Heinousness of that Crime, not as if the Beasts could be Partakers of it. It is observable, that if a Gentile living amongst the Jews had been polluted with a Beast, the Man only suffer'd Death, but the Beast escap'd (e). According to the Law in Exodus XXI. 28. the goring Ox was to be ston'd; not because he had properly committed a Fault, but that he might not offer the like Hurt another time, and that the Owner who had negligently kept him, might be punish'd by his Loss: And hence they were not allowed to eat the Flesh of such an Ox. This Punishment was thought sufficient when the Owner was but slightly in Fault, or when he was ignorant of the Fierceness of the Beast: Whereas if he knew him thus furiously dispos'd, and still neglected to keep him up, he paid for the Mischief with his own Life, being made a sad Partner in the Punishment. And here again the Rabbins tell us, that the Ox was ston'd only when he had kill'd a Jew; not if a Gentile had perish'd by his Violence. And indeed it was a Custom in several other Nations to destroy such things as had been the Instrument of any Mischief, or of any Misfortune. Thus it appears from the Orations of Demosthenes against Aristocrates, and of Aeschines against Ctesiphon, that by the Athenian Laws, Stones, Clubs, Axes, and several other such things, when they had been made use of in the Commission of Murder, were brought

The Reason why the Beasts were order'd to be kill'd, seems to have been because they would renew the unhappy Remembrance of the foul Crime. Philo Judæus (de speciat. leg.) adds, lest the Beast should bring forth any detestable Monster, such as usually proceed from Unnatural Impurities, and such as no Pious Man can bear the Sight of.* (e) Add. *Selden. de J. formally formally into Court, as it were in order to undergo a Penalty. Thus the Statue of Theagenes in Thafos having unfortunately kill'd a Man by falling on him, the People order'd it to be dragg'd into the Sea (a). St. Ambrose (b) calls the Copulation of Affes and Mares, by which Mules are produc'd, forbidden, not because the Beasts contract any Guilt in those Practices, but because Men are forbidden to procure any such Unnatural Mixture (c).

We may excuse those Learned Compilers of the Roman Laws, by urging in their Defence, that by the Term of the Law of Nature (d), they meant that Order instituted by the Great Creator, chiefly in those things which make directly for the Preservation of Nature, or of the Species and Individuals of all Animate Beings. And it is the more probable that they took it in such a Sense, because they set down as the chief Heads of this Law, only the Conjunction of Sexes, the Procreation and Education of Off-spring, and Self-defence. Many other Authors have us'd the same Terms in the same improper manner; as particularly Mr. Yves of Paris, in his Treatise concerning the Natural Law ordain'd by God over all Created things, and Des Cartes in his Principles of Philosophy. We may conclude this point with the excellent Observation of Plutarch (e), Nature (says he) as in those Trees and Shrubs which we call Wild, she hath sown the crude and imperfect Principles of true and pleasant Fruits; so in Brutes hath implanted an imperfect Love of their Off-spring, not belonging to the Head of Justice, nor reaching beyond the Inducements of Profit and Advantage. But in Man whom she produc'd for a Rational and a Civil Being, for the Worship of God, for the Observation of Justice and of Laws, for the building of Cities and for a Social and Friendly Life; in Man, I say, she has fix'd the Seeds of this Love in a fairer and in a more plentiful manner: And in this she hath follow'd the first Principles of his Body, and the Original Ingredients of his Constitution.

IV. Others make the Object of Natural Law to be such Acts as do in themselves include a Moral Necessity or Turpitude, and which are therefore in their own Nature either absolutely Requisite or Unlawful, and which we must of Consequence suppose to be necessarily commanded or necessarily forbidden by God. And this Mark, they say, distinguishes Natural Law, not only from Human, but from the Divine Positive Law, which doth not command or forbid things in their own Nature necessary or unlawful, but by forbidding things makes them unlawful, and by commanding things makes them necessary: while the things forbidden by the Natural Law are not therefore Evil, because God hath forbidden them, but God therefore forbade them, because they were in themselves Evil: And on the other hand, the things enjoin'd by the same Law, are not made good or necessary by God's enjoining them; but were therefore enjoin'd by God, because they were in themselves simply good and necessary (f). But now besides that upon admitting this Opinion, it would remain a most perplexing Doubt what those Acts are which we thus suppose in themselves Unlawful, and by what distinguishing Token they may be clearly known from others; We have already shewn in our former Book (g), that no Actions are in themselves Good or Bad, Honest or Vile, till they are made so by some Law. Nor ought any Man to be shock'd with such a Scruple as this; 'if all the Morality of Human Actions depends on some Law, might not God therefore have so fram'd the Law of Nature, as to enjoin things directly contrary to the present Duties; for example, if amongst the mutual Offices, due from Men to one another, He should have put, Killing, Stealing, Fornicating, and bearing False Witnesses; and amongst the prohibited Actions, Gratitude, keeping Faith, paying Loans, and the like. For here, tho' it seems altogether a needless and an impudent Curiosity to enquire what God might have done, when it appears plainly what He hath done; yet if any Man should persist in such Vanities, we may assure him, that such a Doubt as we have been proposing, implies a manifest Contradiction. For although God was not oblig'd by any Necessity to create Man; (as I think those Persons have but a very narrow and unworthy Notion of the Divine Power, who believe it would have diminish'd any thing from God's Glory not to have made these poor Inhabitants of the Earth (h)); yet when He once decreed to create him a Rational and a Social Being, it was impossible but that the present Natural Law should agree to him; not by an absolute, but by an Hypothetical Necessity. For should Man have been engaged to the contrary Performances, not a social Animal, but some other Species of barbarous and horrid Creatures had been produc'd. Notwithstanding all which, it remains for a certain Truth, that antecedently to the Imposition of any Law, all Actions are to be esteem'd indifferent. For by decreeing to create Man, that is, to create an Animal whose Actions should not be all Indifferent, God immediately constituted a Law for his Nature. Neither from our Assertion that all Actions are in themselves indifferent, before the Application of Law, doth it follow, that God could have order'd our worshipping Him with Blasphemy, or with Contempt; as

Vasquez (a) rashly maintains. For a Rational Creature, that is, a Creature indued with the Faculty of apprehending things as they truly are, cannot form any other Conception of God than to acknowledge him, a Being not only vastly his Superior in Nature and Dignity, but likewise his proper Lord and Governour in the highest degree. For otherwise he would conceive a meer Idol, or indeed any thing rather than a God. But now it is plainly contradictory, to suppose a Being at the same time the most Eminent, and the most Despicable; a Governour design'd purely to be insulted on by his Subjects: and to express our Acknowledgment of the Excellency and the Power of the Divine Nature, by such Signs as denote directly the contrary. Therefore to say that God cannot establish such horrid Absurdities by a Law, doth no more detract from his Omnipotence, than to say, that He cannot die, that He cannot be untrue, that He cannot make things undone, which have been already done.

We may observe farther on this Argument, that if the Definition of Natural Law is to be founded on that necessary Honesty or Turpitude of some Actions, it must be always perplex'd and obscure, and run round in an un-concluding Circle; as will appear to any Man who examines the Definition laid down by Grotius (1). And Dr. Cumberland excellently remarks (b), that in defining the Law of Nature, when we use the Word Good, we must mean Natural and not Moral Good; since it would be the highest Absurdity to define a thing by such Terms as suppose it to be already known; those very Terms being deriv'd as Consequences from it, and depending on it as to their own Evidence and Certainty.

V. Those Authors who search for the First Pattern or the Original Draught of Natural Law in God himself, are divided into two Parties. For some, placing the Spring and Fountain as it were of it in the Divine Will, do thence conclude, that in as much as that Will is in the highest manner free, the Law of Nature may therefore be chang'd by God, or the contrary be commanded, as is the Case and the Condition of Positive Laws. Others affirm this Natural Law to be founded after such a manner in the essential Holiness and Justice of God, as to represent and express a kind of Image or Copy of those Attributes. And hence likewise, they say, proceeds the Immutability of the Law of Nature: In as much as the Divine Justice and Holiness are utterly incapable of Change or Alteration. Concerning the former of these Opinions we have this to remark, that it was indeed at first entirely free to the Divine Pleasure to produce or not to produce an Animal to whom the present Law of Nature should agree. But that since God Almighty hath been pleas'd to create Man, a Being not possibly to be preserv'd without the Observation of this Law, we have no manner of Reason or Colour to believe that He will either reverse or alter the Law of Nature so long as He brings no Change on Human Nature it self; and so long as the Actions enjoin'd by this Law do by a Natural Consequence promote Society, in which is contain'd all the Temporal Happiness of Mankind; while the contrary Actions do by as strong a Necessity destroy that Society: That is, so long as Beneficence, Kindness, Fidelity, Gratitude, and the like Practices shall have a Power of engaging and of winning on Men's Minds; and Injuriousness, Treachery, and Ingratitude, a Power of raising and provoking them. And therefore supposing Human Nature and Human Affairs, to be fixt and constant, the Law of Nature though it owed its Original Institution to the free Pleasure of GOD, remains firm and immoveable (2); Unlike to those Divine Positive Laws, which depend in such a manner on the Divine Will, as not to seem so necessarily requisite to the good and safe Condition of Mankind in General. Besides, though this Opinion be so far right as it makes God the Author of Natural Law, a Truth which no Man in his Wits can doubt of; yet it still remains an Uncertainty, by what means this Divine Will is to be known, and what Tokens there are to evince, that God intended to comprehend such or such a thing under the Law of Nature. And the same Inconvenience attends likewise on the latter Opinion. For though no one can be guilty of such horrid Impiety, as to assert that the Law of Nature contains any thing in it repugnant to the Divine Holiness or Justice (c); yet it would be very difficult to prove, that the same Law is so exact a Copy or Resemblance of those Attributes, that in what manner soever God Almighty is pleas'd to deal with his Creatures, particularly with Men, in the same manner the Law of their Nature commands Men to deal with one another (d). Nor doth it appear how a Right which is to obtain amongst Persons by Nature equal, can be copied from that Transcendent Right, which the Creator useth towards His own Works; That is, how a Law imposing a mutual Obligation on Men, can represent any Image of Omnipotency, which no Laws, no Obligations can restrain. For that Argument drawn from Scripture, about Man's being created in the Image of God, is of no force as to the present Case. For even those who con-

self that Image to be lost, do yet acknowledge the Sense of Natural Law to have still remain'd in Man. Amongst our selves we usually call him a Holy or Righteous Person, who abstains from grosser Sins, and regularly observes his Duty: But now, who ever fram'd a Notion of the Divine Holiness by so unworthy a Model? He amongst Men is accounted Just, who makes it his constant Purpose and Resolution to hurt no body, and to pay every one their due: But in God it is Justice to destroy his Creatures, even in the most grievous and painful manner. Neither can he so owe a Person any thing, as to be accus'd of doing an Injury upon withholding it. If he hath been pleas'd to promise any thing to Mortals, he indeed performs it: Not because by Virtue of such a Promise they obtain a Right against GOD; but because it would be some kind of Derogation from his Greatness and Goodness, to command Men to expect any Favour from him, and afterwards to frustrate their Expectations. For he who breaks his Promise, either wants Power to perform it, or else through Inconstancy or Dishonesty falls from the Engagement he had once well made, or else at the same time of making his Promise, he was ignorant how the State and Condition of things would be, when it was afterwards to be fulfilled; all which Cases imply some kind of Failing and Imperfection. Hence God cannot but observe his Promises, and Men ought not but to observe theirs: Hence Human Promises turn into Debts, but Divine Promises are made good out of pure Favour. What Rules the Vindictive Justice of God proceeds by, is far above our Apprehension to discover. But thus much is certain, that they are not altogether conformable to the Methods of Human Judicature (a).

From this Consideration, that we ought not to admit any Law common both to God and Man, we may draw an easie Answer to those Instances, which some give of God's dispensing with the Law of Nature, as when he commanded Abraham to kill his Son, and the Israelites to rob the Egyptians, of their Vessels of Silver and Vessels of Gold. For God the supreme

Lord and Disposer of all things, hath a much higher and fuller Right over his Creatures, than one Man can have over another, who is by Nature his Equal. Therefore we cannot properly call it a Dispensation of the Law of Nature, when a Man by express Command from Heaven, executes God's Right upon other Men, meerly as His Instrument (b).

VI. But neither do the Arguments which the Author (1) of the Treatise de Principiis Justi & Decori produces, seem forcible enough to establish a Twofold Natural Law, Divine, and Human, which, supposing the present Order of the World to continue, do fall in with one another. For in as much as all Law implies Obligation, and that again presupposes some external and superiour Principle, it doth not appear how we can without Absurdity, apply any such matter to God. And it is a like Impropriety to say, that God is oblig'd by Himself, or by His own Essence. Nor will that Text which he alledges of Rom. I. 32. ever prove such a Law to be in God. For since the Gentiles from the Dictates of their Reason, were able to gather the Knowledge of the Law of Nature, the next thing which they must infer, was that God the Legislator would not suffer the Law to be violated without punishing the Offender. Therefore upon the Violation of that Law, there arises a Right to God (if it be decent so to speak) of exacting Punishment; or upon Commission of the Sin, God most justly executes what He before threatned. But who can conclude from hence, that God is obnoxious to a Law? What follows is an ambiguous Expression, that the supreme Right of God over His Creatures is discover'd by Natural Reason from those Principles, which make the Foundations of Natural Right and Equity amongst Men. For if this only be the Sense of it, that in many Cases God doth proceed in the same manner in his Dealings with Men, as He would have them follow in their Transactions with each other; it will easily pass without Contradiction (c). For thus God by the Natural Law, hath enjoin'd Men to keep their Promises, as he will firmly keep those which He makes Himself (d). So

(a) Arist. Ethic. 1. 10. c. 8. What kind of Actions ought we to attribute to the Gods? Shall we say they are Just? But alas! It would seem most ridiculous to fancy, that they are concern'd in driving Bargains, in restoring Loans, and the like Performances which we reckon Honest amongst Men. Shall we call them Valiant and Brave, able to endure Hardships and encounter Dangers? Shall we pronounce them Liberal? Who then shall be the Object, or what the Matter of their Bounty? Certainly we must not oppress them with the Load of Money or Treasures. In like manner it would be an impertinent and troublesome Commendation, to say they are Temperate; in as much as they have no inordinate Affections to govern and restrain. And so thus, if we run through the whole Train of Human Actions, we shall find them all so mean and contemptible, as to be infinitely unworthy of the Heavenly Natures.

(b) Comp. Grot. 1. 1. c. 1. f. 10. n. 6. None, I believe, can be so simple as to imagine, that when the Object is chang'd, or the Circumstances varied, the Law it self suffers Alteration. When the Creditor hath forgiven a Debt, it loseth that Name, and therefore is no longer comprehended under the Law which enjoins Payment. And as for the other Instance, when the Goods of a Person who gave a thing in Trust, are adjudg'd to the Publick Treasury, neither the Law is chang'd nor its Object. For thus runs the Law, He who receives a thing in Trust, ought to restore it either to him who committed the thing (being his own) to his Charge, or to him on whom the Right descends. Now this Law cannot affect the Thief, because the thing was not his own; nor to the former Owner, who is suppos'd to be at present a Banish'd Man, because the Propriety of all that was his passeth to the Publick.

He forbids Human Judges to condemn the Innocent, declaring that He himself will acquit them in His own Judgments (a). But if it be meant to assert that God hath no more Right over His Creatures, than Men are allow'd to obtain over each other; there will be need of more convincing Arguments to make us believe, that the Supreme Lord and Master hath no fuller Right over His Servants, than the Servants have over their Fellow-Servants, with whom Nature has set them on a Level: Or, to use Grotius's (1) Terms, that the Jus Recltorium, and the Jus Aquatorium, the Right of Governors, and the Right of Equals, are exactly the same thing.

Neither must we let that Assertion pass by uncensur'd, which the Author of the same Treatise lays down, pag. 52. that God ought necessarily to esteem the Laws of Nature as just, the Order of the Universe being establish'd in the manner we now behold: And that He cannot but own every Deviation from them to be indecent and unjust. For without doubt those Imperious Terms, God ought necessarily, are very unfuitable to the Majesty of an Omnipotent Legislator. Nor is here any necessity to be discover'd in the Case, except such as owes its Original meerly to the Divine Pleasure. The Reason which he subjoins, is not strong enough to maintain his first Position; All things (says he) which our Thoughts can imagine, have always some kind of order or Relation, arising from the intrinsic Nature of the thing, and which cannot be separated from the thing, without offering Violence to Reason. For this Nature, and this adhering Relation, things have not from themselves, but from the free Will of God; and the Decrees of His Will cannot properly be called His own Law. Thus, the reason why amongst Men one Benefit obliges to the return of another; why Violation of Covenants, Inhumanity, Pride, Slander, can never be allowable, is, because God hath given Man a Sociable Nature, and as long as that Nature remains unalter'd, those things which are agreeable to it must be Good and Honest, and those which are repugnant to it, Uncomely and Unlawful. But who can hence infer, either that there is but one Law, common to God and Men, or that things are indued with any orders or Habitude, independent from the Divine Disposal?

VII. Those who found the Law of Nature on the Consent of Mankind in general, or on the Agreement either of all, or however of the most, and the most polish'd Nations, seem chiefly to follow Aristotle, as the Author and Patron of their Opinion. He, in his Ethicks to Nicomachus B. 5. C. 10. calls that Natural

Justice, which bears the same Force in all Places, and doth not depend on particular Sentiments. And in his Rhetorick, B. 5. C. 13. he tells us, there is a General Right and Wrong, or Just and Unjust, believ'd and profess'd by all Men; although no Society should be instituted amongst them, and no Covenants be transacted (b).

Now besides, that this way of proving the Law of Nature is only à posteriori (2), and therefore cannot shew the Cause and Reason of the thing; so is it very slippery and uncertain, and involv'd in an endless Maze of Doubts and Perplexities. To appeal to the Consent of all Mankind, Mr. Hobbs (c) observes to be inconvenient upon this account, because at this rate it would be impossible for a Man, actually using his Reason, to sin against the Law of Nature. In as much as his Consent being wanting who is a part of Mankind, the common Agreement, must needs be maim'd and imperfect. Then again, because it would not be fair to gather the Laws of Nature from the Consent of those, who break them more frequently than they observe them. For as Isocrates speaks (d), It is a Natural Misfortune which we all lay under, that we should more frequently Transgress than Perform our Duty.

Nor will it be a more happy way of arguing, to appeal to the Consent of all Nations. For were it possible for us to understand all the Languages of Ancient and Modern People, yet we should be still far enough to seek in the Knowledge of their Manners and of their Institutions. We cannot hit off this Difficulty by saying, that the Consent of the most Civiliz'd Nations is sufficient, and that the Opinions of Barbarians are not to come into the Account. For, what Nation any ways able to manage and to preserve it self, will own the Title of Barbarous? Or what Nation can take so much on it self, as to desire its own Manners and Proceedings should be the Standard in trying all others, and that whatever People did not exactly conform to its Model, should be immediately pronounc'd Barbarous and Savage? Heretofore the Pride of the Grecians, censur'd all as Barbarians, who liv'd without the Bounds of their Country. The Romans afterward succeeded them, as well in their Arrogance as in their Empire. And at the present, some few Nations here in Europe, have the Vanity to prefer themselves to the rest of the World in the Opinion of their own Civility and Improvements of living. But there are not wanting other People, who imagine themselves to have the Advantage of them in all respects: And 'tis an old Proverb amongst the Chinese, that themselves only have two Eyes, only the Europeans one, and all the rest of the World are stark blind (a).

Some too there are, who fall foul upon our Learning, in prosecuting which we spend so much Good Time; they will have it be no better than a Prop, or a Crutch to support and assist our Dulness: In as much as the good Disposition of many Men carry them on to a Natural Innocence and Probity, without Improvement or Ornament of Letters; and because it requires no great Clerkship to be an Honest Man. It is likewise too evident, that high Attainments of Knowledge are not always bless'd with the Attendance of Good Manners or of Good Temper (b). Many Nations we see pride themselves in the tedious Pageantry of vain unnecessary things; despising those who lead a Life of less Gallantry and of more Simplicity. Yet were we to seek for Innocency and Integrity, we might perhaps find them much sooner amongst these plain and unartificial Mortals, than amongst their stately and formal Neighbours (c).

Besides, that such a Consent can be of no force, appears from this farther Reflection; that the number of Fools far exceeds that of wise Men; and that few Persons have form'd their Opinions upon a full search into the Foundations of things; but most Men follow on in the track of others, and yield an implicit assent to their Notions, without applying their own Thoughts or Judgments to the Points in Debate. Farther, altho' we have a tolerable Assurance of the consent of most People, at least as to the General Precepts of Natural Law; and altho' we may presume on the Consent of the rest, from the Principles of those who are better known to us; Yet it is more safe to conclude hence, what those Nations esteem just and equal amongst themselves, than what they think fair ways of dealing with Strangers; all whom, are by some People accounted Enemies, and treated accordingly (d).

VIII. Tho' the common Use and Custom of many Nations may seem to be alledg'd with more force for proving a thing to be lawful or allowable, than for the proving it to be actually commanded by the Law of Nature; yet that we cannot with any Security make so much as the former of these Conclusions, seems probable from the great Variety and Contradiction discoverable in the Manners and in the Institutions of the most famous People upon Record. So that we may well apply to the present Case, that saying of Socrates (e), ἐκ εἰς ἀπειράτους καὶ ἀδιστακτικούς καταφύγει, εἰς τὸ πᾶσι ἀναόρετον. You consult no very expert Masters, when you refer your self to the Multitude for Instruction. To the same purpose Plutarch (f) observes, that the Laws of Men are vastly different, some making one thing to be good and some another: And Tacitus's Description of an Army compos'd of various Nations may serve to represent the same wide Disagreement. Their Languages, their Manners, their Desires, (says he) are different; and while some will have one thing to be lawful, and some the contrary, amongst them all, nothing can escape as Unlawful (g). To give some account of this Variety by way of Specimen. Aristotle (h) reports of some Savage Nations on the Confines of Pontus, that it is customary with them, to borrow one another's Children, to furnish out their Feasts. And these People he presently after calls Irrational, Wild, and living only by Sense. Eusebius, in his Book de Præparatione Evangelicâ (i), reckoning up the foul Customs and Manners which had been corrected by the Doctrine of the Gospel, amongst others, mentions the Pollution with Mothers and Sisters in Persia, (which Diogenes Laertius (1) too takes notice of from the Authority of Socion,) the eating of Human Flesh, and the murdering of Children under a Religious Pretence amongst the Scythians: He adds that the Masageta, and the Derhices us'd to kill their Relations when they grew very old, and make an Entertainment with their Bodies: That the Tibareni in Cappadocia, threw their Ancient Persons down Precipices; that the Hircanians cast out their Dead to the Birds, and the Caspians to the Dogs to be devour'd. Hither also may we refer those foul Watchings and other Ceremonies, design'd for the Honour of their Gods, but mixt with all the Licentious Practices of Adultery and Lewdness; as also, the Human Sacrifices barbarously murder'd on their Altars. The same excellent Author (k) gives the following Relations out of Bardesanes the Syrian. 'Tis a Law amongst the GETULIANS, that the Women offer their Bodies to whomsoever they please, especially to Strangers; and that their Husbands shall not accuse them on these accounts, or pretend to censure them as guilty of Adultery. The same Liberty obtain'd amongst the BACTRIANS. Whereas on the contrary, amongst the ARABIANS, all Adulteresses were punish'd with Death, and if suspected only, underwent some lesser Penalty. In PARTHIA and ARMENIA it is provided by Law, that no Man shall be accus'd for killing his Wife, his Son, his Daughter, or his Unmarried Brother or Sister. Amongst

The Wise Men of GREECE, are not ashamed to court the Love of little Beautiful Boys. In BRITAIN many Men possess one Wife; in PARTHIA many Women belong to one Husband. Sextus Empiricus (a) the Sceptick, to shew that there is no Certainty in the Notions of Honesty or Dishonesty, hath raked up a great Heap of these contradictory Customs and Institutions. But he hath stumbled very fatally in the very entrance of his Design, while he talks in this manner: Amongst us Pollution with the Male Sex is unlawful and abominable; yet amongst the Germans, as is reported, it is no Disgrace, but rather a fashionable Practice. For the Grecians were so scandalously addicted to this unnatural Vice, that Plato in his 8th Book of Laws, thought there was need of urging some Reasons to prove the Possibility of restraining it by Publick Edicts. And that the Bæotians, Sextus Empiricus's Country-men, ought not to stand excepted from this Imputation, may be gather'd from a Passage in Cornelius Nepos's Life of Epaminondas: Tho' perhaps the vile Custom had ceas'd in those parts before this Sceptical Philosopher wrote. That it once prevail'd there, he himself afterwards relates. But what he reports of the Germans, is so groundless a Falsity, that 'tis wonderful how it should enter into the Head of any one, who is the least acquainted with the Manners and the Story of that Nation. He adds, that the Cynick Philosophers, and Zeno, Cleanthes and Chrysippus, esteem'd the same foul Enormity an indifferent thing. That some of the Indians thought it no Indecency to be familiar with their Wives in Publick. That in several Parts of Egypt for Women to prostitute themselves was look'd on as a Creditable Profession; and that 'twas usual for the younger sort first to get themselves a Fortune by the Jilting Trade, and then to marry. That the Stoicks held it to be no irrational Practice, either to frequent the Stews, or to maintain one's self by Pimping. That the Persians contracted Marriages with their Mothers, and the Egyptians with their Sisters: The former of which, Zeno maintain'd to be agreeable to Reason (b). That Chrysippus permitted a Father to have Children by his Daughter, a Mother by her Son, and a Brother by his Sister. That Plato allow'd the Community of Wives. That 'twas a receiv'd Custom with many of the Barbarians to feed on Man's flesh; which the Stoicks themselves approv'd of. That amongst many others, Adulteries pass'd for indifferent Matters. That the Scythians offer'd Strangers to Diana; and kill'd their own Parents, when they arriv'd beyond the Age of Sixty Years. That by a Law of Solon's at Athens; the Parents were empower'd to put their Children to Death. That the Roman Gladiators, after the Performance of their Murther, receiv'd Honours and Rewards. That Thieves amongst the Spartans were punish'd, not for stealing, but for letting themselves be catch'd. That the Amazons, if they happen'd to bear Male Children, wilfully made them Cripples; to prevent their Performance of any Manly Actions or Exploits. He enlarges farther about the different Opinions in reference to the Divine Nature, about the Diversity of Religious Rites and Ceremonies, about the various manners of Burial, and the absurd Procurements of Death (c). Tully (d) reports that the Egyptians, having their Minds overcome by wicked Errors, will sooner let themselves be cut in pieces, than they will hurt a Serpent, an Asp, a Cat, a Dog, or a Crocodile: And if they happen unawares to do any of these Creatures a Mischief, they voluntarily undergo any Punishment. Busbequius (e) informs us, that Theft is an honourable Practice amongst the Colchians: And Fran. Alvarez that in Abyssynia the Custom is, for the Thieves to present a part of their Booty to the King, keeping the rest without Scandal for their own use (f).

IX. But that Notion of extracting the Law of Nature from the Manners and Customs of the World, is accompanied with this farther Inconvenience; that 'tis almost impossible to find any Nation, which is govern'd purely by Natural Law; but every Country hath its own particular Laws superadded, either in Writing or otherwise; to be made use of when the People have any Bargains or Tranfactions with their Fellow-subjects. And many times Affairs in debate between whole Nations are decided either by Civil Law common to both; or by the Law of Nature as it is not Naked, but Cloath'd, as it were, with many Positive Additions. So that it is no easy matter to distinguish what those Nations admit for Natural Law, and what for Positive and Civil. We may add to this Consideration, that meer Use and Custom when it hath born a long and an unquestion'd Sway, frequently puts on the Face and Semblance of Natural Reason. 'Tis manifest, says Agathias (a), that whatever Law or Institution hath obtain'd thro' a long Course of time amongst many People, they certainly cry it up for most excellent and most equitable; and if any thing be attempted contrary to it, this they reject as ridiculous, and unworthy of all Credit and Allowance. We have a famous Example to this purpose in Herodotus (b). Darius, for Experiment's sake, put the question to the Greeks who were under his Command, what Summ of Money he should give them, to feed on the Bodies of their deceas'd Parents, after the manner of the Indians. Upon their refusal to comply on any Considerations; he ask'd some of the Indians, what they'd take to burn their dead Parents after the Grecians Fashion, and not to eat them. But they setting up a General Outcry, desir'd the King to have better thoughts of them. Besides, to have been inur'd to any Opinion from ones Infancy, is so forcible a Prepossession, that altho' the Opinion be false, yet it scarce enters into any Person's Head to question it; at least it passeth with an uncontroll'd Currency amongst Men of vulgar Parts and Capacities (c). To the greatest part of Mankind we may apply Sextus Empiricus's Saying, they follow the usual ways of Life, without thought or reflection (d). And Euripides's Observation is no less true, that the Traditions which we receiv'd from our Parents, and which are grown up with us, no Reason can confute, no strength of Wisdom can over-rule (e). To the same Head we may refer that Text of the Apostle, 1 Corinth. XI. 14. and that Remark in Plato in his seventh Book of Laws, that our using one of our hands more readily than the other, proceeds purely from Custom: In as much as Nature equally favours both. Amongst many People Honour and Respect are measur'd by the length of Beards (f); whereas on the contrary, the greatest part of the Americans think it a Brutish Indecency to appear with any Beard at all (g).

(a) Pyrrhon. Hypothef. l. 3. c. 24. (b) Ibid. Chap. 25. Zeno's Speech as there represented, reacheth the highest Degree of Loosness and Impudence. (c) Add. Diog. Laert. in Pyrrho. l. 9. (d) Tusc. Quæst. l. 5. c. 27. (e) Epist. 3. (f) Philo Judæus de Temulentia, p. 208, 209. Ed. Genev. And these things may give us warning not easily to credit those Uncertainties, which being diffus'd through almost the whole World, have thrown both Greeks and Barbarians into Common Errors of Judgment. I mean those early Institutions, those National Customs, those Ancient Laws, through the whole Summ of which we cannot find one in which all agree; but in every Country, People, City, Street and even in every House, the Men, at least, differ from the Women, and the Children from both. And indeed I do not wonder, that a confus'd and miscellaneous Rabble, meer Slaves to Laws and Customs, however introduc'd, inur'd from the Cradle to yield Obedience to them no less than to Masters or Tyrants, and having their Mind cow'd and broken by Severity and Blows, and not able to aspire to any Great and Manly Attainments, should believe the Traditions they receiv'd from their Ancestors, and letting their Reasons lie without Use or Exercise, affirm things or deny them unexamined and unobserv'd. But I cannot forbear wondering at the Philosophers; who, whilst the greatest part of them pretend to hunt for the real Truth and Certainty of things, dividing themselves into so many Troops and Orders, pronounce of almost every Matter, Great or Small, ever with Difference, and often with Contradiction. Add Montaigne's Ess. l. 1. c. 22. & Charron of Wisdom, l. 2. c. 8. f. 4. 7.

But all this while, we do not ascribe too much force to Custom, that it should be able in such a manner to deprave and seduce the Judgment of Reason, as to render the Truths concerning Natural Laws impossible to be apprehended (h).

X. This strange diversity of Laws and Manners, by which most Nations in the World contradict each other, hath without doubt been the occasion why some Men have asserted that there's no such thing as Natural Law, but that all Law first arose from the Convenience and the Profit of Particular States, and is incapable of any other Measure. Thus Horace Serm. l. 1. Sat. 3. v. 98. 111, &c.

And a little after, I know not how it comes to pass, that most Men had rather continue in a Mistake, and quarrel and fight in defence of an Opinion which they have once lov'd and embrac'd, than to examine without Obstinacy or Partiality, what is deliver'd with most Agreement on all sides. of all the Ancients none disputed this Point so largely, as Carneades is said to have done. His Arguments as Lactantius (a) hath contracted them, are to this effect. That Men first instituted Laws to secure and to promote their own Advantage; whence they came to be so various according to different Manners, and different Times; but that there was no such thing as Natural Law in the World. That Mankind and all other Animate Beings, are by the Guidance of Nature carried on to the pursuit of their own Profit; and that consequently there can be no Justice; or if there be, that it must be the highest Folly, in as much as it would make a Man injure himself, by consulting the Conveniences of others. That all Nations famous for Empire and Command, and the Romans themselves who then reign'd Masters of the World, if they would be just, that is, if they would restore every one his own, must return to their Ancient Cottages, and to their Primitive Poverty (b). In clearing up these Objections, it will not be amiss to begin with Tully's Remark in his Second Book of Offices, c. 3. Profitable (says he) is a Word which by the Corruption of Time and Custom is perverted insensibly to the Signification of somewhat, that may be separated from Honesty; so as to make something Honest, which is not Profitable, and something Profitable without being Honest: An Error of the most pernicious Consequence to the Life of Man. On which account in his third Book of the same excellent Work, c. 3. he tells us, that Socrates us'd to curse the Authors who first divided these Names in Notion and Opinion, which were in Nature so inseparably united. For those Masters of False Politicks cheated the heedless Vulgar with the Ambiguous Term of Profit; which is of two kinds, as it is rated by two different Principles. One sort of Profit, is that which appears such to the deprav'd Judgment of ill compos'd Affections; these being mov'd chiefly by present and transitory Advantages, and very little sollicitous about future Concerns. The other and the true Profit is adjudg'd so by sound Reason, which doth not only consider things at hand, but weighs and examines the Effects and Consequences which they are likely to produce. Which therefore must pronounce that alone to be truly profitable, which is universally such, and which gives Assurance of Constancy and Duration (c), but can never judge it a desirable thing, to enjoy a Momentary Advantage, drawing after it a Train of endless Mischiefs. 'Tis a most unhappy and a most dangerous Pleasure, in the heat of a Fever to relieve our selves with cold Water, which will be sure afterwards to redouble our Tortures. Actions perform'd in Conformity to the Law of Nature have a double Excellency, not being only Honest, that is conducive to the Preservation and to the Increase of the Honour and the Good Credit of Men; but likewise Useful and Profitable, promoting their Interest and Advantage, and contributing largely to their Happiness. And this latter Quality is so far from being an unworthy Attribute of Virtue, that even in Holy Scripture (1), Godliness is said to be Profitable to all, having both the Promises of this Life, and of that which is to come. On the other hand, those Actions which contradict the Law of Nature, are always base and Dis-honest, and tho' they now and then bear some Appearance of Profit and of Pleasure, yet these Charms are quickly over and never fail of being attended with a more considerable Crowd of Evils and Misfortunes (d). Tully in his first Book of Offices, Chap. 4. talks admirably for our present Business. Betwixt a Man and a Brute, says he, there is eminently this difference; the one is carried on by Sense, and to that only which is present, with little or no regard to what is either past or to come: Whereas the other by the Benefit of Reason sees the Consequences of things; their Rise and their Progress, and couples together Causes and Effects; compares Resemblances of Actions and Events; tacks the present to the future; and so taking in his whole Life at a view, he prepares all things necessary for the Use and Comfort of it. Therefore 'tis so far from being true, that Civil Laws were first instituted for the sake of this Momentary and Bastard Profit, that it appears to have been their chief end and design, to hinder Men from squaring their Actions, by so false a Measure. For should anyone resolve to direct all his Proceedings to his own Private Advantage, without any regard to the rest of Mankind; since all other Men might as well take the same Course, there could not but arise the deepest Confusion, and a kind of War of All against All, a State the most Unprofitable, and the most Inconvenient in the World. On the contrary it is very manifest, that he who by observing the Law of Nature endeavours to win the Affections and the good Grace of others, may conceive much surer hopes of Profit attainable by their Assistance, than he, who trusting to his own single Power, takes the Liberty of treating others as he lists (e). Nor is it possible for Men to frame a Notion of any Profit, which will be their own Peculiar, or to which all Men will not have as good a Title as themselves; since Nature hath never given any Man so large a Privilege, as to let him exercise any kind of Right against others, the use of which they are not allow'd to turn again upon him. Therefore 'tis a great Mistake to fancy it will be Profitable to you, to take away either by Fraud or Violence what another Man hath acquir'd by his Labour (2); since others have not only the Power of resisting you, but of taking the same Freedom with your Goods and Possessions.

And you have as little Reason to think it will prove advantageous to you, to break your Faith; since your own Example may be made use of to your own Prejudice (a). Nor should any presume so much on his own Strength and Power, as to imagine that others will not repay him with such Usage as they receive from him. For all true Power arises from a Conjunction with other Men, whom 'tis impossible to keep together by your single Force. So that if that false and spurious Profit were to be the measure of all our Proceedings, the Life of the stoutest Mortal would be as often in danger, as it should seem profitable to any one to rid him out of the way: And whoever took such a Course would only set a fatal Pattern, and chalk out the way to his own Destruction. On the whole matter then, not Justice, but Injustice is really the highest Folly; which tho' it may seem to succeed for the present, yet is neither general nor lasting; and tends to the Dissolution and Destruction of Human Safety; Men being chiefly guarded and secur'd from Dangers by Society and by Friendliness. Nor will this hold true only of particular Men, but likewise of whole States and Communities; there having never been any Commonwealth so Powerful, or so well establish'd, as not sometimes to stand in need of their Neighbours Assistance; since no single Kingdom could long bear up against the united Forces of a strong Confederacy.

Quintilian observes (b), that an Ill Example can never be truly advantageous; for tho' it may give some Delight as the Occasion now stands, yet it afterwards draws on us a heavier Load of Mischiefs. It is impossible (says Demosthenes, Olynthiac. 2.) to obtain any firm and durable Power, by Injuries, by Perjury, and by Lies. Epicurus himself in his Notions of Justice, was very honourable and very fair, as Gassendus hath given us this short Representation of them (c). Justice not only never hurts any one, but on the contrary always carries along with it something conducing to the Ease and Tranquillity of the Mind; which it likewise farther supports with the hopes of wanting nothing that uncorrupted Nature can desire. A Soul where Injustice hath taken up its Seat, cannot but be in perpetual Disorder and Confusion, whilst

when it attempts any thing with never so much Secrecy, yet it hath no Assurance that the Fact will always be undiscover'd (1). And since Justice is design'd for the Promotion of the Common Good, it's plain that nothing can be just which doth not tend to the Advantage of whole Societies, and of each Member in particular. And because every one by the Guidance of Nature, desires and pursues what is Good for him, it is necessary, that whatever is just should be according to Nature, and should therefore be call'd Natural. And this Justice is nothing else but the Pledge and Assurance of General Profit: For while it takes place by the Universal Consent of all Parties, there arises this Common Advantage, that Men do not mutually give, and receive Injuries, but live in Peace and Quietness together: Which as it is Good and Profitable, so doth Nature incite every Man to embrace and to pursue it (d). Though it must be observ'd by the way, That what Gassendus afterwards delivers about a different Profit among different Persons, and about a variable Justice, must not be admitted in regard to Natural Law, but only to Civil Constitutions.

In short, any is able to judge what a Contradiction it is almost to common Sense, to make such a Profit as is opposite to Justice, the Standard of Acting. The Sophist Protagoras in Plato, pag 225. Ed. Franc. Ficin. though a Trifler in other Matters, yet had Wit enough to speak smartly on this Point. In other Habits, says he, if a Man pretend, for example, to be an excellent Piper, when he doth not understand a Note, he either raises the Laughter or the Indignation of those that hear him; and his Friends admonish him of his Madness and Vanity. But the Case is quite otherwise in Injustice. For suppose some Persons know another to be really Unjust, yet should the Man himself confess that he is guilty of that Vice before Strangers, they would take it for granted that he was out of his Wits; maintaining that such a Wickedness is never to be discover'd, but the contrary Virtue always to be pretended to, whether it be really practis'd or not. Not to counterfeit Justice therefore they take to be a Senseless Extravagance; since whoever makes a contrary Profession deserves to be driven out of Human

The latter, by losing their Dependants, could suffer only some little Damage in their Revenues. Ed. Paris.) placeth the chief Strength and Foundation of all his Advice to his Country-men in this Principle, that there is more Gain and Profit in a Peaceful Competency, than in a needless pursuit of Abundance: That Justice is much more eligible than Injury, and the Care of their own Possessions, than the Desire of other Men's. Which Assertion he afterwards proves at large, and which is much more to the present Purpose than that above-mention'd by our Author. (b) *Declam. 255. (c) Syntagm. Part. 3. c. 24, & 25. (d) Diodor. Sicul. l. 25. Eclog. 1. Epicurus in the Book which he calls Settled Notions, affirms that a Life led according to Justice is free from all Trouble and Disquiet; but that Injustice was full of Disturbance and Disquiet Converse and Society. No Man is so bad (says Quintilian (a) as that he desires to seem Bad. And almost every Body speaks more honestly than he either thinks or acts.

But the Divine Providence hath sufficiently confuted this pernicious Opinion, by making its boldest Patrons and Assertors feel the fatal Consequences of it. To give an Instance or two. 'Lysander, that crafty Designer, who 'manag'd most Affairs by Cheats and Shuffles, 'who plac'd all Right in Profit, who affirm'd 'Truth and Lyes to be indifferent things, and 'either to be most valuable as it was most advantageous; who bragg'd that Men were to 'be deceiv'd with Oaths as Children with Dice 'or Bounding Stones; as Plutarch (b) and Polyænus (c) give his Character; did he build his Fortunes on a firmer Bottom, than if he had made Truth and Honesty the Mark and the Standard of his Proceedings (d)? Agésilæus (1), who at other times and in other Speeches, us'd to cry up Justice for the Queen of Virtues, without which, Valour and Fortitude would be of no use, yet when Phœbidas had without Orders possess'd himself of the Fort Cadmea, defended that Boldness by such kind of Rhetorick as this: That the Action of Phœbidas was to be rated and judg'd of according to the Benefit and Advantage it brought to the State. Since whatever conduc'd to the Publick Good of Lacedæmon, was to be done at a venture; whether Men were empower'd by Commission for such Performances, or not. But was not this very Exploit the occasion of the Spartans miscarrying in their Design of rendring themselves Masters of Greece?

XI. These Foundations being settled, 'tis easy to solve the Objections of the opposite Party. 'Tis ridiculously weak to conclude, that supposing different States to have set up different Laws upon the account of Profit, therefore there can be no Perpetual or Natural Law. For all Civil Laws do either presuppose or include the chief Heads of the Law of Nature, those by which the Safety of Mankind is secur'd: neither are these in the least injur'd or impair'd by the particular Ordinances, which each Commonwealth finds a necessity of superadding, for its separate Interest and Benefit. Penal Laws, or Sanctions, we acknowledge to have been instituted out of fear of Justice; or to restrain the Wickedness of Men, when the bare Dictates of Natural Law were found insufficient for that purpose. When Horace denies that Nature is able to distinguish betwixt Right and Wrong; we agree with him, if he means only that Nature which Man bears in common with Brutes; whereby Brutes themselves through the Information of their Senses do perceive, what is agreeable to their Body and what not; without the least Apprehension of Honesty or of Dishonesty. But if he means the Rational Nature we deny the Position, as absolutely false. As for Carneades his Argument, that if the Romans would be just, that is, if they would restore every one his own, they must return to their primitive Cottages; and that therefore Justice is Folly; in vulgar esteem this may bear some Semblance of a plausible Truth; but to those who look farther into it, it will appear exceeding empty and trifling. For since whatever Right we assume upon others, they may in like manner use against us; it can by no means be Profitable for us by injuriously seizing on other Mens Goods, to invite them to make Reprisals on our own. And in stating the Nature and the Definition of Profit, we are not to consider, what seems advantageous to such or such a Man at such a particular time, to the Prejudice of others; but what is of universal and perpetual Benefit and Expediency. Thus for instance, let us suppose an Officer to have rais'd a vast Estate by robbing the Publick Treasury: such an one certainly imagines it would be Folly in him, to make an exact Restitution, and so to return to his first narrowness of Fortune. But when the Prince upon convicting him of Extortion, hath adjudg'd his Goods to the Treasury, and his Person to the Gallows, do we then think he took a wiser Course to raise himself in the World, than another Person who rests contented with a competent Maintenance, innocently acquir'd? Thus, I know not whether it had not been better for the Roman People to have fate down with Satisfaction in the Enjoyment of that moderate Wealth which at first they got together without the Expence of their Virtue or Honour; than when they had rifled and plunder'd the whole World, to turn their Weapons upon themselves, and to expose the feeble Carcasses of their Empire to be torn in pieces by the Barbarous Nations. Nor do the other Arguments of Carneades as set down by Lactantius (2), require any long or any laborious Reply. For if any think it a piece of Wisdom in the Seller of a House, to dissemble its being infected with the Plague, certainly it must be own'd for Wisdom in the Buyer, if he either give false Money for his false Goods, or to punish the Author of the Cheat by the severest Methods. Lastly, as for those Cases, whether it be fair in a Shipwreck for a stronger Man to force a Plank from the Arms of a Weaker, or in a Flight for a sound Man to dispossess a wounded Souldier of his Horse, preferring his own Preservation to the Safety of his Fellow, we shall hereafter find occasion to discuss and to determine them (3). It will be sufficient for the present to make this short Remark, that Actions done upon extreme Necessity, and out of Consternation of Mind arising from Imminent Danger, and which do therefore meet rather with Excuse, than with Approbation; ought by no means to be establish'd for common Rules of Proceeding (a).

XII. The Author of the Treatise De Principiis justæ & decori, in searching after the right Notion of the Law of Nature, follows this Method. In the first place he lays down this Confess'd Principle, that there is a God, and that He created the World in Wisdom; which no Man in his Senfes will dispute. He adds, that God hath declar'd His Resolution of exercising the Virtues of Truth and Justice in His Government of the World (b). But here, besides that it scarce seems right to conceive the Divine Justice or Truth after the manner of Virtues; it is sufficiently manifest, that the Disposition or the Inclination to Justice which we attribute to God, is very different from that which Men are to exercise towards one another: In as much as the former denotes that Method by which an infinitely Great and Good Creator is pleas'd to govern His Intelligent Creatures; whereas the latter obtains only amongst Persons by Nature equal, and subject all alike to a Common and a Supreme Lord. Neither can it be at all made out that Divine and Human Justice are capable of the same Measure, from this Argument, that in Holy Scripture, we are frequently referr'd to the Example of God (c): For in those Passages the Holy Spirit is pleas'd to follow the usual way of Reasoning from a Greater to a Less. But from these Principles the said Author pag. 9, 10. concludes, that in the Creation of the World God propos'd to Himself some End. That He hath appointed Means sufficient for the obtaining that End. That a Man shall certainly be punish'd, if he deviates from that Order which God would have us observe, in the Prosecution of the End propos'd by Him to Himself, and to Mankind. And on the contrary, shall certainly be rewarded, if he direct his Life according to the Order prescrib'd by his Creator. In fine, that the Justice of God implies nothing else, but His lawful Distribution of Rewards and Punishments. In regard to this Doctrine, I question whether it can be said with any tolerable Sense, that God hath constituted any End, common to Man with Himself; or that the Order prescrib'd by Him to Man, that is, the Observation of the Law of Nature doth produce the End for which God created the World. Nor can the Crudenefs of the following Aphorism pass with ordinary Digestions: That the Natural Necessity which is in God doth lay on Men a Necessity of pursuing Virtue, and of flying Vice. Yet suppose we should be brought to grant all this, and then should guide our Search after the Law of Nature by some such general Maxim and Rule, Whatever things are by Nature so dispos'd, as to hinder the End which God propos'd in the Creation of the World; all those things are prohibited by the Law of Nature: But whatever things are so naturally order'd, that the End before-mention'd cannot be obtain'd without them, those are certainly enjoin'd or commanded by the same Law: We shall still be at a loss to understand what necessary Relation every particular Precept of the Law of Nature bears to that End; whilst the End it self is not perfectly discover'd by us. Thus, for Example, there would be need of a Train of Deductions, to make me apprehend, that the End for which the World was created cannot be attain'd without honouring one's Parents, or that Theft is repugnant to the said End. 'Tis meer trifling therefore to stick upon such General Terms, without calling in the Assistance of nearer and more distinct Principles. And the Foundation of the Law of Nature must be always left in the dark by him, who can make no farther Progress in the Question, than to tire us with such Repeitions, that since the World was made in Wisdom and Order; and since Man hath his part assign'd him in the Universal Harmony; therefore that Order ought necessarily to point out to every Man his Duty, in every Action or Proceeding.

XIII. Thus far most are agreed, that the Law of Nature is to be drawn from Man's Reason; flowing from the true Current of that Faculty, when unperverted (d). On which account the Holy Scriptures declare it to be written in the Hearts of Men (1). This we judge to be a most manifest Truth, that although the sacred Writings do throw in a more enlarged Light to direct us in the clearest View of Nature's Law: Yet the same Law may without that extraordinary Assistance be found out and solidly demonstrated, by the bare force of Reason, such as God first implanted and still preserves in Mankind. Yet here we by no means think it Necessary to maintain, that the General Principles of Natural Law, are Innate, or imprinted as it were upon Men's Minds from their very Birth, in the manner of distinct and actual Propositions; so as to be readily express'd and utter'd by them, as soon as they arrive at the use of Speech, without farther Instruction or Meditation. For that these Native Ideas or Original Characters are no better than unwarrantable Fictions (2), any one may discover, who will be so curious as to observe nicely the Steps by which Children make their Progress in Knowledge, clearing themselves by little and little from the Ignorance of their Infant State. Nor is it a Consideration of little Weight in this point, that the Holy Scriptures frequently describe Infancy and Childhood, by the Ignorance, and Riper Age by the Knowledge of Right and Wrong (a). Dr. Cumberland must be our Guide and Master in these Disquisitions, who hath most clearly demonstrated (b), that although we reject the Notion of those Innate Propositions, yet the Knowledge of the Law of Nature is truly and really imprinted on Human Minds by God, as he is the first Mover and Director of them: Whence likewise any one may readily discover that 'tis his Will and Command, we should act according to that Law. That Phrase in Romans II. 15. which is urg'd so hardly by some Authors is certainly Figurative (1), and implies no more than a clear and certain Knowledge treasur'd up in the Memory; of which the Persons spoken of are convicted in their own Consciences, by what means soever those Notions first enter'd into their Thoughts. Thus too those Sins which in Jeremiah XVII. 1. are said to be engraven on the Tables of the Heart, in as much as they were actual Transgressions, could not be discover'd at the Nativity of the Offenders (c). That Readiness which we see in Children and in the Ignorant Multitude, to distinguish Right from Wrong, is owing in a great Measure to Exercise and Use; whilst from their early Years and the first opening of the Reason, they observe Good Things to be approv'd of, and Evil Things to be exploded; the former to be attended with Praise, the latter with Punishment (2). Their Minds are so fix'd and dispos'd by daily Practice, and by the whole Series of common Life, that few of them so much as doubt whether they may not proceed by other Methods. Whoever considers this matter accurately will discover that 'tis very hard to give a Reason for many Practices, which yet the common People undertake without Scruple or Hesitation. To borrow an Instance from a late Author (d), If a Man be found Committing a Robbery, the Multitude presently join Hands and Minds to pursue and to seize the Thief: But if upon a Quarrel one Man hath kill'd another, every Body wishes he may get off safe; at least no Body willingly assists in the taking of him. The reason of such a Difference the Vulgar understand not, which is this; Every one is more in danger from a Thief, who designs to plunder wherever he can meet with Booty; than from an Actor of Man-slaughter, who intends Mischief to none but to the Person who gave him Provocation. Therefore when we acknowledge the Law of Nature to be the Dictate of Right Reason, our Sense and Meaning is this, that the Understanding of Man is endued with such a Power, as to be able from the Contemplation of Human Condition, to discover a Necessity of living agreeably to this Law; as likewise to find out some Principle, by which the Precepts of it may be clearly and solidly demonstrated (e). Nor is it any Rub or Prejudice to this Doctrine, that the artificial Method of demonstrating these Natural Precepts, is not known or apprehended by all Men; and that most Persons both learn and observe the Law of Nature by Custom, and by the common Course and Tenour of living. For we see every day the common Mechanicks and Artificers performing many things, either by Imitation, or by the compendious Direction of Instruments, the Proof of which they do not in the least understand: And yet this doth not hinder such Operations from being truly Mathematical, or from being founded on solid Principles of Reason. Hence it likewise appears what Rule we are to measure our Reason by, in judging of its Fitness for the Discovery of Natural Law: or whence we may be assur'd whether such a Dictate proceeds from Right, or from deprav'd Reason. The Dictates of Right Reason are true Principles, which agree with the Nature of things well observ'd and examin'd; and which are deduc'd from other true and first Principles, by the Rules of Good Consequence. On the contrary, those are Dictates of deprav'd Reason, in which a Man either lays down false Principles, or by a wrong Method deduces false Conclusions. For at the same time as we affirm the Law of Nature to be imprinted on us by the Nature of things, we imply that it is most true and infallible: Since Nature presents us with Nothing but what really exists, and produces no Effect that can be charg'd with Falshood: All Falshood arising from the Mistakes of Men, whilst they either divide such Notions as naturally cleave together, or join such together as Nature hath separated and plac'd at a distance (f). And this Course of Judging being duly follow'd, we need not fear that any one shall be able to foist upon us for Natural Law, either the frantick Notions of his ill purg'd Brain, or the irregular Desires of his misguided Mind. For 'tis in vain for that Man to make his Appeal to Reason, who cannot demonstrate his Assertions from Principles of unquestion'd Truth, and such as agree with the Nature of things; in as much as all Truth and all Rectitude consists in the Agreement of Conceptions and of Propositions with the things themselves, which they are intended to express. And he who hath not Parts enough to frame and unite the Chain of a Demonstration, must supply that defect by an exceeding Stock of Impudence, if he desires any regard should be had to his vain Conjectures, when they run astray from the receiv'd Opinions of Mankind. Moreover, it is manifest to all those who understand the force and the manner of Demonstrations, that there is not only a Necessity that the Principles made use of be true, and the first or highest that we can ascend to, but likewise that they be proper, and peculiar to the Question in Debate, and so very clear, that the Mind apprehending by their Means the Cause of the thing asserted, may rest satisfied, and neither desire nor want any farther Proof. Now against this Rule of finding out the Dictates of Right Reason, those Authors have not only transgress'd, whose Foundations of Natural Law we have already examin'd: But those too, who think it sufficient to build that Law on so slender a Bottom as this, that Natural Honesty consists in the Agreement of Reason and Appetite; the Rule of which Honesty is the Excellency and the Dignity of Human Nature, and that most Noble End, for which Providence seems to have given us the Dominion and the Possession of the World. For though we could argue never so fairly, this Action is suitable to the Excellency and the Dignity of Man, and therefore honest and to be perform'd; yet this doth not furnish us with any clear and certain Knowledge, in which our Minds may rest safely without farther Enquiry: But the Question still remains in what that Excellency consists, and by Virtue of what Cause it comes to agree to Mankind. Thus if one should say to a Clergy-man, it doth not become you to frequent Taverns and Houses of Debauchery, because such Courses are repugnant to the Dignity of the Sacerdotal Office; he says nothing but Truth, in all this, but he doth not alledge the last and the strongest Reason, so as to set the Matter beyond Doubt and Dispute (a).

Although, as hath been already observ'd, it is not in the Power of every Man, to deduce the Law of Nature artificially from its Principle: yet that it may be properly said to be known to all Men enjoying the use of their Reason, it is sufficient, if even Persons of tolerable Heads are able to apprehend the Demonstration, when propos'd by others, and clearly to perceive the Truth of it, by comparing it with their own Natural Condition. As for the lowest degree of Mortals, who are acquainted with the Law of Nature, chiefly by Popular Information and by common Use, they ought to require no farther Proofs of its Certainty, than that first the Exercise of it is maintain'd by their Superiors, by whose Authority they are to be guided; and then secondly, that they themselves cannot find any probable Reasons, by which they might either confute or weaken its Force; and lastly, because they are every day sensible of its Usefulness, and of the Benefits which it confers upon Mankind. And upon this account the Law of Nature appears to be sufficiently promulgated; so that no Person of competent Years and of sound Understanding, can by any means plead invincible Ignorance of it.

For the easy Knowledge of what the Law of Nature dictates, Hobbes (b) commends the Use of this Rule, When a Man doubts whether what he is going to do to another be agreeable to the Law of Nature, let him suppose himself in the others room. For by this means, when Self-love and the other Passions, which weigh'd down one Scale, are taken thence and put into the contrary Scale, 'tis easy to guess which way the Balance will turn. And indeed this is no other than that Great Rule prescrib'd by our Saviour himself (c), of Doing to Men as we would be done by.

Dr. Sharrock is of Opinion (d) that this Rule is not Universal, because if so, a Judge must needs absolve the Criminals left to his Sentence, in as much as he would certainly spare his own Life, were he in their Place: I must needs give a Poor Petitioner what Sum soever he desires, because I should wish to be thus dealt with, if I was in His Condition: Or I must clean my Servant's Shoes, because I require him to clean mine. But the Rule will still remain unhaken, if we observe, that not one Scale only but both are to be consider'd; or that I am not only to weigh and examine what is agreeable to me, but likewise what Obligation or Necessity lies on the other Person, and what I can demand of him, without injuring either of our Duties. Yet we must confess, that this Precept cannot be esteem'd a Fundamental Axiom of the Law of Nature; since it is only a Corollary of that Law which obliges us to hold all Men equal with our selves; and therefore may be demonstrated a priori.

XIV. According to our Judgment, there seems no way so directly leading to the Discovery of the Law of Nature, as is the accurate Contemplation of our Natural Condition and Propensions. Altho' in this Consideration regard must be had to some things which are extrinsecal to a Man, and chiefly to those which are likely to promote his Interest, or to procure his Damage and Inconvenience. For whether this Law was impos'd on Man to advance his Happiness, or to check his Wickedness, (which might otherwise break out to his own Destruction) we cannot proceed more clearly in gaining a Notion of it, than by examining in what Points and Respects he hath need of Assistance, and in what he hath occasion for Restraint and Control. In the first place then, Man hath this in Common with all other Creatures endued with a Sense of their own being, that he loves himself as highly as is possible, that he endeavours by all ways and means to secure his own Preservation, to obtain what appears conducible to his Good, and to repel what is in his Judgment Evil (a). And this Self-Love (regularly speaking), is so very strong as to supersede any Inclination which a Man may have for another. Sometimes indeed Men seem to affect others with a more tender Passion than themselves, to be more delighted with their Happiness, and more disturb'd at their Misfortunes than at their own. Thus Des Cartes (b) observes, that the Love which a Good Parent bears towards his Children is so very pure, as to make him desire, neither the gaining of any thing by them, nor the possessing them in any other manner than he doth at present, nor the being join'd to them by any stricter Engagements, than those of the present Union. But considering them as his other self, he seeks their good equally with his own; or rather with greater Care, in as much as he reckons himself and his Children to make up but one entire thing, of which not thinking himself the better part, he frequently prefers their advantage to his own, and is not afraid to secure their Safety by his own Destruction (c). But now besides that, this Love is not always constant there are other Reasons why Parents are sometimes willing to have the Misfortunes of their Children transferr'd on themselves, namely, because they think themselves more able to sustain them; or because they cannot but confess that Persons of those tender Years are more worthy of Life and of Safety. And a reason why on the other hand Parents are so highly satisfied and pleas'd with the Success and Prosperity of their Offspring, may be, because they are sensible a great part of the Glory will redound to themselves, for bringing such excellent and worthy Persons into the World (d). Qui tanti talem genuere Parentes (e)? It is likewise evident, that many Persons have contentedly suffer'd Death for other Persons, whom they either lov'd with an entire Affection, or to whom they devoted themselves with an absolute Service. For these Men fancied themselves to be join'd to such Friends or Masters as lesser parts of the whole, and therefore chose to be themselves destroy'd for the Preservation of the greater Part (f). Procopius (g) tells us, that amongst the Epthalite Hunns the more Wealthy Men pick out about Twenty, or perhaps more Persons for their special Friends; these are constant Guests at their Tables, and have the Use and Command of all their Riches and Possessions, being allow'd a kind of a Common Right over all things: And when their Patron happens to die, Custom obliges them to be put alive with him into his Grave. And that such ways of Mens devoting themselves are still practic'd in Japan, we are assur'd by the Authors who describe that Country and People (h). The Truth is, in the Opinion of such Persons, the Boasts of Faith and of Affection with the Glory thence arising, are of more Value than all the things in the World besides, and are not over-purchas'd at the Expence of Life it self. Some too being depriv'd of a near Friend or of a singular Benefactor, do cast away their own Lives only out of Impatience and Despair, imagining it is impossible they should be otherwise than very miserable, having lost him on whom alone all their Hopes and Fortunes depended. Certain it is, whatever a Man doth for others, he never forgets himself; and Satan (in Job II. 4.) well express'd the common Temper and Inclination of Mankind, when he said Skin for Skin, and all that a Man hath, will he give for his Life.

Besides this Self-love, and this Desire of preserving himself by all Means and Methods, there is discoverable in Man a wonderful Impotency and Natural Indigence; so that if we should conceive any single Person quite destitute of the Assistance of others, we should conclude his Life was given him rather for a Punishment than for a Blessing. It is farther manifest, that, next to the Support and the Defence of Heaven, Men draw their chief Help and Comfort from one another. For, as the Strength of particular Persons is so unable to compass their Preservation and their Maintenance, that to live happily and conveniently they have continual Occasion for the Works and for the Supplies of their Neighbours, in as much as their own time as well as Power, would fail them to procure the most useful and the most necessary things; So on the other hand, particular Men have Convenience of furnishing others with many things which they themselves do not want, and which therefore would turn to no use or account, unless they were thus bestow'd and dispens'd (a). And as Men thus appear to be so vast a Support and Help to each other, so may they likewise in as eminent a manner prove a mutual Plague and Mischief; and they do often actually prove so, either upon the Instigation of Brutish Passions, or being compell'd by the necessity of defending themselves from the Injuries and the Assaults of others. The Truth of all which, is clear to us from daily Experience, and hath been insisted on more largely by us in the first Chapter of this Book (b). But we desire it should be well observ'd, that in seeking out the true Condition of Men, we have assign'd the first Place and Influence to Self-love, not, as if each particular Man ought in every respect to prefer himself to all others, or to measure all things by his own private Advantage, establishing his separate Interest for his chief End and Design; but because a Man is by Nature sooner sensible of the Love he bears towards himself, than of that which he bears towards others, in as much as it is natural for him sooner to perceive his own Existence, than the Existence of others. And farther, because the Care of me and of my Affairs, belongs to no body so properly as to my self. For altho' I propose the Common Good for the Mark of acting, yet since I likewise am a part of Mankind, to the Preservation of which some Care is due, this Care must needs lie more especially and more forcibly on me my self, than on any Person else in the World.

XV. Thus much being granted, it is an easy matter to discover the Foundation of Natural Law. Man is an Animal extremely desirous of his own Preservation, of himself expos'd to many Wants, unable to secure his own Safety and Maintenance without the Assistance of his Fellows, and capable of returning the Kindness by the furtherance of Mutual Good: But then he is often malicious, insolent, and easily provok'd, and as powerful in effecting Mischief, as he is ready in designing it. Now that such a Creature may be preserv'd and supported, and may enjoy the Good things attending his Condition of Life, it is necessary that he be Social, that is, that he unite himself to those of his own Species, and in such a manner regulate his Behaviour towards them, as that they may have no fair reason to do him harm, but rather incline to promote his Interests, and to secure his Rights and Concerns (c). This then will appear a Fundamental Law of Nature, Every Man ought as far as in him lies, to promote and preserve a peaceful Sociableness with others, agreeable to the main End and Disposition of Human Race in General. For by Sociableness we do not here mean a bare Readiness or Propension to join in particular Societies, which may possibly be form'd on ill Designs, and in an ill manner; as the Confederacies of Thieves and Robbers; as if it were sufficient only to join our selves with others, let our Intentions be what they will. But by this Term of Sociableness, we would imply such a Disposition of one Man towards all others, as shall suppose him united to them by Benevolence, by Peace, by Charity, and so as it were, by a silent and a secret Obligation. It would therefore be a Charge most notoriously false, should any insinuate, that the Sociableness which we establish is perfectly indifferent, and hath an equal regard to Good Society and to Bad. We said it was the Duty of every Man to promote and to practise Sociableness as far as in him lies; because, for as much as it is not in our Power to oblige all other Men to behave themselves towards us, as they ought; we have done our Duty when we have omitted nothing which we were able to perform, in moving and engaging them to exercise the like Sociableness towards us. From all which it follows, that, since he who obliges us to any End, cannot but at the same time be suppos'd to oblige us to those Means which are necessary to the attainment of that End, all Actions which necessarily conduce to this mutual Sociableness, are commanded by the Law of Nature, and, all those on the contrary, are forbidden, which tend to its Disturbance, or Dissolution.

This Method of discovering the Law of Nature, doth not only appear upon Examination to be the most plain and easy, but it is likewise own'd for the most proper and genuine way by full Consent of the greatest part of Learned Men. There's no need of heaping up Testimonies and Authorities, but we may let Seneca (d) speak for all the rest. By what other means (says he) are we preserv'd, but by the mutual Assistance of Good turns? This Commerce and Intercourse of Kindnesses, adds Strength and Power to Life, and, in case of sudden Assaults, puts it into a better Condition of Defence. Take us all asunder, and what are we, but an easy and an unequal Prey to Wild Beasts. Man by Nature is weak on every side, Society fortifies his Infirmary, and arms his Nakedness. Those two Excellencies of Reason and of Society render him the most potent of all Creatures, who would otherwise be obnoxious to Injuries from every thing about him. Thus by the help of Union he commands the World, who, if divided would scarce be a Match for any living Rival. And it is Society alone, which gives him his Sovereign Sway over the Inferior Creation. This was the thing which first restrain'd the Violence of Diseases, which lent Crutches and Supports to Old Age, and administred Consolation to Grief. Take away this, and you cut asunder the Band of Union, the Vital String of Mankind (a).

There are other less Principal Causes, or rather Arguments of a Sociable Nature in Men. For Example, because nothing is more sad and disagreeable, than perpetual Solitude (b): Because, otherwise we should have no use of our Tongue, that most Noble Instrument, by the help of which Mankind have this Advantage above all living things, that they are able to express their inward Sentiments in articulate Sounds (c): Because every Good and Excellent Person is desirous of showing his Worthy Deeds amongst others. Amongst these Secondary Reasons of Sociality, is that which Tully takes notice of in his first Book of Offices, c. 44. There are some People, says he, that fancy all Leagues and Associations amongst Men, to arise from the need that one Man hath for another, toward the supplying of our Natural and Common Necessities: Because (say they) if Providence hath deliver'd us from this Care of looking after Food, and Cloathing, by appointing some extraordinary way for the Procurement of it: no Man of either Brains or Virtue, would ever trouble his Head about Business, but wholly deliver himself up to the attaining of Wisdom. But this is a Mistake; for even in that condition, a Man would fly Solitude, and wish for a Companion in his very Studies: He would be willing to Teach and to Learn, to Hear and to Speak. He talks to the same purpose in the third Book of that Work, c. 5. It is more according to Nature, for a Man to undergo all sorts of Labours and Troubles for the Service and the Conservation (if it were possible) of the whole World, after the Example of Hercules, whom the Gratitude of Men hath plac'd for his Virtue among the Gods; than to live in Solitude, and not only free from Cares, but even wallowing in Pleasures and Plenty, with all the Advantages of Strength and Beauty over and above. This it is that makes all Great and Glorious Spirits prefer the former kind of Life to the latter. What the same Author observes in his Laelius, is rather applicable to Particular Friendship than to Common Society: Friendship first arose rather from Nature than from Weakness; rather from the Bent and Inclination of Mens minds, than from the Consideration of the Profit it would produce.

We would have it observ'd, that the Fundamental Law of Nature establish'd by us, doth not disagree with that which Dr. Cumberland hath laid down in his Work on that Subject (d), concerning the Study and Endeavour after the Common Good, and the demonstrating all possible Benevolence towards all Men. For we, when we maintain that a Man ought to be Sociable, do at the same time intimate, that he ought not to make his own separate Good the Mark of his Proceedings, but the Benefit of Mankind in Common; that no Person should pursue his private Advantage, by oppressing or by neglecting other Men; and that none hath reason to hope for Happiness and Success, who either injures or despises his Neighbours.

From this Social Nature of Man, and from the Consideration that every one is born not for himself alone, but for all Human Kind, the Lord Bacon, in his Work of the Advancement of Learning, Book 7. c. 1. deduces several excellent Corollaries; as that an Active Life is preferable to a Contemplative one; that the Happiness of Man is to be sought for in Virtue, not in Pleasure; that the Fear of sudden and unexpected Accidents ought not to deter us, either for managing Publick Affairs, or from maintaining Society and Commerce with other Men: Lastly, that we ought not to withdraw our selves from Civil Business, out of a tender and scrupulous kind of Humour, or out of an Aversion to the usual Methods of Complaisance. In which place the same Noble Author farther observes, that there never was any Philosophy, Religion, Law, or Discipline found out in the World, which so far exalts the publick Good, and debases private Interest, as the Christian Institution appears to have done.

XVI. Let us consider now whether or no the Doctrine asserted by Hobbes, in his Book de Cive (e), clashes with what we have been delivering on this Head. Certainly he hath been interpreted with very great Rigour, and with very little Reason by some Learned Men, when they censure him for teaching, that Nature did not institute Society, but Discord, amongst Men, and as they hence infer, that all kind of Human Society is against the Design of Nature (f). Which is much the same thing, as if I should talk thus, Speech is by Nature actually born with no Man; therefore all Speech which is afterwards learnt, runs against Nature's Intention. Or thus, All Men by Nature come into the World little; therefore it is against Nature that they should grow up to larger Dimensions. Or, Men are by Nature subject to Diseases; therefore it is against Nature, to make use of Diet, or Physick, to pre- vent or to cure them. We must confess that this Notion of Hobbes, looks at first view extremely paradoxical; especially if a Man doth not consider diligently the Ambiguity of the Word Nature. But for fear any one should hereafter be cheated by the same doubtful Philosophy, and led fatally into Error; let us first observe, that Self-love and Sociableness ought by no means to be made Opposites; but those different Inclinations are in such a manner to be temper'd, that the former do not overthrow or disturb the latter (a). When by the Enormity of wild Lusts this Temperament is broken, and so all take up a Resolution of seeking each his own Advantage to the Injury of others; then arise those Heats and Contentions which divide and confound Mankind. For the avoiding which, the bare Care of our private Safety commands the Observation of Social Laws, since we cannot ensure our own Persons without their Assistance and Protection. As for Hobbes's Demonstration, in which he Ingeniously enough deduces those Laws which we call Natural from the Principle of Self-Preservation, the first Remark that we shall offer concerning it is this; that, such a way of Proof doth indeed clearly enough make out, how conducive it is to the Safety of Men, that they act according to those Dictates of Reason. But it is not an immediate and direct Conclusion to say, a Man hath a Right of using those means for his Preservation, therefore he is oblig'd as it were by a Law to observe and to pursue them. For to give those Dictates of Reason the Force and Authority of Laws, there is need of proceeding on some other Principle, than what he lays down.

In the next place, great Care is to be taken lest any should conclude from such Arguments and Positions, that when he hath once ensur'd his own Safety, and set himself out of danger, he need not trouble himself about the Security of other Men; or that he may insult how he please, over such a Person as doth not contribute to his Quiet and Happiness, or hath not Strength enough to disturb it. For we therefore give Men the Name of sociable Creatures, because they of all Living things are the fittest and the most able to promote the Advantage of each other: Neither is any inferior Creature capable of receiving so great Benefit (1) from Man, as Man himself. Again, the Excellency and Perfection of any particular Person rise the higher, the more he deserves of the Community by his publick Benefactions; and Works of this kind are reckon'd the most noble, being suppos'd to proceed from the greatest Wisdom: Whereas any worthless

Wretch, or a meer Fool, may be able to trouble or to hurt his Fellows. Besides, supposing every Man's private Advantage were establish'd for the Mark of his Actions, if many Persons should happen to fix that private Advantage on the very same thing (2), there will either be a necessity of saying that these many Desires including a plain Contradiction are consistent with Reason, which is the highest Absurdity: Or, since none can pretend that his Desire should have the Preference of the rest, we shall be forc'd to admit it for a Truth, that no Man ought so to make his own Profit the Aim of his Proceedings, as not to consider and to regard the Good of others. Farther, whoever attempts to draw every thing to himself and to his own Interest, without looking towards his Neighbour, will not only labour in vain, (it being impossible that all Persons and all things should be dispos'd according to the contradictory Desires and Wills of Particular Men) but he will likewise invite others to plunder and to destroy him. Moreover, if that only can be said to be Good to a particular Person, which conduces to his separate Interest, it follows, that in respect of all other Persons it must be Evil, in as much as their Interest or Profit is not further'd by it: And so what one covets and pursues, all the rest will oppose and keep off, which cannot but raise perpetual clashing and contending amongst Men (b). Lastly, although another Person hath done me neither Good nor Hurt, and though he hath nothing in him to raise either my Fear or my Love; yet Nature obliges me to esteem even such an one as my Kinsman and my Equal. Which Reason alone, (had we no others) were sufficient to enforce the Practice of a Friendly Society and Correspondence amongst Men. And upon this Consideration, supposing there was a Nation in the World maintaining Peace and Justice amongst themselves, and of such mighty Strength as to be formidable to all others, and so not restrain'd from hurting them by the Fear of a like return; yet should this Nation or People assault, drive, kill, or drag, into Slavery their weaker Neighbours, as often as they thought convenient, we should pronounce them actually guilty of a Breach of the Law of Nature. And yet (as we suppose) these People might preserve themselves, whether they allow'd any Rights to others, or not (c). In the same manner, none will commend the Life and Profession of Robbers, because they exercise some little Justice towards those of their Gang, because their Captains divide the Prizes equally amongst them, and because he who either openly or secretly robs one of the Crew, is (even by Thieves,) ad-

(a) Arrian. Epictet. l. 1. c. 19. God has dispos'd the Nature and Constitution of Rational Creatures after such a manner, that they can't advance their Private, without contributing something to the Publick Interest. Community doth not exclude the Pursuit of Private Advantage. (1) Our Author must mean Harm, for to say Benefit, would not be agreeable to right Reasoning. (2) Again, our Author is guilty of an Inadvertency, for instead of saying, on the very same thing, he doubtless meant to say, on things very different from one another, as appears from his Reasoning afterwards. (b) Vid. D. Cumberland. c. 5. where he prosecutes this Argument at large. It is a Poor Centre of a Man's Actions, himself: says my Lord Bacon, Ess. 23. (c) *Cicero de Fin. l. 3. c. 19. judg'd unworthy of farther Partnership and Society with them (a). This Rule of extending our Care beyond our own Persons, is so much the more diligently to be attended to, the more evident it is, that a Man of more Strength and Power than ordinary, is likely to be tempted to the Violation of Natural Law, by the Thoughts of his own Self-sufficiency; that since his private Safety is abundantly provided for, he need not give himself the trouble of maintaining Peace and Friendship with his Neighbours.

But to conclude this Point, as the Care of our own particular Preservation doth not exclude a Concern for Society, so neither doth a kind regard to Society suppress our Affection to our Persons, but they are both extremely agreeable and consistent, as appears sufficiently from the Rule propos'd by our Saviour, when he commands us to love our Neighbours as our selves (b). Indeed Reason plainly informs us, that whosoever hath a hearty desire for his own Security must not, cannot neglect the Care of his Fellows. For, since our Safety and Happiness depend for the most part on the Benevolence and on the Assistance of others, and since the Nature of Men is such, that for Benefits conferr'd they expect a return of Kindness, and when no such return is made, refrain from farther Favours: No Person in his Wits can stick so close to the Pursuit of his separate Advantage, as to divest himself of all regard to the rest of the World: But rather the more rationally he loves himself, the more earnest he will be in endeavouring by Good turns to procure the Love of other Men. For no one hath any reason at all to hope, that Men will voluntarily contribute towards advancing his Happiness, whom they know to be malicious, perfidious, ingrateful, and inhuman, and that these wicked Practices are the Requitals which he will make for their Bounty: on the contrary it should be expected, that they will all join together in ridding the Earth of such a Monster, or at least in restraining him from doing farther Mischief.

XVII. Neither is the following Argument which the Hobbiſts make use of at all conclusive; 'Particular Men when they join Society or Company with certain others, have regard to some peculiar Good or Benefit, which is likely to redound to themselves: therefore Human Nature in General is not determin'd to Society, or, I am not oblig'd to behave my self in a social manner towards him, from whom I do not expect some particular Advantage. For thus much indeed is evident, that the reason why certain Men join in any certain Species of Society, is either because they have a peculiar Resemblance and Agreement in Disposition of Mind, or in other Qualities; or else because they think they shall better obtain some end which they drive at, amongst these Persons than amongst others. But, (besides that, regularly speaking, no Man hath the Property of belonging to no particular Society,) even amongst Men who are united only by the common Tie of Humanity, that general Sociableness and Peace are to be observ'd and cultivated; which implies little more than this, that they abstain from hurting one another unjustly, and that as far as their stricter and particular Obligations leave room, they mutually promote and communicate their Interests and their Goods.

XVIII. Hence it is clear what Answer should be made to that Objection, if one Man lov'd another naturally, that is, upon account of his being a Man, then there can be no reason given, why every one should not love every one equally, all being equally Men: Or why a Man should chuse to frequent their Company most, from whom he receives either greater Honour or greater Profit. In this Fallacy, common Society is confounded with particular and stricter Confederacies, common Love, with such as arises from peculiar and singular Causes. For to deserve that common Affection, no Property is requir'd but barely the being a Man. Nature having for the Reasons above assign'd, really constituted a general Friendship amongst Men, from which no Person is excluded, unless he hath rendred himself unworthy of it by his monstrous Villanies. Now although by the Good Disposal of the All-wise Creator, our Natural Laws are so fitted to Human Condition, that the Observation of them is join'd with the Interest and Advantage of the Observers; so that even this common Love is exceedingly profitable to Mankind: Yet in assigning the Cause and Reason of it, we are wont to have recourse, not to the Benefit proceeding from it, but to the General Nature in which it is founded. For Example, if we are to give a Reason why one Man ought not to hurt another, we do not usually say, because an abstaining from mutual Violence is profitable, (although it is so indeed in the highest degree) but, because the Person being another Man, that is, another Animal related to us by Nature, it would be a Crime to offer him any harm (c).

(a) Vid. Cicero. Off. 2. c. 11. (b) Matth. XXII. 39. 'Tis a Saying of Chryſippus, recorded by Tully in his III<sup>d</sup> Book of Offices, c. 10. In the running of a Course, a Man may be allow'd, nay he ought, to stretch and contend his utmost for the Victory: But he must not, on any account, trip up his Antagonist's heels, or thrust him out of the Lists by main Force. So in Life, it is very fair and allowable, for every Man to get, by honest means, whatever makes for Use and Advantage; but 'tis by no means Lawful that he should take it away from others. (c) Lucian in Amoribus, Tom. 1. p. 893. Ed. Amst. We do not, like Brute Creatures, affect Solitary Meditations, but joining together in a Friendly Society, we make our Joys to be the greater and our Affections the less, by being mutually communicated: And our Pleasures having many Sharers in them, fill us with the truer Satisfaction and Delight. Dio Chryſostom. (Orat. 12.) tells us, that the Reason why Jupiter hath often the Title of φίλιος & ἑταίριος, The Kind and the Friendly, is because he gathers, as it were, all Mankind into Unity and Society, and would have them prove Friends to each other, without the least mixture of Hatred or Opposition. In like manner (says he) he is call'd ξένιος or Hospitable, because we ought really to think no Man a stranger to us.

Yet besides this Common and Universal Affection, some Circumstances may make a Man love one Person in a higher degree than another: Suppose because their Inclinations particularly agree, and their Heads lie the same way; or because this Person is more able or more willing to promote his Advantage; or because their Race or Original makes them allied to each other. As to that Observation about Mens being more willing to frequent such Company, where they find themselves prefer'd to others in Honour and in Profit; the reason of the thing is this, because every one must naturally love his own Interest, if he have Wit enough to understand it. But this Love is by no means repugnant to the sociable Nature of Mankind, if it doth not rise to such a guilty height, as to disturb the Harmony and Agreement which is universally to be maintain'd amongst Men. For Providence did not for this reason give us a sociable Nature, that we should therefore neglect our selves and our own Affairs. But rather we are studious of Society on this very account, that by a mutual Communication of Assistance and of Goods, our own Concerns may be manag'd with more Conveniency, and with more Success. And altho' when a Man unites himself to any particular Society, he hath a prime Regard to his own Interest, and but a secondary one to the Interest of his Companions; not being able to carry on his own Matters without such a Conjunction; yet this doth not hinder him from being oblig'd, so to pursue his private Ends and Advantage, as not to injure either the Corporation in general, or any single Member of it; and sometimes to postpone his separate Good, for the Advancement of the common Benefit.

What is urged about the Original of great and lasting Societies, or States, (it being said that they are not deriv'd from mutual Benevolence, but from mutual Fear; by which word they mean any kind of Precaution, or Foresight,) is entirely beside the purpose. For as the Question doth not at present proceed about the rise of Civil Society in General; so farther, it is highly agreeable to our Natural Condition, that whereas single Persons, or a few join'd in Confederacy might lie perpetually expos'd to the Insults of such Wretches as pursue their private Ends without regard to their Neighbours; many should unite in a Body and so strengthen their Guard against farther Assaults and Mischiefs. Neither is it indeed absolutely necessary to the proving any Society agreeable to Nature, to say that it arose entirely from Mutual Benevolence. And yet even this Principle must be allowed some little Share at least in the forming of States, since the Persons who first begin them are commonly join'd on the account of Kindness and Good liking, though many others may afterwards engage in the same Union, by the Inducement of Fear. But as for this Fear which is look'd on as the Cement of States, as likewise for that Dispute, whether or no Man by Nature be ζῶον πολιτικόν, we shall examine them more at large when we come to enquire into the Rise and the Original of Commonwealths.

XIX. This Principle which we have establish'd for deducing the Law of Nature, as it is the most Genuine and the most Clear, so we take it to be in such a high degree adequate and sufficient, that there is no Natural Obligation bearing a regard to other Men, the reason of which is not terminated here, as in the chief Head and Fountain of Duty. Yet, as we shall hereafter show, to give these Dictates of Reason the Force and Authority of Laws, there is a necessity of supposing that there is a God, and that his Wise Providence oversees and governs the whole World, and in a particular manner the Lives and the Affairs of Mankind. For we cannot by any means subscribe to the Conjecture which Grotius starts in his Prolegomena, or Introduction, N. XI. That the Laws of Nature would take place, should we (as we cannot without the most horrid Impiety) deny either the Being of God or His Concern in Human Business. For should any Wretch be so horribly senseless as to maintain that wicked and absurd Hypothesis in the rankest way, and so hold Men to have deriv'd their Being wholly from themselves; according to them, the Edicts of Reason could not rise so high as to pass into a Condition of Laws; in as much as all Law supposes a Superior Power. 'Tis a good Observation of Tully, De Naturâ Deorum, l. 1. c. 2. I know not (says he) but that upon taking away Religion and Piety towards the Gods, all Faith and Society of Human Kind, and even the most excellent Virtue of Justice must be banish'd the World (a). Unless the Rules would be observ'd out of a bare regard to Interest, as those are which the Physicians prescribe in the Regimen of Health. Grotius seems to have taken the Hint of that Notion from a Passage in Marcus Antoninus (1); If (says the Emperour) the Gods do not consult about any of our Affairs, which the vilest Impiety can scarce believe; why then 'tis fit that I should consult or deliberate about my own Concerns: And all my Deliberation must be concerning what is most Profitable for me. Now that is most Profitable to every one, which best agrees with his Nature and Constitution. And my Nature is to be Rational, and to be a Sociable Member of some City or State. My City and Country, as I am Antoninus, is Rome, as I am a Man, is all the World: Those things therefore which are Profitable to these Communities are the only things which are Good and Expedient for me.

As to what a certain Learned Man objects, that particularly the Virtue of Fortitude, cannot be demonstrated from our Principle, unless we farther suppose the Immortality of the Soul; since otherwise there would be no Reward to a Man who should throw away his Life on a good Cause: This will require no great pains to answer. For although really to deny, or so much as to call in question so certain a Truth be extremely impious; yet without bringing this High Point into the Argument, it is possible to demonstrate, that a Soldier may fairly be commanded to fight to Death in the Behalf of his Country. For, besides that, there appears yet no clear Reason why we must sacrifice (as it were) every good Action to some external Reward; thus much is universally agreed on, that 'tis in the power of the Sovereign to arm the Subjects, and to lead them out against the Enemy in defence of the State; and farther, when they find it requisite to forbid every one under pain of Capital Punishment, to quit his Station by Flight. Now of two Evils the lesser is most certainly to be chose. But it is a less Evil to fight with extraordinary Danger, and even to the last Breath, than to suffer unavoidable Death for running away. And therefore that Soldier must be the greatest Fool as well as the greatest Coward, who would not chuse rather to fall honourably by the Enemies hand, having first anticipated his own Revenge, than to deliver up himself to be ignominiously dispatch'd by the Executioner (a). It seems sufficient that a Man fight with all his Force and Ability, let his Inducement to this Behaviour be what it will. Nor is it requisite to the Preservation of States, or of Society amongst Men in general, that every particular Person should be endued with such a Firmness of Mind, as the Terrors of Death cannot shake or overcome; all Souls not being capable of this Noble pitch of Valour. Besides, the use of Fortitude doth not only discover it self in bearing Death undauntedly upon extreme occasion; but is chiefly employ'd in vigorously withstanding, and in driving off the Danger of Death, as it presses on us. Many Difficulties are not otherwise to be avoided than by undergoing others of almost equal Hazard: And Fate sooner overtakes the Coward (1), than it masters the Valiant. It is farther observable, that setting aside the Supposition of the Soul's Immortality, it doth by no means appear that the chief End and Happiness of Man consists in Pleasure. For besides that in the Doctrine of Natural Law, treated of in this manner, the Immortality of the Soul is by no means denied, but only abstracted from it; it's plain that the Pleasure of the Body, in which Epicurus is vulgarly thought to have plac'd his Summum Bonum, is so far from promoting, that it rather contradicts and hinders the Preservation, the Sociableness, the Peace and the Tranquillity of Mankind. But the Genius and the Scope of Christianity differs vastly from these meer Natural Schemes; and the Holy Apostle had good reason to affirm, that if in this Life only we had hope in Christ, we should be of all Men the most miserable. 1 Cor. 15. v. 19.

XX. But to make these Dictates of Reason obtain the Power and the Dignity of Laws, it is necessary to call in a much Higher Principle to our Assistance. For altho' the Usefulness and Expediency of them be clearly apparent, yet this bare Consideration could never bring so strong a Tie on Mens Minds, but that they would recede from these Rules, whenever a Man was pleas'd either to neglect his own Advantage, or to pursue it by some different Means, which he judg'd more proper, and more likely to succeed. Neither can the Will of any Person be so strongly bound by his own bare Resolution, as to hinder him from acting quite contrary, whenever the Humour takes him. And altho' we should suppose many Persons standing in a Natural Liberty, and combining to keep these Precepts, yet the Force of them could then last no longer, than the Agreement from whence they deriv'd it. Nor would the Obligation then only cease when all the consenting Parties should please to alter their Minds; (as is now the manner of receding from mutual Covenants by common Consent;) but even during the General Agreement, the Power of obliging would be wanting to the Compact: In as much as we suppose, that Dictate of Reason which commands us to stand to our Bargains and Promises, not yet to have obtain'd the Authority of a Law; and therefore 'tis at every ones Pleasure to renounce the Covenant, whether the other Persons concern'd are willing or not. Lastly, the meer Force of Human Command seems insufficient to invest these Dictates with the Power of Obligation. For since no such Command could take place otherwise than by the Intervention of Covenants, and since Covenants, owe all their Strength to some Law, it doth not appear how there could arise any Human Sovereignty capable of imposing Obligations, unless the Dictates of Reason were beforehand receiv'd for Laws. Or should we grant the Fancy of some, that Human Government depends only on Human Consent, and then make these Rational Duties be enjoin'd the Subjects like other Laws; yet even thus they would obtain no more Power than Positive Constitutions, which depend on the Will of the Legislator, both as to their Original, and their Duration (b). It is therefore on all accounts to be concluded and to be maintain'd, that the Obligation of Natural Law proceeds from GOD himself, the Great Creator and Supreme Governour of Mankind; who by Virtue of his Sovereignty hath bound Men to the Observation of it. And thus much may be demonstrat'd by the sole Light of Natural Reason. Here then we lay it down as a Granted Truth, that GOD ALMIGHTY is the Creator and Governour of the World, since it hath been shown with so much evidence by Wise and Learned Men, and since no Person of Sense and Understanding, ever call'd it in question (1). Now this Supreme Being having so form'd and dispos'd the Nature of things and of Mankind, as to make a Sociable Life necessary to our Subsistence and Preservation; and having on this account indued us with a Mind capable of entertaining such Notions as conduce to this End, and having insinuated these Notions into our Understandings by the Movement of Natural things, deriv'd from Him the first Mover; and likewise most clearly represented to us their necessary Connexion and their Truth: Hence it follows, that it is the Will of GOD, Man should frame his Life according to that Disposition and Method which he seems peculiar to have assign'd him, above the Life of Brutes. And since this cannot otherwise be achiev'd and compass'd, than by the Observance of Natural Law, it must be suppos'd that GOD hath laid an Obligation on Man to obey this Law, as a Means not arising from Human Invention or changeable at Human Pleasure, but expressly ordain'd by GOD himself for the Accomplishment of this Design. For when any Sovereign enjoins his Subject the pursuit of such an End, he is at the same time suppos'd to oblige him to make use of those Means, without which the End cannot be attain'd (a). Nor is this the only Proof of Man's being oblig'd to a Social Life by the Command of GOD, that as the Condition of Mankind stands at present, we could not support and secure ourselves unless this Perswasion were firmly rooted in our Minds; and that by Order of the Divine Providence it so falls out, that by a Natural Consequence our Happiness flows from such Actions as are agreeable to the Law of Nature, and our Misery from such as are repugnant to it: But it is farther confirm'd by this Consideration, that in no other Animal there is discoverable any Sense of Religion, or any Fear of a Deity (2). To which may be added, that tender Sense of Conscience inherent in the Minds of Men that are not corrupted and debauched with Vice; by which they are convinc'd, that to sin against Nature's Law, is to offend Him, who hath a Sovereign Power over Mens Souls, and who is to be fear'd, even when we do not apprehend any Danger from Human Punishment (b).

The Laws of Nature would have a full and perfect Power of binding Men, altho' GOD ALMIGHTY had never propos'd them anew in his Reveal'd Word. For Man was under Obligation to obey his Creator, by what means soever he was pleas'd to convey to him the Knowledge of his Will. Nor was there any absolute necessity of a particular Revelation to make a Rational Creature sensible of his Subjection to the supreme Author and Governour of things. No one will deny but that those Persons who were not acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, did yet sin against the Law of Nature: Which we could not affirm, did this Law derive its force from the Promulgation made of it in the Sacred Writings. On this account we can by no means admit of that Notion started by Hobbes (c), Since those Laws (says he) which we call Natural, are nothing else but certain Conclusions apprehended by Reason, concerning things to be done and things to be omitted; And since Law in a proper Sense is only the Speech of him, who by Virtue of his Right commands Men to execute or to abstain from some Performances; therefore they are not Laws as they proceed from Nature, but only as they are enacted by GOD in Scripture. For we do not take it to be essential to a Law, that it be convey'd to the Subject's notice in the form and manner of a Proposition; but we reckon it sufficient that the Will of the Sovereign be gather'd and understood any way, whether by internal Suggestion of the Mind, or from the Contemplation of our State and Condition, and of the Nature of those Affairs and Transactions which are to engage our Life. And indeed he himself acknowledges as much in another part of the same Work (d), where he observes that the Laws of GOD are declar'd three ways; first by the tacite Dictates of Right Reason, &c. Besides, the Laws of Nature as they are deduc'd by Ratiocination, cannot be apprehended otherwise than in the manner of Propositions, and therefore in this respect they may be allow'd to bear that Name. But as in Civil Laws it matters not, whether they be promulgated in Writing, or viva voce; so the Divine Law is of equal Obligation, whether it is discover'd to Men either by GOD Himself in a visible Shape, and with the Resemblance of a Human Voice, or by Holy Men peculiarly inspir'd from Heaven; or whether, lastly, it be work'd out by Natural Reason from the Contemplation of Human Condition. For Reason, properly speaking, is not the Law of Nature it self, but the Means, upon a right Application of which that Law is to be discover'd. Nor doth the manner and the method of promulgating a Law belong to its inward Essence and Constitution. Farther, altho' it seem a more clear and a more compendious way of revealing ones Will to another, to force it upon his Senses by express Words and Speeches: Yet that is likewise reckon'd to be sufficiently reveal'd, which we must unavoidably discover, if we make use of the occasion offer'd and keep the way that we are put into. And thus Man, who by the Bounty of his Creator, enjoys the Faculty of comprehending both his own and other Mens Actions; and of judging whether or no they are agreeable to Human Nature, cannot but take occasion (supposing there are more Men in the World besides himself) to observe and consider how some of those Actions do really thus agree, to the Inclination and to the Condition of Mankind (a).

Altho' to render a Law obligatory, there is a necessity of making it known to the Subject; and altho' to deduce the Law of Nature from the Suggestions of Reason, and to apprehend its Foundation, and its necessary Connexion with the State of Humanity, be not the Gift of every Person; Yet hence it can neither be pretended, that this Law doth not oblige all Men, or that it may not be said to be known by the Light of Reason. For to give a Law a binding Force, a Popular and simple Knowledge is sufficient; nor is an artificial Demonstration and Deduction absolutely requisite to this purpose. And altho' 'tis very probable that the chief Heads of Natural Law were expressly deliver'd by God Almighty to the first Mortals, and were from them communicated to others by Custom and Institution; yet the Knowledge of that Law may nevertheless be stil'd Natural, in as much as the necessary Truth and Certainty of it may be drawn from the use of Natural Reason. At the same time, because those Propositions which represent to us the Law of Nature, are insinuated into Mens minds from the Contemplation of the Nature of things; on that account they are justly attributed and referr'd to GOD, the Author of Nature (b).

The Wifest of the Old Heathens acknowledg'd the Authority of Natural Law, and deriv'd it rightly from GOD. Thus Plutarch (c) Ταυτὸν ἔστι τὸ ἐπιταῖσι θεῶν, καὶ τὸ περὶθεταῖσι λόγοις. To follow GOD and to obey Reason is the same thing. But Tully hath left the most Noble Testimony for our purpose, as it is cited out of his Books de Republicâ by Laëtantius (d). There is indeed (says he) a Law agreeable to Nature, and no other than Right Reason, made known to all Men, constant and perpetual; which calls us to Duty by Commands, and deters us from Sin by Threats; and whose Commands and Threats are neither of them in vain to the Good, tho' they may seem of little force to the Wicked. This Law we are neither allow'd to disannul, nor to diminish; nor is it possible it should be totally revers'd; the Senate or the People, cannot free us from its Authority. Nor do we need any other Explainer or Interpreter of it besides our selves. Nor will it be different at Rome and at Athens, now and hereafter; but will eternally and unchangeably affect all Persons in all Places: GOD Himself appearing the Universal Master, the Universal King. 'Tis He, who is the Inventor, the Expounder, the Enacter of this Law; which whosoever shall refuse to obey, shall fly and loath his own Person, and renounce his Title to Humanity; and shall thus undergo the severest Penalties, tho' he escape every thing else which falls under our common Name and Notion of Punishment. Sophocles speaks very honourably on the same Subject in his first Oedipus, Act 3d, p. 187. Deriv'd from Heaven and High Olympian Jove,
And not the mean Device of Mortal Men.

Mr. Selden, in his Discussion of this Point, hath shown (e), that altho' the Gentiles did acknowledge the chief Heads of Natural Law to be sometimes violated thro' the corrupt Manners of Men; and to be (as it were) oppress'd and stifled by wicked Ordinances and Constitutions; yet they were at the same time fully perswaded that their τὸ αὐτοσχεῖον, or what was really just and fit to be done, did by order of the Gods perpetually remain the same, and hold the same Force of Obligation. Whence arose that common Opinion amongst them of the Punishment of Wicked Men in another State; when they had been guilty of any monstrous Offence against the Law of Nature. And since they thus believ'd the Gods to be the Avengers of its Violation, we may take it for granted that they thought them too the Authors and Founders of its Authority. On the other hand, such of them as had any Sense or any Virtue, did as fairly suppose, that Good Men exercising Piety never fail'd of the peculiar Countenance and Consideration of Heaven. Thus Iamblicus (a) "Ἐν τῷ ἐν ἡμῶν διανοεῖται θεῖ ἀληθές, &c. We must take this therefore for a certain Truth, that nothing properly evil shall happen to a Good Man, either in this Life or after it. Nor are Affairs and Concerns of such a Person neglected by the Immortal Deities. And Euripides (1), "Εἰς τὰς οἰαῖς εὖ εὖ εὖ, &c. Good Men do at last obtain what their Virtue hath deserv'd: But Evil Men shall never arrive at any tolerable degree of Happiness. But Mr. Selden farther shews (2) it to have been a constant Opinion amongst the Primitive Christians, that in the Interval betwixt the Creation and the Publication of the Decalogue, those Natural and Universal Laws were given to Mankind, which were afterwards intertied in the Mosaical Constitutions. Hence was drawn that most excellent Observation of St. Chrysostome (b), that to the Commandments about the honouring of Parents, about Murder, about Adultery, and about Theft, GOD was therefore pleas'd to add no reason; because those Duties were already well known and understood, as being main Points of the Law Natural; whereas to the Ordinance concerning the Sabbath-day, a reason of the Precept was designedly affix'd, upon account of its being positive and arbitrary (c). To conclude, all Legislators have believ'd that their Laws of what kind soever would derive the greatest Strength and Authority from the Succours of Religion: As Appears from their Solemn Custom of ushering in all their Constitutions, with the Worship of the Gods (d).

XXI. It is well worth our while to treat more distinctly and more carefully concerning the Sanction of the Law of Nature. And to this purpose, besides what we have formerly deliver'd about the Sanction of Laws in General, we will first of all observe, that the Goods and Evils which happen to Man, may be both divided into three Ranks or Classes. And as for the Goods, some of them proceed, either from the free and liberal Donation of the Creator, or from the voluntary Benevolence of other Men, or from the Industry of the Acquirers, to which Industry they determin'd themselves by their own free Choice. And it is plain, that this first sort are not owing to the Observation of the Laws. Other Goods there are which flow by a Natural Consequence, from some Actions which the Laws command: The Creator having been pleas'd to assign to such and such Performances of the Laws such perpetual and natural Effects, productive of the Good and Profit of Mankind. And these are those which Dr. Cumberland calls Natural Rewards. A third kind of Goods proceed from some certain Actions, either the Pleasure of the Legislator, or by the Covenant and Agreement of Men; of which the former are call'd κατ' ἐξουσίαν, Rewards, or Arbitrary Returns, the latter more properly Wages. In the same manner may Evils be divided. Some of them follow the very Nature and Condition of Men; (if we abstract the first Cause and Original of that Condition;) or they happen without the particular Default of him who suffers them. Which we may, in a sound Sense, call Fatal Evils, opposing the Word Fate, not to the Divine Disposal, but to the peculiar Faultiness of the Person on whom these Evils light. Others do, by Natural Consequence and Connexion, proceed from Sins; which are by some Authors term'd Natural Punishments. Lastly, others there are which arise from Sins, by the peculiar Determination and Disposal of the Legislator beyond the manner of Natural Effects: In which the Quality, the Manner, the place and time of the Evil depend on the Legislator's free Pleasure. And these are what we would properly call Punishments, or (in a looser Sense of the Word) Arbitrary Punishments.

Thus much being premis'd, we proceed to remark, that altho' the Omnipotent Creator, might by virtue of his Sovereign Right have requir'd our Obedience, without making any good Fruit proceed thence to our own Advantage: Yet it hath pleas'd his Infinite Goodness, so to order and constitute the Nature of Things and of Mankind, that by a kind of Natural Connexion some Goods should attend the Observance, and some Evils the Transgression of Nature's Laws. Thus a constant Obedience, is follow'd by Serenity and Security of Conscience, join'd with a good and certain Assurance; by a good Frame and a settled Tranquillity of Mind (3); by the Preservation of the Body from many Evils, not fatal: Besides an infinite number of advantages, which may be obtain'd by the mutual Benevolence and Good Offices of other Men (e). On the other hand from the Violation of the same Laws, arise by a Natural Connexion, Disquiet of Conscience, Disturbance and Degeneracy of Mind, Destruction of the Body, and numberless Evils, which may be occasion'd by the withdrawing of other Mens Assistance, or by the Violence of their provok'd Revenge (f).

Modesty and Chastity enjoy a perfect Leisure, whilst Lust is ever tir'd with laborious Pursuits. To Conclude, the Possession of every Virtue stands us in little Cost or Trouble, but Vices are all Chargeable to be kept.* Add. de Irâ, l. 2. c. 30. & ult. & l. 3. c. 5, 26. Now although these Rewards and these Punishments, are by some imagin'd not to proceed with Certainty enough from Good and Evil Actions; because many Persons in return for Benefits receive only Hatred, Envy, or Injury; whilst others on the contrary do securely enjoy the Fruits of their Wickedness, without Molestation or Punishment; whence we cannot be infallibly assur'd before-hand, that our Good Deeds will be equally repaid by other Men; (though the Fruit which arises in our selves from such honest Practices is not capable of Hindrance or of Interruption:) yet thus much is beyond dispute, that more Advantages most surely and certainly follow from good and just Proceedings, than we can in reason expect from the opposite Vices (a). And altho' the whole Train of those Goods do not attend on such a conscientious Behaviour, as in the Nature of things they were dispos'd to do; yet we have a fair Probability that many of them will not disappoint us; at least, that we shall obtain a greater share than we could have hop'd for from a Course of Dishonesty and Wickedness. And so by this means we provide much better for our own Security, and have much fairer Grounds to hope that others will, in their turn, be alike ready to promote our Interests and Concerns; than if laying aside all regard to our Neighbours, we directed every thing towards our own private Advantage; and therefore infinitely better than if by the Exercise of Violence or of Deceit, we endeavour'd to make our own Gains and Profits out of the Losses of other Men. By this way of reckoning therefore it appears, that the Value of that Reward which will follow upon a Good Action, doth, all things rightly consider'd, exceed the Gain of the opposite illegal Practice.

We desire it should be well observ'd, that whilst we are here treating about the natural Effects of Good and of Evil Actions, we do not by any means reckon amongst these Effects those kind of Goods which we but now rank'd in the first Class, and which our own Prudence and Industry either cannot obtain, or cannot avoid. Such things both may, and generally do happen alike to Virtuous and to Vicious Men. Thus a wicked Person may by the Gift of Nature possess a vigorous and a healthy Body, while perhaps a Man of Honesty and Piety labours under a weak and crazy Constitution. And thus Death lays hold promiscuously on the Just and on the Vile. But the only Goods we here allude to are such as it is in the Power of Human Reason to provide for us; and which do therefore in some measure depend upon our own Act. Now although some part of those Goods which we intend by the Observance of the Law of Nature to obtain from other Men, has a Dependence on their Kindness and on their Probity, and so is not absolutely in our own power; yet for as much as in all Probability, they have the same End and Design with our selves, we have at least fair reason to hope for and to expect such Good Usage and Retribution from them, though we cannot give our selves an infallible Assurance of it, before it comes. Scarce any Man hath met with so many Enemies in the World, as not to own himself indebted to some Benefactors. And we see that the Evils which Men procure to one another, have never been able to prevail to utter Ruine and Destruction of Human Race: Which is a plain Evidence, that Good Actions have oftner attain'd their just End and Reward, than they have fail'd and been disappointed of it. On the other side, altho' a Person who neglects or disobeys the Law of Nature, may sometimes by an unaccountable Concourse of External Causes, receive a whole Flood of Goods and Benefits from other Men; yet because in this case those Effects are, with regard to him, merely contingent, and do very seldom fall out in such a manner, we may conclude, that Nature and Reason did not prescribe, much less command, the Means by which he attain'd, only casually, to such an End. Reason, on the contrary, most clearly shews us, that we take a much more probable way to Happiness by acting on a settled Design, and by applying the best Means we can to the gaining of our purpose, than if we should throw aside all Counsel and Forecast, and permit our selves to be driven at random by the blind Guidance of Chance. But this Point is indeed as clear as any thing in Nature, and hath been made out to full Advantage by Dr. Cumberland.

There remains therefore this only Question farther, whether or no besides the Natural Effects of Evil Actions, and besides those which arise from the Sanction of Civil Laws, there are still others in reserve appointed by God's free Pleasure, and to be inflicted by virtue of his Sovereign Prerogative; or whether God hath not added to the Sanction of the Laws of Nature some Arbitrary Punishment: Especially since it is apparent, that the Natural Consequences and Effects of Evil Actions are frequently interrupted, and that the Wickedness of many Men seems to turn to their Gain and Advantage. Now what the Scripture hath declar'd in this Matter, is plain and beyond all Dispute. But waving that Authority, the affirmative Side of the Question may be defended from several Considerations. As from that most ancient and most universal Tradition, concerning a certain Revenging Divinity (1), and the Pains after Death. Of which Opinion we have two fair Instances in the Cases of Jonas and of St. Paul; (Jonas chap. i. v. 7. Acts chap. 28. v. 1, &c.) for there being no

(a) See Prov. XI. 31. Vid. Isocrat. de Permutatione, p. 576. (1) Which was call'd Nemesis, and was thought to have the care of punishing the Crimes, which were unpunish'd upon Earth; either thro' Negligence, or thro' want of Power, of this there is a fine Description in *Ammien. natural Connexion and Consequence, either between Jonas's Crime and the Tempest, or between the Fact of Murther, and the biting of the Viper, the People who were present at both Accidents, immediately suppos'd that God Almighty did thus extraordinarily interpose his hand to punish some heinous Wickedness (a). Moreover, it being most certain that it is the Divine Pleasure those Laws should be obey'd, and not less manifest, that the natural Effects of them may be (partly at least) eluded; it is highly probable, that God will find some other way of punishing such Offenders: Especially since the Gnawings of Conscience, and the want of Quiet and Security, which constantly attend Evil Men, do not always rise to such an afflicting degree, as to seem a sufficient Plague and Penalty for their Crimes (b). But because whatever Arguments we can alledge à priori, will not amount to a Demonstration, but only to a high Probability; and because this Arbitrary Punishment presupposes some positive Determination of the Divine Will, which we can hardly come to a Knowledge of without a particular Revelation; and since our Induction and our Experience are at present imperfect, we can scarce avoid confessing, that to those who see only by the Light of Natural Reason (1), this Controversy must still appear in some measure, dark and obscure.

XXII. As to the matter of the Law of Nature, Grotius observes (c), that many things are refer'd to this Law not properly, but reductively, for as much as the Law doth not oppose or forbid them. As those things are term'd Just, not only which are in strict Justice due, but which Justice doth not contradict: (though it would be better to call such things permitted, than plainly just.) But perhaps this Distinction of Grotius might be more conveniently applied to those Constitutions which according to the particular State of Men, the Desire of Peace and Tranquillity hath at any time introduc'd: as likewise to the Actions undertaken in Conformity to such Constitutions. For we shall often hear the Lawyers debating such Cases as these, whether the Possession of things, whether Prescription, whether the making of Wills, and whether buying and selling, do belong to the Law of Nature, or not. Which doubts cannot easily be resolv'd, unless we distinguish between those things which the Law of Nature determines, by commanding or forbidding them: and those things which Men have been induc'd to ordain for the necessary Promotion of Society, the Liberty of doing which flows immediately from this Human Ordinance and

Institution: And then we say of these last things, that they belong to the Law of Nature by way of Reduction. Thus the Dominion or the Possession of things, doth not immediately spring from Nature, nor can we alledge any direct and express Precept for its Introduction: Yet it may be said in some measure to be enjoind by Natural Law, in as much as when Mankind began to multiply in the World, it was requisite to their peaceable Condition, that the Primitive Communion of Goods should be laid aside. Thus Prescription is not plainly commanded by the Law of Nature; yet upon Supposition of things being divided into distinct Proprieties, the Peace of Mankind seems to favour it; lest otherwise the Titles to things should remain always in doubt. Thus, lastly, Nature doth not positively enjoin us to make Wills, or to buy and sell; yet Proprieties being suppos'd as in the former case, it naturally follows, that a Person at his Death shall have the Power of disposing of his own Goods; and that Men by the Intervention of Bargains and Contracts shall be at Liberty to alienate such things as belong to themselves, for the Procurement of those which are in the Possession of others.

Grotius farther observes on this Subject (2), that sometimes by abuse, those things are refer'd to the Law of Nature, which Reason indeed shows us to be Honest, and better than their Opposites, though they are not properly matter of Debt and strict Obligation. Of which kind, are many high and uncommon Acts of Liberality, of Mercy and Clemency; as likewise whenever a Man recedes from any part of his Right, not being compell'd by Necessity. These Matters St. Paul illustrates in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, Chap. VI. v. 12. Chap. VII. v. 38. Chap. X. v. 23. (d).

Socrates (3), when a Rascally Fellow had offer'd him an Injury, would not complain of it to the Judge; but reckon'd it (as he said) no more than if an Ass had kick'd him. And Cato, as Seneca (e) tells us, when he receiv'd a Blow in the Face, was so far from resenting the Affront, and from desiring Satisfaction, that he would not venture so far as to forgive it, but denied that any such thing had been done. Thinking it better not to acknowledge the Fact than to prosecute it.

XXIII. There is still one Question behind which requires our Determination. Whether or no there be any such thing as a particular and positive Law of Nations, contradistinct to the Law of Nature. Learned Men are not come to any good Agreement in this Point. Many assert the Law of Nature and of Nations to be the very same thing, differing no otherwife than in external Denomination. Thus Hobbes (a) divides Natural Law, into the Natural Law of Men, and the Natural Law of States commonly call'd the Law of Nations. He observes, that the Precepts of both are the same: But that for as much as States when they are once instituted, assume the Personal Properties of Men, hence it comes to pass, that what, speaking of the Duty of particular Men, we call the Law of Nature, the same we term the Law of Nations, when we apply it to whole States, Nations, or People. This Opinion we for our part readily subscribe to: Nor do we conceive, that there is any other Voluntary or Positive Law of Nations, properly invested with a true and legal Force, and obliging as the Ordinance of a Superior Power (b). And thus we do not really differ in Judgment from those who are more inclin'd to call that the Law of Nature which consists in a Conformity to Rational Nature, and that the Law of Nations, which flows from the Consideration of Human Indigence, the Relief of which seems to be the main end and design of Society. For we as well as they, deny that there is any positive Law of Nations proceeding from a Superior. And whatever is deducible from Reflections on the Indigence of Human Nature, we refer immediately to Natural Law: only we were unwilling to define and explain this Natural Law by a Conformity to Rational Nature; because by this means we should establish Reason for the Rule and Measure of it self; and so this way of demonstrating Nature's Laws would run round in a Circle.

Most of those matters which by the Civilians and others are refer'd to the Law of Nations, as the ways of acquiring things, the Business of Contracts, &c. do indeed belong either to the Law of Nature or to the Civil Laws of those Countries where they are observ'd: Many People and States agreeing in such points, which otherwise do not depend on the Universal reason of Mankind. Now it is not proper or fair to constitute these as a peculiar and distinct Species of Law; in as much as the Reason why such Constitutions are common to many Nations doth not arise from any mutual Covenant or Obligation, but is wholly to be attributed to the particular Pleasure of the several Legislators, who by accident agreed in these Ordinances, without the least regard to one another. And therefore this kind of Customs and Decrees, may be and frequently are, alter'd by one People, or Kingdom, without advising with their Neighbours.

Nor is Feldenius's Distinction to be despis'd, who in his Observations on Grotius (c), tells us, that the Roman Lawyers by the Law of Nations, understood the Power and Liberty which Strangers and Foreigners were allow'd to transact Matters in the Roman State; and by the Civil Law, that which was proper to the Citizens only, all Foreigners being excluded from its Benefit. That on this account Wills and Marriages were said to be of the Civil Law, and Contracts or Bargains, of the Law of Nations, because the former were restrain'd to the Citizens, whereas Strangers were admitted to a Share and Right in the latter.

Many Authors do farther rank under the Title of the Law of Nations, several Customs mutually observ'd by tacite Consent, amongst most People pretending to Civility; especially in the Affairs and Transactions of War. For after that the most polish'd parts of the World came to esteem Martial Glory as the greatest of Human Honours, and to think that a Man had no such fair way of showing his Excellency beyond others, as by being able by his Boldness and his Sagacity to destroy many of his Fellows; upon which account there perpetually arose either unnecessary or unjust Contentions; For fear great Captains, if they us'd the full Liberty of a just War, should bring too much Envy on their Power, and expose themselves to general Hatred; many Nations found it convenient to temper the vigorous Fierceness of Hostile Proceedings, by a Shew of Clemency and of Magnanimity. Hence arose the Customs of exempting certain Things and Persons from Martial Violence; the particular manners of hurting Enemies to such degrees, of treating Captives, and the like. Machiavel in his Prince (d) relates one Practice of this Nature, which I question whether it were Worthy of the Name and the Profession of Soldiers. He says it was first introduc'd by Alberigo da Como of Romagna, and kept up in the Italian Wars of the last Age, chiefly by the Foreign and Mercenary Troops. The opposite Generals endeavour'd with all possible Industry, to rid themselves and their Soldiers of all Trouble and Fear. And their way was, by killing no one in Fight; only taking one another Prisoners, whom they afterwards dismiss'd without Ransom. When they were in Leaguer before a Town, they shot not rudely amongst them in the Night; nor did the Besieged disturb their Camp with the like Incivilities. They made no Intrenchments for their Security whilst encamped; and when Winter came on, never lay at all in the Field. And to behave themselves in this manner was part of their Discipline and Institution. An Agreement something like this Strabo (e) tells us of, between the Eretrians and the Chalcidians, forbidding the use of Missive Weapons against each other. To which we may add the Custom observ'd by the Ancient Indians, of letting the Husbandmen remain safe from all Injury and Molestation, even in Civil Wars (f).

But although these Customs seem to include some kind of Obligation arising from tacite

Consent; yet if one who is engag'd in a Lawful War, shall neglect them, and profess that he will not be bound by such Restraints; provided what is contrary to them may be rightly done according to the Law of Nature; he is guilty of no other Sin, but a sort of Unskillfulness, in not adjusting his Proceedings to the nice Models of those, who reckon War in the number of the Liberal Studies. As a Gladiator is accus'd of Inexpertness, when he wounds his Antagonist otherwise than by the Rules of Art. Whoever therefore wages War in a just Cause, may slight these Formalities at Pleasure, and govern himself purely by the Law of Nature: Unless he thinks it more for his Interest to observe them, as a means to render the Enemies less severe towards himself and his Men. On the other hand, he who prosecutes an unjust Quarrel, if he punctually fulfils these Niceties, is so far in the Right, as to appear wicked with some kind of Temper and Moderation. However these Reasons not being general, cannot constitute any Law of an universal Obligation. Especially since as to any Restraints which depend on tacite Agreement, it seems reasonable that either Party should have the Liberty of absolving themselves from them; by making exprefs Declaration that they will be holden by them no longer, and that they do not expect or require the Observance of them from others. Hence we find many such Practices to be worn out by Time, or overcome by the Prevalence of contrary Custom. Neither have those Men any good reason of Complaint, who censure this Doctrine as a Notion by which the Security, the Interest, and the Safety of Nations are robb'd of their surest Guards and Defence. For the Ensurance of these Advantages and Blessings doth not consist in the Practice of such mutual Favours, but in the due Observance of the Law of Nature; a much more sacred Support; and which whilst they enjoy, they have little need of inferior Methods of Protection. And sure it shows much more Excellency and Worth in any Custom, to derive it from the Law of Nature, than to establish it only on the Consent of different People.

Amongst the chief Heads of that Voluntary Law of Nations which Grotius maintains, he reckons the Law of Embassies. Now as to this point it is our Opinion, that the Persons of Embassadors are Sacred and Inviolable, even amongst Enemies by the meer Law of Nature; provided they do not come purely as Spies, nor enter any hostile Design against the Person to whom they are sent; although in the ordinary Course of Business, and of Treaties, they prefer their Master's Interest to all others. For in as much as such Persons are necessary for the procuring the preserving, or the strengthening of Peace by Leagues and Covenants; and since the Law of Nature enjoins us to embrace Peace by all honest ways; it must at the same time be suppos'd to have provided for the Security of those Men, without whose Intervention this Good End cannot be obtain'd (a). To this Right of personal Safety is join'd another of being exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Sovereign to whom they are sent; at least in all Matters relating to their Office. Since otherwise they would not have full Power and Liberty to promote their Master's Interest, with due Application and Vigour, were they oblig'd to give an account of their Management to any Authority, besides that which they represent. Other Privileges commonly attributed to Embassadors, especially to those who reside in Courts, not for the settling or the securing of Peace, but chiefly for the diving into the Secrets and Policies of a State, these depend absolutely on the Indulgence of the Prince who entertains them; and therefore, if he sees convenient, he may deprive them of these Favours without the Breach of any Law, provided he will suffer his own Ministers abroad to be treated in the same manner.

The Right of Burial, which according to Grotius seems likewise to make a particular Head of the Law of Nations, may be well refer'd to the common Duties of Kindness and Humanity (b). Nor are the other Instances which he offers, of Consequence enough to establish a new Species of Law, since they may with Convenience enough be allowed a Place in the System of the Law of Nature. As for those Persons who rank under the Law of Nations, the particular Compacts of two or more States, concluded by Leagues and Treaties of Peace, to us their Notion appears very incongruous. For altho' the Law of Nature in that part of it concerning the keeping of Faith, doth oblige us to stand to such Agreements; yet the Agreements themselves cannot be call'd Laws, in any Propriety of Speech or of Sense. Besides they are almost infinite in Number, and commonly are settled only for a Time. Nor do they any more constitute a part of Law in general, than the Covenants and Bargains of particular Subjects with each other, do belong to the Body of the Civil Law of the Kingdom: But they are rather to be esteem'd the Subject and the Concern of History (c).

XXIV. Of all the Divisions of Natural Law, that seems to us most accurate and most convenient, which considers in the first Place, a Man's Behaviour towards himself, and then towards other Men. Those Precepts of the Law of Nature which bear a regard to other Men, may be again divided into Absolute and Hypothetical or Conditional. The former are such as oblige all Men in all States and Conditions, independent from any human Settlement or Institution. The latter presuppose some Publick Forms and Civil Methods of Living to have been already constituted and receiv'd in the World. Which Distinction Grotius hath thus express'd in other Words; The Law of Nature is concern'd, not only about such things as exist antecedent to Human Will, but likewise about many things which follow upon some Acts of that Will. 'Whence altho' the Dominion or the 'Propriety of things as it now stands is establish'd by the Pleasure of Men, yet such a Settlement being once suppos'd, Natural Law informs us that 'tis a Sin to take the Goods of another Man, without the Owners Consent (a). That is, there are many things which as to the Exercise of the Act are Arbitrary, or where it is left to the free Pleasure of Men whether they will perform such an Act or no: But the Act being once perform'd, there follows upon it by virtue of some Precept of the Law of Nature, a Moral Necessity or Obligation; or else the Manner and Circumstances of the Act, are by the same Law adjusted and determin'd. Thus, for Example, altho' the Law of Nature doth not command me to buy of another, yet supposing me to buy at my own Pleasure, it commands me not to seek my own Gain to the Damage of the other Party, nor to cheat him in the Bargain. And many such Precepts of the Law of Nature there are, which cannot take place, or indeed be understood, unless upon Supposition of Distinct Proprieties of things, and of the Establishment of Civil Authority! Yet it cannot hence be prov'd that even all Positive Laws are part of the Law of Nature, because Nature obliges us to obey the Commands of the Supreme Magistrate, tho' our own Consent gave him his Sovereignty over us. Thus much indeed is certain, that the Violators of Civil Laws do, by breaking their intervening Covenant, mediately sin against the Law of Nature. And yet there still remains a prodigious difference between these Natural Laws which we call Hypothetical, and the Positive Laws of Civil Governments: in as much as the reason of the former is drawn from the Condition of Mankind consider'd in general; but the Reason of the latter is taken from the particular Interest of any Nation or State, or from the bare Pleasure of the Legislator. Therefore our Civil Positive Laws, are not so many Precepts of the Natural Hypothetical Law, but do only borrow their Force of obliging, in Human Regard, from the Virtue of some such Hypothetical Precept of Nature. Now of those Human Institutions which serve for Foundations of these Hypothetical Precepts, the three chief are Speech, the Dominion and the Price of things, and Human Sovereignty or Command. And by this Division we shall hereafter guide our Proceedings, when we arrive at that part of our Design.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Duties and Performances of Man towards himself; as well in regard to the Improvement of his Mind, as to the Care of his Body and of his Life.

ALTHO' this be a Quality common to Man, with other Animals, that he is concern'd for his own Preservation, and is naturally glad to be in as good a Condition as possible; yet that his Care of himself ought to be of a much more refin'd, and of a much nobler Strain, than what we can suppose in Brute Creatures, there is good reason to conclude: Not only because he hath receiv'd more Endowments than they, and such as are more capable of fruitful Culture and of useful Improvement; but farther, because he cannot perform the Duties to which he stands oblig'd, unless he brighten and quicken his Faculties by good Exercise, and make them more vigorous and more ready in the Production of worthy Actions. Besides, the Labour which a Man spends on his own Improvement, is not terminated in himself; but spreads abroad its Fruit to the Benefit of all Mankind; and the better any Person approves himself in the Management of his own Gifts and Abilities, he is justly esteem'd the more excellent Citizen of the World, and the more Generous Benefactor to his Fellows. Wherefore Man in his Endeavours to fulfil the Laws of Society, to which he is by his Creator directed and designed, hath good reason to imploy his first Pains and Study on himself; since he will be able to discharge his Duty towards others with so much more Ease and Success, the more diligent he hath been in advancing his own Perfection. Whereas he who is unuseful to himself and idle in his proper Concerns, can give other Men but little reason to expect advantage from his Pains.

There is scarce more necessity for our engaging in this Care, than there is Sollicitude and Difficulty in the Prosecution of it. For in the first place, Men are born in an entire Ignorance of things, and their Minds whilst yet tender may be easily so far defiled and tainted with vile Opinions, that it will afterwards be no easy Labour to wash off the Stains. Besides we bring hereditary and inbred Corruptions with with us into the World, which draw us all, more or less, out of the strait Path of Reason; and unless we bridle and restrain them, pour out a Flood of foul and unworthy Actions, thro' the Course of our whole Lives. And it may perhaps quicken our Industry to consider, that we have but one Time allow'd us to act our Part in, and cannot hope for a second Entrance on the Stage to amend the Faults of our first Performance. For that old Complaint in Euripides (a) will ever be as vain and ineffectual as when it was first made: — *Οι μοι τι δὴ βεγγίον ἐκ τόνου τίθε, &c.

Me miserable! that Men should be deny'd
The Gift of springing to a second Youth,
A Double Age! The Structures which we raise
If found defective, later Cares reform,
New modell'd: But our own unhappy Frame
Stands without Change, and falls without Repair!

O! might we turn our Steps, and tread again
The Path of Life; what Slips we once had made
We would correct, and every cheating Maze
Avoid, where Folly lost our Way before!

Now since Man consists of two Parts, a Soul and a Body, whereof the former is the great Principle and Spring of Human Actions, the latter supplying the Place of a subordinate Instrument, the Care and Improvement of the first and Noblest Part, may justly challenge the Precedence in our Endeavours.

II. The Culture of the Mind which all Men are oblig'd to undertake, and which is absolutely necessary for the Performance of Human Duty, consists chiefly in these Particulars; that we obtain true Opinions concerning all such things as our Duty bears any reference to, that we set a right Judgment and Price on those Objects which commonly excite our Appetites, and that we temper and regulate our Passions by the Direction of Sound Reason.

III. Amongst the Opinions then which it highly concerns all Men to settle and to embrace, the Chief are those which relate to ALMIGHTY GOD, as the Great Creator and Governour of the Universe. That there is really existing a Supreme Being, from whom all other things derive their Original, and the Principle of their Motion; not as from a dull and senseless Power (as the Weight, for Example, in a Clock), but as from a Cause endu'd with Understanding and with Freedom of Choice. That this Eternal Being exercises a Sovereignty not only over the whole World, or over Mankind in General, but over every Individual Human Person: Whose Knowledge nothing can escape: Who by Virtue of his Imperial Right, hath enjoin'd Men such certain Duties by Natural Law, the Observance of which will meet with his Approbation, the Breach or the Neglect with his Displeasure: And that he will for this purpose, require an exact Account from every Man, of his Proceedings, without Corruption and without Partiality.

Now as the main Parts of Human Duty turn on this Belief, so is it the only Foundation of that sweet Tranquillity and Acquiescence of Mind, which Men inwardly enjoy, and the very Fence and Bulwark of all that Probity which we are to exercise towards our Neighbours; without which no Man can seriously and heartily do a good Action himself, or give sufficient Caution and Security of his Honest Intentions to others (b). And altho' it appears from the Ordinances of the Christian Religion, that GOD is not so far pleas'd with every kind of Worship which Men pay him, as to embrace them with peculiar Favour, and to give them a Title to Eternal Life, which Good Effects do follow only that Institution and Way of Service which he hath reveal'd in a singular manner to the World: Yet a serious Perswasion concerning the Divine Existence and Providence, under whatever particular Apprehensions, or particular Worship, hath however thus much of Force and Efficacy, as to render Men more observant of their Duty (c). To prove this Assertion we need only consider, that there have been of old, and still are Men professing Religions which we must own to be destructive to Salvation, as suppose Mahometans, or Pagans; who nevertheless by Virtue of their Perswasion of GOD's Providence, have shown no inconsiderable Concern and Care for Honesty and Justice; so as not to be outdone by many Christians, at least as to External Performances. Nay there are not wanting Persons, who from the Experience of long Travels pretend to affirm, that Christianity hath not been able to alter the Common Dispositions of some Nations towards particular Vices; and that 'tis not easy to discover the Truth of that Holy Religion, from the Manners and the Practices of those who profess it. Tho' I should imagine the Reason of that Unhappiness to be chiefly this, because the Christian Doctrine and Worship, being receiv'd by most Men, not upon their own

(a) In Supplicibus. (b) Boetius de Consolat. Your living under the Eyes of an All-seeing Judge, lays a kind of a necessity upon you to be Good and Virtuous. Grotius in lib. Sapientia. Cap. 12. v. 1. How high soever some People talk about Honesty's being desirable merely on its own account; yet so great is the force of these outward visible Things upon our Mind, that without a full Perswasion of the Divine Providence and Retribution, and without some System of Laws to guide Men in the true way of acting, it is impossible but that they should wander into most grievous and fatal Dangers. For, as Human Reason is loose and giddy, when the Passions have overcome the Judgment, and the Manners are suited to the Passions, it easily finds out a Colour and Disguise for Sin, and so long obstinately refuseth to hear till it grows quite deaf. Therefore the Wise Man pronounceth those to be miserably Vain, who are so far from having a careful regard to the Knowledge of GOD and of his Providence, as to let those great Points depend on every Man's Fancy and Choice: Than which nothing can be contriv'd more destructive, I do not say to Good Manners, but to Government and Society. (c) Lucian. de Imaginib. Those who are most strict and conscientious in their Duty to GOD, are the most Honest and Regular in their Dealings with Men.

Choice and Judgment, but from the Custom of the State in which they happen to be born, resides rather in their Mouth than in their Heart; whence it comes to pass, that so few are seriously inclin'd to reform their Mind by its Directions. For I doubt not, but that at least the External Acts even of National Vices might be repress'd, would Men but apply themselves in earnest to the leading a Life suitable to their Profession.

IV. As this Perswasion, and whatever else we are able to learn concerning the Worship of GOD, either from Reason or from Revelation, is first of all to be implanted in a rightly Cultivated Mind: So are the Opinions contrary to these Truths most carefully to be barr'd off and excluded. And here we would not only be understood of Atheistical and Epicurean Principles, but of those numerous Notions, which appear to be destructive of true Religion, of Good Manners and of Human Society, which it is in an high manner the Interest of Mankind, to see absolutely rooted up, and banish'd out of the World. Such is that Fancy of the Stoical Fate, or the unchangeable Course and Wheel of things and Actions; by which Men are made only the Tools or Engines of their own Operations, it not being in their Power to manage them with any Freedom of Choice, or with any Direction of Counsel. For admitting this Hypothesis, it doth not appear, why the Actions of a Man should be morally imputed to him, rather than the Motion of a Clock to the Wheels by which it is perform'd, or what would be the use of Religion, what the Equity of Laws and of Punishments (a). There is an Opinion nearly allied to this which supposes, the Consequences of Causes and of Effects, or the Great Chain of things establish'd by the Creator, to stand by such an Immoveable Decree, that GOD hath left himself no liberty of interposing in particular Cases. Thus all Miracles, all extraordinary Assistances of Heaven, all Effects of Prayers, of Repentance and of Amendment, seem to be entirely cut off at one Stroke. To these we may join that Ancient and widely receiv'd Perswasion, that the Positions of the Stars, laid an indispensable necessity on Human Actions and Events; or that the Hour of Nativity determin'd the whole Proceedings of Life. Which Manilius, one of the Assertors of it, thus delivers,

Mr. Creech.

And this Superstition still bewitcheth a great part of the Eastern World, where no Business of Moment is undertaken, without consulting the Astrologers, that they may read, as the Phrase is, what is written in Heaven. To which purpose, Father Bernier tells a pleasant Story of a Gardener of Abas King of Persia, who rooting up some Trees which the King by Direction of his Astrologer, had planted in a fortunate hour, and being thereupon rebuked, turning to the Astrologer, Sure (says he) you was out in your Calculation: For those Trees could never have the Benefit of lucky Stars, which were set at Noon, and unfortunately pull'd up at Night. Another Relation like this he gives us of a certain Slave, a Run-away from Goa, who set up in the City Dehli for an Expounder of the Stars, and foretold many strange Events with good Confidence to the People: Every now and then looking upon his Mariner's Compass and his Hour-book, as the Noble Instrument of his Art. When some who had formerly a Knowledge of him, declar'd their Wonder, at his new Profession and Equipment, his Reply was, A tal Bestias, tal Astrologuo. For such Beasts, such an Astrologer. But all this kind of Astrology is really nothing else, but a specious way of cheating Ignorant People of their Money, undertaken by some Confident Knaves, who in their talk of future Occurrences are not so much supported by their own Arts, as by the Cre-

Zeno (in Diog. Laert. 1.7.) retorted this Objection very pleasantly, though he did not refute it: As he was correcting his Slave who had been catch'd in a piece of Thievery, the Fellow in way of Excuse told him, truly 'twas his Fate to steal; yet, says Zeno, 'twas your Fate too to be beat for it. Marcus Antoninus gives a more serious Judgment on the Point, The GODS (says he, l. 2. c. 11.) have put it in every Man's Power and Choice, to avoid whatever is truly Evil.

dulity of their Hearers: If things fall out as they boldly guess'd, they presently rise in Honour and Credit with the Multitude; if Matters go otherwise, their Predictions are easily forgot, and so their Mistakes make no noise (a). Now besides the other numerous ill Consequences of such a Superstition, this Mischief follows of Course, that whilst Men are continually gaping at the Stars, they have neither Leisure nor Inclination to guide their Lives by the Rules of sound Reason (b).

Most pernicious likewise is that Conceit, which makes GOD to allow a kind of Market of Sins, so as to let them be bought off with Money or other Presents, or perhaps with some vain Ceremonies and set Forms of Speech, without Amendment of Life. No less absurd is it to imagine, that GOD Almighty is delighted with such Inventions of Men, such Institutions and Ways of Living, as are disagreeable to Human and Civil Society, as it is temper'd by the Dictates of Reason and the Laws of Nature. Such may we reckon the greatest part of the Monastical Orders, which we find in vast Numbers, not only in Christendom, but amongst the Turks and the Heathens. We should also carefully avoid all such unworthy and superstitious Notions, as debase and dishonour the Divine Nature or Worship. Every sensible Man ought to be as Antoninus says, θεοσεβής χωρίς δεσποδαιμονίας (c) Devout without Superstition (1).

'Tis another wicked Opinion, that the bare Exercise of Piety towards God, is sufficient, without any regard had to Honesty and to those other Duties which are to be practis'd towards our Neighbours: As if the External of Divine Worship, when exactly perform'd, were able to make amends for a Course of Injustice towards other Men: Or as if it were lawful to scrape up Money in our Life-time by all Means and Methods, good or bad, provided at our Death, we leave somewhat to be spent in Pious Uses (d). Nor less unreasonable is the Fancy, that a single Man should be able not only to fulfil his own Duty towards GOD, but to transfer some of his Merits on others, as if one Person's Negligence in his Duty was to be supplied, by the over Righteousness of another. Of the same Stamp is that vain Conjecture, that upon account of the Satisfaction and the Merit of Christ, we have a less Obligation lying on us to Probity and Sanctity of Manners; and that the Hope of those Blessings furnishes us with a Security of sinning. He who believes that his own Offences shall be forgiven him for the sake of Another's Deserts, can scarce be hinder'd from sinking into the basest Dissoluteness, unless he be at the same time fully perswaded, that there is still an Obligation incumbent on him, to apply all his Endeavours to the Practice of a most Holy Life.

Farther, it is no less pestilent than brutal an Opinion, to pretend that the Wickedness of some Actions is excus'd with GOD upon account of their Dexterity or Humour; and that some Sins pass only for Jest in the Cognisance of Heaven. As the old Poets feign'd their Deities to take no notice of the Perjury of Lovers, and to forgive their Thefts and treacherous Intrigues (e). Nay their Madness proceeded so far, that they were not afraid to introduce their Heavenly Powers as the Actors of detestable Villanies; assigning so many Tutelar Gods to have the Care (as it were) and the Guidance of so many particular kinds of Wickedness. Now the Argument which Fulgentius (f) draws hence is right and conclusive: If there were any Deities (lays he, meaning Mercury and Laverna) presiding over Robberies, how could those Actions be criminal before Human Judges, which had Divine Authors and Patrons to defend them (g)? Euripides disputes as well on the same point.

Should

Should Men be blam'd who act what they're taught,
Or those Immortal Guides who teach 'em wrong?

Nor was the poor Indian much out in his Inference, who when a Spaniard boasted to him, that he was a Christian, a Son of the Great Creator of Heaven and Earth, whose Laws he came there to publish and proclaim, answer'd him to this Effect: If 'tis by Command of your God, that you thus invade other Men's Dominions, and there spoil, burn, kill, and commit all other Wickedness at pleasure; you may rest assur'd, that we will not on any account believe in such a God, or receive his Ordinances amongst us (a).

It is wicked likewise to believe, that those Prayers can please G O D, by which a Man desires that others may suffer an undeserved Evil, for the promoting or the occasioning of an Advantage to himself. As suppose if the Inhabitants of a Sea-Coast should pray, that many Shipwracks might happen on their Shore. Nor do I take those solemn Supplications to contain much more Holiness which are perform'd, either upon the engaging in an unjust War, or upon any Success obtain'd in it. Those Persons too must needs lie under a great Mistake, who fancy the Breach of some Precept of Natural Law to be a part of Divine Worship. As they who are for treating in a hostile manner, all such as differ from them in Perswasion; who assert that Religion is to be propagated by the Sword; that no Faith is to be kept with Men of a contrary Profession, no Political Friendship (as they call it) and no Offices of Humanity to be exercis'd towards them, but that they are to be avoided even in common Conversation as Unholy and Unclean; that Violence, Wickedness, Treason, Perfidiousness, Sedition and Rebellion, are not only lawful but commendable, if undertaken on a Religious Account. To conclude, the following Opinions are not of less fatal effect than those which we have already mention'd: That it imports nothing to solid Felicity, whether a Man apply himself to a Virtuous or to a Vicious Life, and that Good Men are entituled to no better State or Condition than the Wicked (b). That the highest Pleasure a Man can expect or obtain, is the present Gratification of his Senses; and that the Soul perishes with the Body. Lastly, that all Law, even that which we call Natural, is a meer Human Device, not referable to G O D as the Author of it, nor deriving from him its Force and Sanctity. These therefore, and such like Notions, are entirely to be rooted up out of Human Minds, in as much as they destroy our Duty to Almighty G O D, and prevent or intercept all Endeavours of conforming our Life and Manners to the Guidance of Good Reason.

V. When this Principal Care is over, the main Concern behind is for a Man accurately to examine his own Nature; and to study to know himself. An Enquiry which Antiquity so much valued as the Forerunner of true Wisdom, that Γνώσις σαυτοῦ was thought an Inscription worthy to be set in Letters of Gold, and Consecrated in the Delphian Temple. On which Tully hath given us this Comment. The Precept of Apollo, says he, in which he enjoins us to know our selves, doth not mean that we should be careful, in knowing our Limbs, our Stature, or our Figure; for our Bodies indeed are not our selves. But when the Oracle says, Know your Self, it says in effect, Know your own Mind and Soul. For the Body is no more than the Soul's Vessel or Receptacle. And no Action is properly done by your self, but what proceeds from your better and Nobler Part (c). Now from this Knowledge of himself rightly pursu'd, a Man is brought to understand his Condition; and the Office he is to bear in the World: Whilst he apprehends, that he did not exist of himself, but ow'd his Original and Being to a much Sublimer Principle; that he is endow'd with far more noble Faculties, than he sees enjoy'd by the Beasts about him; lastly, that he was not born by himself, nor purely for his own Service, but that he is a part of Human Kind, and is oblig'd to behave himself sociably towards other Men. And from these Fountains may easily be drawn the Compleat Knowledge of Human Duty (d). It belongs likewise to our Understanding our selves, to know our own Power and how far it extends, either in exerting our Actions or in forming our Designs (e): (1). And farther, what is the true Effect and Consequence of every Practice; and what respect and use the things without us, have to our selves and to our Happiness.

VI. From this Knowledge it follows, that a Man must apprehend his Subjection to Almighty God, and the Obligation which lies upon him, according to the Measure of the Gifts he hath receiv'd, both to celebrate the Divine Majesty, and to show himself a sociable Creature in his Transactions with his Fellows. And in as much as God hath bestow'd on him the Light of Understanding, he ought certainly to conclude, that he is not to do every thing at random, and without end or design, but that whatever he undertakes, he should first weigh the matter in hand, and regulate his Method of proceeding about it (1). And consequently, that he propose an End agreeable to his Nature, and rightly moderate and direct both his own Actions and all other due Means towards the Attainment of that End. And this in such a manner, that he neither proceed in the Application of the Means, before the End is fixt and determin'd; nor settle such an End as he must afterwards want Means to arrive at. Another Inference closely allied to this, is, that since Truth and Right are always Uniform and without Alteration, so he ought always to form the same Judgments of the same things, and when he hath once judg'd truly, to be always constant in his Mind and Resolution. Farther, that his Will and his Appetite do not get the start of Good Judgment, but follow and obey it; never making Resistance to its Decrees (2). For he who observes this Course of proceeding will be sure to act with Prudence, with Constancy and with Moderation. He will make it his chief Aim and Rule, as Lucan describes Cato,

Naturamq; sequi, patriæq; impendere vitam.
Nec sibi sed toti genitum se credere mundo.*

To keep a Mean, to eye the chief Design;
To follow Nature, as a Guide Divine,
To pay his Country's Ransom with his Blood,
And private Pleasure quit for publick Good:
To raise his Soul to Universal Cares,
And in his Pains give all the World their Shares.

He that acts otherwise, instead of keeping a decent Pace in the Journey of Life, seems to rowl and tumble through the World: His Proceedings are perpetual Contradictions; and 'tis impossible for him to arrive at any Comfortable Condition: Since, as Sophocles observes,

True Wisdom is the Spring of Happiness.

VII. If a Man thus rightly apprehend and consider his own Strength and Power, he will discover that it is of a finite Nature, having certain Limits beyond which it can never extend it self; and therefore, that there are many things in the World which he cannot manage or compass, as many that he cannot hinder or resist. Other matters there are which do not absolutely exceed human Power, but which may be intercepted and prevented by the Opposition of other Causes. And a third kind of things we cannot compass by our bare Strength, nor assisted by Dexterity and Address. Applicable to these Reflections is the famous old Distinction of the Stoicks, dividing things into τὰ ἐφ' ἡμῶν & τὰ ἔκ ἐφ' ἡμῶν, those in our Power, and those without or beyond it. What seems to be most under our Command is our own Will, and the Power of that Faculty in exerting Actions proper to our Species of Being. For altho' the Will hath some cross and stubborn Principles adherent to it, which bend and ply it continually from its due Equilibrium; yet hath a Man nothing in his whole Nature, more nearly and closely tied to him, nothing which is less capable of being hindred by external Powers, and therefore nothing the Motions of which do more properly belong to his Person, and may accordingly be Imputed. Hence it follows, that every Man ought to make it his main Care and Concern, rightly to employ his Force and Abilities, in Conformity to the Rules of Reason: At least to settle a constant Resolution of discharging, as far as in him lies, every thing which seems agreeable to his Duty, and to the Design of his Being. For this is the Test by which we are to rate the Worth of every Person, and to measure his intrinsecal Goodness and Excellency (3) (a).

VIII. As to other matters which lie without us, we are so far to employ our selves about them as they do not surpass our Strength, as they tend to a lawful End, and are worth the Labour which we spend in the pursuit. For things above us, a Wise Man will not lose his Hopes and his Pains upon them; he will reckon it Folly to endeavour with vast Toil the Attainment of such an End, which he knows his own Force together with the Assistances he expects, unable to compass: Or unless he be at least certain that the very Probability of obtaining the End is of more Consequence than any other Effect, which he could without question have produc'd at the same time, and with the same Labour. Other things he will leave to the Direction of Providence, and will compose his Mind as well as he is able, for a peaceful Acquiescence in every Event. He will not vainly disquiet himself on the account of Evils which either have already happen'd, or may hereafter fall out without his Fault: And so he will cut off the greatest part of Human Troubles which are wont to be produc'd, either by vain Hope driving us on ill Designs, or by the more violent Motions of Grief, Anger, or Fear (b).

From these Considerations this farther Consequence may be drawn, that Man as he is guided only by the Light of Reason, ought not to frame to himself, or to aspire after any other Happiness in this World, than such as Epiet. l. 2. c. 7.* What can be better for us than that which hath the Approbation and the Appointment of God Himself. Liban. Declam. 21. A good and diligent Man proceeds according to his Judgment, and to the Notions which he hath form'd of things: And although the Event doth not answer the Worthiness of his Design, he is no less Industrious for the future.

arises from the prudent Government of his Faculties, and from those Assurances and Supports, which we are sure the Divine Providence will afford us; in the Universal Administration of Things. From the same Principles we may infer, that as we are not to leave things to meer Hazard and Chance, whilst there is any room for Human Caution and Foresight; so when we have done all that lies in our power, we cannot ensure an Event which doth not depend on our Direction, and of which we have no certain Knowledge till it actually happen. As Iphicrates us'd to say 'twas unworthy of a General to say, I did not think it; so 'tis below a Wise Man to make the like sorry Reflection. It was a Good Wish of the Poet:

————— Never may Successes blest
The Man, who measures Actions by Success.

Yet this absurd Opinion is so strong and so universal among the Mahometans, that they take Good Success to be an Infallible Argument of the Justice of a Cause, and an open Sign of the Approbation of Heaven. Whereas such a Notion is indeed to be rank'd amongst the ridiculous Follies of the lowest and most Ignorant Vulgar. For 'tis evident to any Person of Common Sense, that as Juvenal says,

————— Multi
Committunt eadem diverso crimina fato;
Ille crucem sceleris pretium tulit, hic diadema.

That Sins alike unlike Rewards have found,
And whilst this Villain's Hang'd, the other's Crown'd.

Hence likewise we learn, that as it is the part of a Wise Man, not to bound his Sight at the things before him, but to extend his Consideration and his View to things to come, and to drive on his well-form'd Resolution with his whole Strength, without suffering either the Threats of Fear, or the Flatteries of Pleasure to turn him aside: So is it as sure a Mark of a Fool to strive directly against the Stream, and not rather to accommodate his Inclinations to the Events, when they will not conform themselves to his Inclinations (a). Lastly, since Human Foresight is so weak in discovering Future things, and since they are very far from being under our Guidance, tho' they frequently fall out well beyond our Hopes and Expectations; hence it is plain, that we ought neither too securely to trust our present Condition, nor to spend too much Care and Anxiety on what is to come. And for the same Reason, Insolence in Prosperity, and Despair in Adversity, are to be both avoided as equally dangerous and equally absurd (b).

IX. Another necessary part of Human Improvement, is to be able to set a just Price on those things which are the chief in moving our Appetites. Because from the exact Worth and Value of them we are to judge how far we may justly labour to be concern'd about them. Amongst these, that which appears with most Figure and Splendor, and which is most capable of soliciting Elevated and Noble Souls, is the Opinion of Worth and Excellency, the Foundation of Glory and of Praise. Now as to this Concern, we are in such a manner to form and dispose our Mind, as to endeavour as far as possible the procuring and the preserving that kind of Esteem which is simply so call'd, being the bare good Opinion of good Men: In as much as this regularly flows from the Observance of the Law of Nature, and of our Duty; and because the want of it may lay ay open an occasion to a Thousand Mischiefs and Inconveniences (1). And if this good Reputation be assaulted by the Lies and Calumnies of Wicked Men, we are to spare no Labour in restoring it to its primitive Purity. But when it is not in our power to overcome Slander, or to stifle the false Conceptions that the World may entertain about us, we are to comfort our Selves with the Testimony of a good Conscience, and with the Assurance that our Integrity is still known to God (a).

As for that Esteem, which we usually term Intensive, as Honour and Glory, we are so far to pursue it, as it redounds from worthy Actions, agreeable to Reason, and promoting the Good of Human Society; and as far as it opens a wider Field for such Generous Undertakings. But how large a Share soever we obtain of these Favours, and even by Honest Means, good heed is to be taken that our Mind doth not swell with Arrogance and Vain-glory (b). Much more foolish and ridiculous is it to boast of, and to value our selves upon, what is empty and vain, and gives no solid Proof of our Worth. Therefore Demonastes in Lucian, when he saw a Fellow priding himself in the Wideness of his Purple, Hark you, Friend (says he) a Sheep us'd to carry this fine Burthen before you, and yet was still but a Sheep. But when we want Occasions and Opportunities of showing our Worth, and are not able to procure them; we must bear this ill Fortune with Patience, since there is nothing in it that can be charg'd upon our Default (c). On the other hand, it appears to be at the same time Wicked and Foolish, to affect and usurp the external Ensigns of Honour, when the inward Foundations of it are wanting: As it is detestable Madness, to aspire to Fame and to Honours by Evil Arts, and by Deeds repugnant to Reason; and to desire the shining above others, only to be able to insult over them, and to make them obnoxious to our Pleasure. Lastly, since we are not always allow'd the Liberty of building our Fortune as we please, since it must sometimes depend on external Causes; our Mind is to be put into such a temper, as when we have once done our best, to rest satisfied with the Lot that falls to our Share; and to look on those things which we are not able to compass and to obtain, as Matters which do not concern us, and which therefore are not worthy our Grief or our Anger (a).

X. For the better maintaining and preserving himself in the World, a Man hath likewise need of external Goods and Possessions; as it is frequently a part of our Duty to provide them for others. Concerning which it is the Command of Reason and Nature, that we endeavour the Procurement of them, so far as is consistent with our Strength, our Opportunities, and our Honesty. The Ant which Virgil (1) makes so prudent a Provider for Old Age, is even in the Divine Writings propos'd amongst the Examples of Harmless Industry (b). But because our Wants are not infinite, but lie in a very little Compass, therefore we must moderate our Desire and our Pursuit of these things, according to the just Occasions of Nature, and the Measure of Sobriety. Socrates in Diogenes Laertius, when he us'd to see the prodigious Quantity of Goods expos'd to Sale in the publick places, would cry out, ἄριστον ἐστὶν ἄρῃαν εἶναι ἔχειν; What a number of things are there here which I do not want (c)? Mr. Creech.

Life runs the best on little: Nature's Store
Can make all Happy that will use their Power.

Thus Paraphras'd by Mr. Cowley.

A Field of Corn, a Fountain, and a Wood,
Is all the Wealth by Nature understood.
The Monarch on whom fertile Nile bestows
All which that Grateful Earth can bear,
Deceives himself if he suppose,
That more than this falls to his Share.
Whatever an Estate doth beyond this afford,
Is not a Rent paid to the Lord;
But is a Tax Illegal and Unjust
Exacted from it by the Tyrant Lust.
Much will always wanting be
To him who much desires. Thrice happy he
To whom the wise Indulgency of Heaven
With sparing Hand but just enough has given.

Idem

Reins to our desire of getting; much less must we invade the Wealth of others by Injuries and Evil Designs (a). And those things which we have fairly made our selves Masters of, we are to account no otherwise, than as Helps to our Necessities, and Instruments to make us deserve well of Mankind. But the Mind must by no means fix and enslave it self, to possess and to preserve them merely for their own Sake: or to be perpetually employ'd in the endless Labour of increasing them. 'Tis downright Phrensy, as Juvenal says,

Ut locuples moriatis, egenti vivere fato.

Living, to suffer a low starving Fate,
In hopes of dying in a Wealthy State.

On the other side, 'tis a very good part of the Character which Statius gives of a wise Man,

Droitias, avidiq; animum dispendia torquent*

Temperies.*

In stifling Chests your Wealth is not confin'd,
Nor, lent on Greedy Use, torments your Mind;
But nobly spreads, on decent Ends employ'd,
By Moderation, and with Art enjoy'd (b).

We are farther to consider, that Nature is not wanting in a plentiful Provision for the Necessities of her Sons (c). That the Riches which we hoard up for future Use, are expos'd in the mean time to a thousand Dangers, and sometimes give us more Trouble in keeping them, than they gave us Labour in getting them (d). Lastly, that whatever we leave heap'd together, at our Death, must fall to an Heir, who may not only be unworthy of the Gift, but may despise and deride the Giver (e). As therefore an Honest Occasion of acquiring Riches is not to be neglected; so the Mind ought to be put into so even a Temper, as not to lose it self, if it should happen to lose them. Horace hath taught us the best way of dealing with Fortune:

Reges, & regum vita præcurrere amicos.*

Idem l. 1. Ep. 12.

Kings, and their more Luxurious Favourites.

He's never Poor that holds enough for Use.

Stop then your swelling Riches as they grow;
And let base Want, with its Retinue, show
At greater distance a less dreadful Foe.
Cease your vain Care, let all your Labours cease,
When your large Wish is crown'd with full Success.

*Eumen. which a Great and Noble Wit hath thus most happily paraphras'd :

(her ;
Let her love whom she please, I scorn to woo
Whilst she stays with me, I'll be Civil to her ;
But if she offers once to move her Wings,
I'll fling her back all her vain Gew-gaw things,
And arm'd with Virtue will more Glorious stand,
Than if the Bitch still bow'd at my Command.
I'll marry Honesty, though ne'er so poor,
Rather than follow such a dull blind Whore (a).

As to Expences, we are to use such a Moderation about them, as most willingly to undertake such as our Duty requires of us, and yet not to squander our Fortune at a venture, without Necessity and without Reason (b). For 'tis equally foolish and absurd, not to apply our Riches to the Ends for which they are given us, and vainly to throw them away on inferior Uses and Designs. The former Vice including numerous Breaches of our Duty; the latter leading the direct way, to Debt, Poverty, Rapine, Deceit, and a Thousand other Enormities and Mischiefs (c).

XI. In Reference to Pleasure and Pain, 'tis not only the Permission but the Advice of Reason, that we avoid as much as possible all unnecessary Trouble and Disquiet; and not only endeavour to keep our selves free from Grief and Disgust, but likewise to entertain our Senses with such Objects as are agreeable and delightful to them (d) (1). But to a singular and exquisite Gratification of Sense, the Mind is by no means to be accustomed; in as much as this kind of Epicurism either weakens and enervates a Man, equally oppressing the Vigour of Body and of Soul, and rendring them both unfit for any serious Business; or steals our Time from better and more necessary Employments; or wasts and consumes our Wealth and our Conveniences of Life; or often, being join'd with some Criminal Practice, draws after it no other Train, than Trouble, Danger, Damage and Disgrace. As therefore 'tis next degree to Madness, to invite Uneasiness and Torment without Use or Occasion: So is it very Rational to allow our selves a moderate Taste of Lawful and Innocent Pleasures, without suffering them to overwhelm and to drown us. But this is to be fix'd as an inviolable Rule, that no Pleasure must be purchas'd at so dear a rate, as the Neglect or the Transgression of our Duty.

XII. The last Care which lies on us in the improving and well-ordering of our Mind, is with our utmost Diligence to maintain its Sovereignty over its own Motions and Affections; the greatest part of which do not only impair the Health of the Body and the Vigour of the Soul, but cast such a Cloud on the Judgment and Understanding, as to wrest them violently from the ways of Reason and of Duty. So that a Coldness of the Passions is, as it were, the Natural Principle of Prudence and Probity amongst Men (e) (2). It may not be amiss to run with some light Remarks thro' the Particulars. Joy is in it self a Passion most agreeable to Nature. But strict Care is to be taken, that it do not break out on improper Occasions, as upon the Misfortunes of other Men: And likewise, that it do not drive us on any thing that is vain and trifling, or base and indecent. Sorrow is a Canker that wastes alike the Body and the Mind. This therefore is, as much as possible, to be remov'd and expell'd (3); unless so far as the Offices of Humanity oblige us to express our Concern and Pity at the Misfortunes, or at the Deaths of others; and as it is requisite to the Great Business of Repentance. Love is a Friendly Motion to Mankind; yet this is so wisely to be manag'd and moderated by Reason, that it does not throw it self away on an Ill Object; that it does not procure base and unworthy Fuel to its Flame; that it does not hinder the Exercise of other Duties, nor degenerate into Disquiet and Disease: That if it settle on a thing subject to Loss, or to Corruption, it stick not so closely to it, as upon the failure of it, to make the Soul unable to recollect and to recover its Force (f). Hatred is pernicious as well to the Person who employs it, as to him against whom it is employ'd. This therefore is to be diligently quench'd and stifled, least it betray us to Injuries and Breach of Duty against our Neighbours. And if some Persons do really deserve our Aversion, yet 'twould be still Folly to create, on their account, Uneasiness and Disquiet to our selves. Envy is a most deform'd Monster, sometimes producing ill Effects in others, but always in the Envious Person; who like Iron, o'er-run with Rust, not only defiles, but destroys himself continually (a). Hope, altho' a Passion more easie and mild than others, yet it is to be guided with such a Temper, that it do not make the Heart sick; nor, by aiming at things either vain and uncertain, or beyond its Strength and Reach, tire it self to no purpose, and become as Aristotle terms it, ἐξηραεῖς ἰδὼν τι, a Waking Dream: And that we do not fall under Lucretius's Censure and Character;

— Dum abest quod avemus, id exsuperare videtur Cetera; post aliud, cum contigit, illud, avemus; Et sitis aqua tenet vitai semper hianteis, &c.

— Absent Pleasures seem the best; With wing'd Desire and Hast we those pursue, But those enjoy'd, we straightway call for new. Life, Life we wish still eager to live on, &c.

Mr. Creech.

Fear, as it is a dangerous Enemy to Human Minds, so is it a Motion altogether useles, and unserviceable. For that Good Caution which some make to be the Product of it, may arise without its Assistance from a wary Circumspection, and from a Prudence alike untouch'd with Anxiety, or with Consternation. Anger is a most Destructive as well as a most Violent Passion; which is to be resisted with our utmost Strength and Endeavour. And whereas some alledge in its Favour, that it excites our Valour, and confirms our Constancy in Dangers; its Effect is indeed directly contrary, for it binds a Man's Spirit and Courage, and drives him headlong to his Ruine (b). Nearly related to Anger is the Desire of Revenge, which when it exceeds a moderate Defence of our selves and of our Dependants or Concerns, and a just Assertion of our Rights against the Invaders of them, turns, beyond Dispute, into a Vice (c).

XIII. In such Duties then, as we have already reckon'd up, doth that Culture of the Mind chiefly consist, which all are oblig'd to undertake, and in the implanting and enforcing which, those Persons ought to employ especial Care and Concern, who have the Information and Institution of others committed to their Charge. For the want of this Improvement, or the Disposition directly contrary to it, are both repugnant to Human Duty, and lay such a Rub in our way as it is not easy to get over. And therefore whoever is found destitute of such a necessary Perfection, justly falls under common Censure and Reproach.

There is still behind a more peculiar Culture of the Mind, consisting in the various Knowledge of things, and of Arts and Disciplines. This cannot be absolutely necessary to the Discharge of our Duty in General: And therefore every one is to moderate his Pursuit of them, according to his own Capacity, and Occasions, according to the Causes which drive him on such Searches, and the Fruits which he may fairly hope to obtain from them. Now as for those Arts which administer to the Necessities and to the Conveniences of Human Life, no Man can raise a Doubt about their Excellency and Use. But concerning the Study of Letters, many have been so bold as to maintain, that Learning is not only useles, but destructive to Mankind; and that for this Reason we find it to have been forbidden in so many Commonwealths, above the degree of Reading, Writing, and Managing Accompts. Every one knows the common Reproaches that are cast on Scholars: Of their Unfitness for Business, their Weakness of Courage, and of Civil Prudence, their Awkerness in Gesture and in Converse; with a thousand more Reflections of the same Nature, which some Men have thought themselves very Eloquent in setting out (a).

Now to come at the Truth of this Question, and to know how to set a just Value on such Attainments, let us first lay this down for an undoubted Principle, that to the acquiring of Wisdom and Prudence, bare Letters are by no means sufficient, without a Native Excellency of Soul. If this Happiness be wanting, we can no more produce Wisdom by Scholastical Institution, than we can procure a rich Harvest of Corn by Ploughing on the Barren Sands. For 'tis one thing to be a Great Reader, and another to be a Prudent Man (b). And Quintilian's Judgment is right, when he observes (1), that Prudence can do more without Learning, than Learning without Prudence. Therefore that Persons naturally Foolish and Stupid are not turn'd into Great Sages by the Application of Liberal Studies, doth no more detract from the Excellency of Solid Learning, than it doth from the Efficacy of Medicines, that they are not able to recover Dead Men. To him that hath, shall be given: And Learning, as Horace says, vim promovet insitam; and where that vis insita, that Natural Vigour is wanting, the other Gift is vainly bestow'd,

We may observe farther, that as Learning cannot alter Native Folly, so neither can it reform a Native Disposition to Wickedness and to Impiety; which on the contrary grow more incurable by its Application; drawing thence a Supply of Arms for their open Defence. 'Tis a Remark of Hobbes (c), that without Letters it is impossible for any Man to become either excellently wise, or (unless his Memory be hurt by Disease, or ill Constitution of Organs) excellently foolish (d).

But the whole Course of those Pursuits which pass under the Name of Learning, is not all of the same Nature, and therefore should not be all rated at the same Price. We may divide Learning then into three kinds, such as is Useful, such as is Elegant and Curious; and lastly, such as is Vain and Insignificant (2). Useful Learning may be again divided into three Classes, Morality, Physick, and Mathematicks. (For Divinity stands on its own Bottom, and maintains a separate and a superior Esteem: Tho' if it condescends to enter the common Division of Sciences, it must be placed under this first Head.) Morality is concern'd about the Improvement of Mens Minds, and the Advancement of a Social Life; Physick hath the Health of the Body under its peculiar Care; and Mathematicks are of apparent Use and Benefit in the Invention of so many Arts for the Profit and for the Conveniency of Human Life. By that Learning which we term Elegant and Curious, we understand such as is not indeed of so necessary Use, as to render the Life of Man less sociable or less convenient upon the want of it; and yet is worthy of the Enquiries of Ingenious Persons; because it either leads us deeper into the Discovery of the secret Works of Nature, or shows the singular Excellency of Human Wit and Cunning, or preserves the Memory of Things and Actions, and the Records of Mankind. And such may we reckon the Knowledge of various Tongues, Natural Experiments and Speculations, the more fine and subtle Parts of Mathematicks, History of all kinds, Criticism, (as it preserves Authors correct and entire,) Poesy, Oratory, and the like. Which are all in themselves excellent, and worthy of Praise, and serve for the Garniture and Ornament of Human Improvement; according to which Measure, both the Practice and the Value of them are to be stated, and determin'd.

Vain Learning we call, not only such as is made up of false and erroneous Notions; but likewise all those Inventions of Crafty or of Idle Men, set up to amaze our Minds, and to hinder us from the Pursuits of solid Knowledge. Amongst which, as we must needs reckon many Opinions of the Old Philosophers, so very disagreeable to the apparent Nature of things; so we think it will not be over-severe to join to them the greatest part of that Barbarous Cant, which went under the Name of School-Learning in the Ages preceding the Reformation of Religion; and which is still resolutely maintain'd by some Men, either because they know no better, or because they are ashamed to unlearn, what they have made themselves Masters of with such prodigious Labour, or because 'tis the manifest Interest of the Papal Monarchy to keep Mens Wits employ'd on Trifles, for fear they should make some very dangerous Discoveries (e). Now the greater Proficiency any Person hath made in solid Knowledge, the more he despises these empty and unprofitable Enquiries.

Et stultus labor est ineptiarum.*

'Tis shameful Men should needless Knots invent,
To prove laboriously Impertinent.

Another thing to be consider'd by those who dispute about the Usefulness of Learning is this; that the Faults of bad Institution and of Hot-brain'd Pedants, are not to be charg'd on the Sciences themselves (a). Is it likely, that sound Knowledge and Wisdom should be learnt in such a School as Agathias describes under the Philosophaster Uranius? At their Meetings (says he) every one talks as he pleases about the sublimest Matters, and Points of Divine Science; and tho' they are perpetually canvassing these Questions, yet they neither persuade others, nor will ever lay aside the Notion they themselves have taken up, but whatever they be, defend them Tooth and Nail, against all Opposers. When the Disputations are over they depart mutually incens'd, and vent their Rage against one another, like quarrelling Gamesters, in the most abusive and foulest Ribaldry. Thus the Contention ends, without the least Profit given, or receiv'd; and those who went to the Engagement very good Friends, come away most violent and most spiteful Enemies (b) (1).

But supposing things rightly order'd, can any one doubt, whether a Person endow'd with Good Natural Abilities, and instituted in solid Learning, will not discharge the greatest Affairs with more Accuracy and with more Dispatch, than if he depended on the bare Strength of Nature, and neglected other Assistances (c)? But then all those who apply themselves to Study, should be exactly careful, first that they direct their Enquiries to a good End, the Service of Life, or the Improvement and Perfection of their Minds; and not make use of them for idle Amusements, or pleasant Methods of passing away Time. Aristippus in

Diogenes Laertius, being ask'd what things ingenuous Children should be taught, answer'd, such as they may use when they come to be Men. 'Twould not be only shameful, but wicked, if those whose Heads are fill'd with brave Notions and Sentences, should do no more Good than Common Ideots (d). The Egyptians call'd their Libraries Physick-shops for their Soul, intimating their Use as well as their Excellency (e). And Arrian's Epictetus (f) thought he could not give a worse Character of Mens being falsely and insignificantly Learn'd, than to say that they were Lyons in their Schools, but meer Vermin out of them.

They are likewise to take heed, that they do not resolve all Science, into bare Authority (2), and Custom of Speech, and an unintelligible Set of Terms; but that they search into the solid Foundations of things, and build their Schemes on evident Reason. As for those things which they cannot yet bring to clear Demonstration, there must be no Stubbornness or Obstinacy in maintaining them; but a former Opinion must be willingly quitted, upon a better and a more certain Information; because 'tis very likely another Man may have more quick and more piercing Parts than our selves; and because every new Day may correct some Mistake in the former. And this teachable Disposition is a most infallible Mark of a Generous Mind (g). Lastly, Care is to be us'd that they do not in such a manner bury themselves amongst their Books, as to neglect other Duties, and render themselves unfit for the Genius of a Civil and Sociable Life (h). For Pedantry of Mind is a Vice not peculiar to Scholars, but runs in some measure thro' the whole

(h) Lucian Conviv. A Learned Institution leads aside from Right and Plain Reasoning, those who keep their Eyes and their Thoughts continually fix'd upon their Books.

World, and infects Men of all Orders, Professions and Conditions.

XIV. But altho' the principal and the most laborious part of Human Improvement is concern'd about the Mind, we must not in the mean time neglect the Body; since the Mind makes use of its supports, and can never rise to any great Achievement, if this inferior be ill affected. We are oblig'd therefore, as much as in us lies, to secure a Sound Body for our Sound Mind to lodge in (1); and rather to harden our Limbs and Constitution by long Endurance of Labour, than to soften or break their Strength by Effeminacy and Idleness (a). Pyrrhus is said to have made this only request to the Gods in his daily Devotions, ὑμῖνεν, to be well in health, judging this Blessing to contain under it all Degrees of Happiness. Care is likewise to be taken, that our Bodily Force and Vigour be not weaken'd by Intemperance in Meat or Drink, or by unseasonable and unnecessary Labours, or any other way. Upon this account Gluttony, Drunkenness, Immoderate Use of Women, and the like Excesses are to avoided (b). 'Tis a famous Saying of Democritus in Plutarch (c), if the Body should bring an Action of Damage against the Soul, the Soul would be sure to be Cast. Tho' to this it might be replied, that the Mistakes of the Mind in Reference to Food, and Pleasure and other things, which concern the Preservation of the Body, do all proceed from its yielding to the Corporeal Appetites and Affections, contrary to the Admonitions of Reason: So that the Mind is never of it self the Cause of bringing the Body into a worse Condition, than ordinary. And therefore to Democritus's Saying on one side, we will oppose the no less renown'd Sentence of Theophrastus on the other; The Soul (says he) pays large Rent to the Body for its dwelling.

XV. Our Life is given us by our Great Creator, as a kind of Course or Race, in which we might exercise our Strength and Abilities by the Direction of Reason: And therefore it is not to be measur'd by so many times drawing Breath, but by a constant Succession of Good Actions. Every one is therefore to take Care, that he be not επιτόσιον ἀχθῶ ἀρξενς (2), an useless Burden to the Earth; unprofitable to himself, and troublesome to others; born only to increase the Number of Mankind, and to devour the Provisions of Nature; and that he do not live only for the sake of his Palate (d). Farther, since Human Industry commonly exercises it self one of these two ways, either in procuring things necessary for the Preservation of Life, or in discharging the Offices of a Social and a Civil Condition; which admit of great Variety, and do not all suit alike with all Mens Capacities and Abilities (3); it is manifest that every Man ought with early Care to chuse out and undertake such a Course of Life as is Honest, Profitable, and Comporting with his Parts and Strength. In which Choice (4), Men are usually determin'd, either by Impulse and Inclination of Genius and Fancy, or by some peculiar Aptness of Body or Mind, or by Condition and Quality of Birth, or by the Goods of Fortune, or by the Authority of Parents, and sometimes by the Command of the Civil State, or lastly by the Invitations of Opportunity, or by the Compulsion of Necessity (e). Hence it appears, that not only those Persons do live in a State repugnant to sound Reason, who maintain themselves by Robbery or Villanies; but those too, who withdraw themselves unnecessarily from the common Duties and Offices of Life: Such are many of the Modern Hermits and Monks, as well as some of the An-

Under so great an Inequality of Fortunes, they could not prescribe to all the same common Exercises; and therefore they put them in different Ways according to their Circumstances and Condition. The meaner sort they engag'd in Agriculture and in Trading; well knowing both, that Idleness was the Cause of Poverty, and Poverty a Temptation to Injury and Mischiefs. So that by removing this Fountain of Vice, they thought they should prevent the Evils which us'd to flow from it. As for the more Wealthy, them they compell'd to apply their Minds to Horsemanship, Feats of Body, Hunting, and Philosophy: Apprehending that such Employments and Amusements, must needs have this good Effect, to make some excel in Virtue, and to keep others from being Notorious in Vice. cient Philosophers. But those who chiefly fall under this Censure, are the Sturdy and Able Vagrants, who abuse the Divine Name into a Trade of getting Money, and make GOD, as it were, their Tributary. The Wickedness of these Varlets is the greater, if they voluntarily maim or distort any of their Limbs, so as to render themselves incapable of doing the World any Service, tho' they should afterwards desire it. 'Tis a Custom very remarkable amongst the Chinese, that no Person of sound Strength is permitted to beg, altho' he be blind; such unfortunate Wretches being employ'd in turning Mills, from which Service they earn their Subsistence (a).

Again, since Time runs on with such swift Steps, since Death surprizes Men so often when they least expect it, and is always beyond their Power to avoid; thence it follows, that 'tis our Duty to make an early Use of Life, not to begin too long a Thread of Actions, not to lay too vast a Train of Designs (b) (1). We ought likewise to have the Accompts of our Life all ways drawn up in a Readiness, and to harden our Minds betimes against the Terrour of Dying; that without a trembling Reluctancy, without repining at our Creator's Pleasure, we may resign, when he demands it, what he lent us of his Free Bounty, under no Terms of keeping (c).

XVI. How passionately every Man loves his own Life, and how heartily he studies the Security and Preservation of it, is evident beyond Dispute. But it will admit of a Debate whether the bare Natural Instinct which he enjoys in common with Beasts, inclines him to these Desires; or whether he is not engag'd in them by some Superior Command of the Law of Nature. For, in as much as no one can, in a legal Sense, stand oblig'd to himself, such a Law seems to be of no Force or Significancy which is terminated in my self, which I can dispense with when I please, and by the Breach of which I do no one an Injury. Besides, it looks like a needless thing to establish a Law about this Point, since the anxious Tenderness of Self-Love would before-hand drive us so forcibly on the Care of our own Safety, as to render it almost impossible for us to act otherwise (d). If then, a Man were born only for himself, we confess it would be convenient that he should be left entirely to his own Disposal, and be allow'd to do whatever he pleas'd with himself. But since by the Universal Consent of all Wise Men it is acknowledg'd, that the Almighty Creator made Man to serve him, and to set forth his Glory in a more illustrious manner, by improving the Good things committed to his Trust; and since Society, for which Man is sent into the World, cannot be well exercis'd and maintain'd, unless every one, as much as in him lies, takes care of his own Preservation; (the Safety of the whole Society of Mankind, being a thing unintelligible, if the Safety of each Particular Member were an indifferent Point,) it manifestly appears, that a Man by throwing aside all Care of his own Life, though he cannot properly be said to injure himself, yet is highly injurious both to Almighty God, and to the General Body of Mankind (e).

It was not rightly infer'd in the Argument we just now mention'd, that the Law of Nature did not concern it self with this matter, because Instinct did before drive us on the like good Resolution. We should rather imagine, that the Force of Instinct was super-added (as an able Second) to the Dictate of Reason; as if this Help alone could scarce make a Tie strong enough to keep Mankind together. For indeed, if we reflect on the Troubles and Miseries that constantly wait on Human Life, and do so far outweigh that little and mean Portion of Pleasure (2), which through a perpetual Repetition grows every day more flat and languid, so that we must needs loath it in every Enjoyment; and if we consider farther, how many Men have their Days prolong'd only to make them capable of more Misfortunes and Evils; who is there almost, who would not rid himself of the Burthen of Life, as soon as possible, if Instinct did not render it so light and so sweet; or unless so much Bitterness or so much Terrour were join'd to our Notion of Death? And yet who is there almost who would not break through the bare Opposition of Instinct, had not the Command of our Creator secur'd us with a much stronger Bar and Restraint (a)? 'Nature, says Quintilian, hath invented this 'chief Devise for the Preservation of Man- 'kind, to make us die unwillingly, thus en- 'abling us to bear so vast a Load of Misfor- 'tunes as falls to our Share, with some Patience 'and Quiet. And Socrates in Xenophon (b) declares it to be σοφὸν ἀναγκαστὴν τὴν φύσιν, the Artifice of a Wise Workman, or Builder, 'to have 'implanted in Men a Desire of producing Off- 'spring; in Woman a Desire of Nursing and 'Breeding them up; and in all, when brought 'up, a vast Desire of Living, and as great a 'Fear of Death. And this last Motive is the main security of every Man, from the Violence of others. For how easy were it to Kill, were it not so hard to Die? Hence he presently becomes Master of other Men's Lives, who hath once arriv'd at the Contempt of his own. And the regard that others have to their own Safety, is the best Defence of Mine (c).

XVII. 'Tis a Question of more Difficulty, whether at all, or how far a Man hath Power over his own Life, either to expose it to extreme Danger, or to consume it by slow means and degrees, or lastly, to end it in a sudden and a violent manner (1). Many of the Ancients allow'd a Man an absolute Right in these Points, and thought he might either voluntarily offer his Life as a Pledge for another's, or devote it freely, without any such Design of preserving the Life of his Friend; or whenever he grew weary of living, might prevent the Tardiness of Nature and Fate. Pliny (d) calls the Ability to kill ones self the most excellent Convenience, in the midst of so many Torments of Life. Whom we can by no means excuse from flat Impiety, for daring to think so abjectly of the greatest Gift of Heaven. It is our Business to examine what seems most agreeable, in this Case, to the Law of Nature. And here we take it first of all to be true beyond dispute, that since Men both can and ought to apply their Pains to the Help and Service of another; and since some certain kinds of Labour, and an overstraining Earnestness in any, may so affect the Strength and Vigour of a Man, as to make Old Age and Death come on much sooner, than if he had pass'd his Days in Softness, and in easy Pursuits; any one may without Fault, voluntarily contract his Life in some Degree, upon account of obliging Mankind more signally, by some extraordinary Services and Benefits. For since we do not only live to our selves, but to God, and to Human society; if either the Glory of our Creator, or the Safety and Good of the General Community require the spending of our Lives, we ought willingly to lay them out on such excellent Uses (e). Pompey the Great, in a time of Famine at Rome, when the Officer who had the Care of transporting the Corn, as well as all his other Friends intreated him not to venture to Sea in so stormy a Season, nobly answer'd them, that I should go 'tis necessary, but not that I should live. And Achilles in Homer, when his Fate was put to his Choice, prefer'd a hasty Death in the Glorious Adventures of War, to the longest Period of Age, to be pass'd idly and ingloriously at home.

XVIII. Farther, in as much as it frequently happens, that the Lives of many Men cannot be preserv'd, unless others expose themselves on their Behalf, to a probable Danger of losing their own; this makes it evident, that the lawful Governour may lay an Injunction on any Man in such cases, not to decline the Danger upon Pain of the severest Punishment. And on this Principle is founded the Obligation of Souldiers, which we shall enlarge upon in its proper place. 'Tis a Noble Saying of Socrates in Plato's Apology; In whatever Station a Man is fixt either by his own Choice, as judging it the best, or by the Command of his Superior, in that he ought resolutely to continue,

(a) Quint. Declam. 4. What Satisfaction, O wretched Mortals, can it prove, to keep the Soul for so many Years, or, if Nature allow'd it, for infinite Ages, in the unpleasant and wearisome restraint of the Body? If we diligently weigh and examine all our Joys, all the Pleasures, which in this universal Scene of the World, either attract our Sight or flatter our Use, we shall find the whole Life of Man to be no more than a single Day. They must be low and abject Minds which are not tired with this poor Circulation of Actions. So that he who by Application to honest Arts is able to understand what is the Perfection of Goodness and true Happiness, will think no Death untimely: and those who refer the Design of our being chiefly to the Mind and Soul, must every Day be surfeited of Life: Ye expect I should now give an account how many things there are in this short Stage, which we ought to avoid and decline; that I should set our Fears and our Calamities against our Joy and our Success. Let us then weigh those dear Comforts for which we weary the Gods with vain Petitions, and on the account of which we complain of the Shortness of Life. And what are they, but Vanity, Greediness, Luxury and Lust? And shall not we be ashamed for the Sake of such Scandalous Privileges, to bear Weakness, Grief, and tedious Distempers; and even to court their stay, when we have an Opportunity of throwing them off and escaping? and to undergo any Danger that may assault him there; reckoning neither Death nor any other Evil so Grievous, as Cowardice and Infamy.

Nor doth it seem at all repugnant either to Natural Reason, or to the Holy Scriptures, (which command us to lay down our Lives for our Brethren) that, without any such rigid Injunction of a Superior, a Man should voluntarily expose himself to a Probability of losing his Life for others; provided he hath good hopes of thus procuring their Safety, and that they are worthy of so dear a Ransom: For it would be filly and senseless, that a Man should venture his own Life for another whom 'tis impossible to preserve; and that a Person of Worth and Excellence should sacrifice himself for the Security of an Insignificant paltry Fellow (a). We conceive it then to be Lawful, that a Man may either give himself, as a Surety for another, especially for an Innocent and a Worthy Person, or as a Hostage for the Safety of many, in the Case of Treaties; upon pain of suffering Death, if either the accus'd Person doth not appear, or the Treaty be not observ'd. Though the other Party to whom he stands bound on either of these Accounts, cannot fairly put him to Death upon such Failure; as we shall elsewhere make out. But that those vain Customs of Men's devoting themselves out of Fool-hardiness and Ostentation (such as we observ'd to be in use amongst the Japonese,) are contrary to the Law of Nature, we do not in the least doubt. For there can be no Virtue in an Action where there's no Reason. Nor do we pretend to maintain, that the Law of Nature obliges a Man to prefer the Lives of others to his own; especially supposing the Cases and Circumstances to be equal. For besides that the common Inclination of Mankind is an Argument to the contrary, we might alledge the Testimony of Witnesses beyond all Exception, allowing a Man to be always dearest to himself, and Charity still to begin at home (b).

XIX. It remains that we examine, whether or no a Man, at his own free Pleasure, either when he grows weary of Life, or on the account of avoiding some terrible impending Evil, or some ignominious and certain Death, may hasten his own Fate, as a Remedy to his present or to his future Misfortunes (i). On this point we have a famous Saying of Plato (c) frequently mention'd with Honour and Commendation by Christian Writers. ὡς ἐν νυκτερῶν ἰσμεν οἱ ἄνθρωποι, καὶ εἰ δὲ ἴδῃ ἑαυτὸν ἐκ ταύτης λύειν, εἰ δ' ἀποσιδῶσθαι. We are plac'd, as it were, upon the Guard, in Life; and a Man must not rid himself of this Charge, or basely desert his Post. Which Lactantius hath express'd more fully in his Divine Institutions (d); As (says he) we did not come into the World upon our own Pleasure or Choice, so neither must we quit our Station otherwise than by the Command of him who gave it us; who put us into this Tenement of the Body, with Orders to dwell here, till he should please to remove us. It is worth while to hear how Plato (e) describes the Self-Murderer, whom he hath condemn'd to a disgraceful Burial. He that kills himself, preventing by Violence the Stroke of Fate, being forc'd to his End, neither by the Sentence of the Judges, nor by any unavoidable Chance, nor on the account of defending his Modesty in extreme Danger; but thus unjustly condemning and executing himself, out of Cowardice and Unmanliness of Spirit. Aristotle hath well seconded his Master. To die (says he (f)) either to get rid of Poverty or of Love, or of any other Trouble or Hardship, is so far from being an Act of Courage, that it rather argues the meanest degree of Fear. For 'tis Weakness to fly and to avoid those things which are hard and painful to be undergone (g). Grotius (h) hath observ'd, that Persons Guilty of Self-Murder were excluded from decent Honours of Burial, both amongst the Gentiles and the Jews (i). But amongst

To throw away our Life when there can be no Advantage, is precipitate Madness: And though such a Blind Fierceness hath some vain Shadow of Courage, yet it will always pass for Folly, in the Judgment of wise Men. Ammian. Marcellin. 1. 25. c. 4. If we consider right, it is just the same Fearfulness and Cowardice, to desire Death when we ought not, and to refuse it on a proper occasion. Add. Roger de Bramin. p. 2. c. 19. Nicol. Trigant. de Regno China, 1. 1. c. 9. Charvon. 1. 2. c. 11. n. 18. (h) L. 2. c. 19. f. 5. (i) Aristotle observes (Ethic. 1. 5. c. 15.) that those who are guilty of their own Deaths, are more properly Injurious to the Commonwealth than to themselves; and that therefore they deserve the Ignominy commonly inflicted on their Reliques.

the latter one Case is commonly excepted, and allow'd as a just Reason for killing ones self; and that is when a Man finds he shall otherwise be made a Repröach to God, and to Religion. For acknowledging the Power over our Lives not to be in our own hands but in God's, they took it for granted, that nothing but the Will of God, either manifest or presumptive, could excuse the Design of anticipating our Fate. As Instances of this excepted Case they alledge the Examples, of Sampson, who chose to die by his own Strength, when he found the True Religion expos'd to Scorn in his Person and Misfortunes. And of Saul, who fell on his own Sword, lest he should have been derided and insulted over by God's and his Enemies; and lest, if he should have yielded himself Prisoner, the Slavery of his Country and Kingdom should inevitably follow. For the Jews are of Opinion that Saul recover'd his Wisdom and Honour, as to the last Act of his Life; in as much as after the Ghost of Samuel had foretold his Death in the Battle, yet he refus'd not to engage for his Country and for the Law of his God; whence he merited eternal Praise, even by the Testimony of David; who likewise commended so highly the Piety of those Men, who honour'd their Princes Reliques with a decent Burial.

Some extend this Exception and Allowance to many other Cases which bear a Resemblance to the former. And the Foundation they build upon is this, that as no Man can be properly bound or oblig'd to himself, so no Man can do an Injury to himself, when he takes away his own Life. As for a Man's being engag'd by the Law of Nature to preserve himself, they say the Reason of this is, because he is constituted and appointed by God for the maintenance of Human Society, which he must not by any means forsake, like an idle Soldier, who runs away from the Post assign'd him in Battle; And that therefore my Obligation to save my own Life, is not a Debt to my self, but to God, and to the Community of Mankind. So that if that Respect to God and to Mankind be taken off and be remov'd, the Care of my Life is recommended to me only by Sensitive Instinct, which not rising to the Force of a Law, an Action repugnant to it cannot be accounted sinful. On these Considerations, they think the Case of those Persons deserves a favourable Judgment, and at least a kind Pity rather than a rigorous Censure, who lay violent Hands upon themselves, when they see that they shall otherwise infallibly suffer a Death of Torture and Ignominy from their Enemies; since it cannot be for the Interest of the Publick, that they must needs die in so infamous a manner: Or else, when they see such an Injury likely to be offer'd to them, as if they undergo, they shall be ever after scorn'd and derided by the rest of Mankind. Of the former sort, are those, who seeing themselves condemn'd to Death, either by Cruel Enemies abroad, or Bloody Tyrants at home, have wilfully prevented the Stroke; either to avoid the Tortures and the Shame of a Publick Execution, or to procure some Benefit to their Friends or Families by this Expedient. Thus Tacitus (a), giving an account of some of the Accus'd Persons under Tiberius, who made themselves away, observes, that the Fear of the Executioner, rendred these Acts very frequent. And that whereas such as suffer'd Death in Publick, were denied the Privilege of Burial, and had their Goods confiscated; those who died by their own hands, were decently interr'd, and their Last Wills stood good with full effect; these Indulgences serving as a Reward for their Haste. And here by the way we may remark, that Martial's Censure doth not always hold good,

— Furor est, ne mori, mori;

— 'Tis mad to die for fear of Death;

For, as Æschines (b) hath well distinguish'd, To die is not so terrible, as to bear the Infamy that attends some kinds of Deaths.

The other sort of Persons whose Death we observ'd to be so favourably interpreted by some Casuists, are those Women and Beautiful Boys, who have kill'd themselves to avoid the Violation of their Chastity (c). And in their Behalf, they urge this plausible Excuse, that being assaulted with such a Danger as they could not otherwise unless by Miracle escape, they might well conclude that their Almighty Sovereign and General, now gave them a Dismission, and that they might well presume on the Consent and Leave of Mankind, to whom they were already lost: It being no ones Interest, that they should not anticipate their Death for so little a time, to avoid the feeling of such Tortures and Abuses as might perhaps tempt them to yield to a more grievous Sin: And in as much as it seem'd unreasonable to condemn Generous Souls to such a Necessity, as that they must wait for the Sword of Villains, who would inhanche the Bitterness of Death, by their foul and ignominious Usage (d).

But to leave this particular Point without venturing at a Determination; thus much we take to be evident, that those who voluntarily

For that Divine Power which dwells in us, forbids us to depart without his Leave. But when Heaven presents a fair Occasion, as formerly to Socrates, now to Cato, and often to other Persons, I dare engage, that a truly wise Man, will quit with Joy this Vale of Darkness, to enter into Happiness and Light. And yet such an one will not violently break the Chains of his Prison; for this the Laws forbid him; but he will go out quietly and fairly, when God is pleas'd to give him his Enlargement; as if his Release from the Restraint were sign'd by the Proper Magistrate and Power. put an end to their own Lives, either as tired out with the many Troubles which commonly attend our Mortal Condition; or from an Abhorrence of Indignities and Evils, which yet would not render them disgraceful Members of Human Society; or through Fear of such Pains and Torments as by resolutely enduring, they might have become useful Examples to others; cannot be well clear'd of the Charge of Sinning against the Law of Nature. Sir Thomas Moor seems to be of another Opinion in his Utopia, but his Reasons do not prevail with us to alter our Judgment.

But those are on all accounts to be exempted from the Crime of Self-Murder, who lay violent Hands on themselves, under any Disease robbing them of the Use of Reason. Many Persons likewise who have ran into Voluntary Destruction, upon an exceeding Fright and Consternation, have on that account been excus'd by Moderate and Candid Judges (a).

It ought to be observ'd farther on this Head, that it makes no difference whether a Man kill himself, or force others to dispatch him (b). For he who at such a time, or on such occasion, ought not to die, is by no means excus'd, if he makes use of another Man's hands to procure his Death; since what a Man doth by another, he is suppos'd in Law to have done himself, and must therefore bear the Guilt or Imputation of the Fact (1): Altho' the Person who lends his hands to such a Service, may likewise bring himself in for a Share in the Fault. For this Reason we don't admire the Reflection which Florus (c) makes on the Deaths of Brutus and Cassius; who (says he) doth not wonder, that these Wise and Great Persons did not employ their own hands in their concluding Strokes? Perhaps it was part of their Perswasion, that they ought not to defile themselves by such Attempts, but that in delivering their most Holy and most Pious Souls from the Confinement of their Bodies, they should make use of their own Judgment, in the Intention, and of other Men's Wickedness in the Execution. For if it were unlawful for them at that time to end their Lives, it was indifferent whether they fell by their own or by others Violence. But if it were lawful, how can any Wickedness or Guilt be imputed to the Servants who assisted them? Though the Historian might in some measure be excus'd, if the same Custom were practis'd in his Country, which Aschines mentions amongst the Grecians, that if a Person Murder'd himself, the hand that perform'd the Deed, was buried apart from the rest of the Body (d).

To conclude, since we deny that a Man hath absolute Power over his own Life, it is plain that we cannot approve of those Laws, which in some Countries either command or permit People to make themselves away. Such a Law Diodorus Siculus (e) reports to have been in force amongst the Inhabitants of the Island Ceylan, ordaining, that the People should live only to such a Number of Years, which being run out, they eat a certain Herb that put them into their long Sleep, and dispatch'd them without the least Sense of Pain (f). And thus too amongst the Creans, all Persons above Sixty Years old were oblig'd by the Laws to poyson themselves, to supply Food for the rest (g). Tho' Alian gives this better Reason for the Practice, that having arriv'd at such an Age they were conscious to themselves, that they were no longer able to promote their Country's Interest by their Service; growing now towards Stupidity and Dotage (h). Procopius (i) relates a Custom of the Heruli, by which those who were weaken'd and disabled either by Disease or Age, voluntarily sent themselves out of the World: The Wives hanging themselves at the Tombs of their Husbands, if they lost them in this manner. Alian (k) reports somewhat to the same purpose of the Sardi, and the Bebricci, and Strabo (l), and Herodotus (m) of the Massagetae, who may be consulted at Leisure.

C H A P. V.

Of Self-Defence.

TO Self-Preservation, which not only the tenderest Passion, but the exactest Reason recommends to Mankind, belongs Self-Defence, or the warding off such Evils or Mischiefs as tend to our hurt, when offer'd by other Men. This Defence of our selves may be undertaken two ways, either without hurting him, who designs the Mischief against us; or else by hurting or destroying him. As to the former Expedient, no sensible Man can question, but that it is altogether lawful, and blameless. But concerning the latter, many have entertain'd a Scruple; in as much as by putting it in Practice we hurt or destroy a Man like our selves, with whom we are oblig'd to live in a Social manner, and whose Death seems to be as great a Loss to Mankind, as our own. And besides, because a forcible Repulse of an Aggressor, may cause more Disturbances and Outrages in human Society, than if we should either decline the Mischief by Flight, or patiently yield our Body to it, when an escape is impossible. Yet that the Defence of our selves may not only be undertaken the first of these ways, but when that proves ineffectual, even with the Hurt of the Assailant, we are inform'd as well by the Judgment of Reason, as by the concurring Testimony of the Learned and Unlearned World. 'Tis true Man was created for the maintaining of Peace with his Fellows, and all the Laws of Nature which bear a regard to other Men, do primarily tend towards the Constitution and the Preservation of this Universal Safety and Quiet. Yet Nature is not backward in giving us an Indulgence to fly even to Force, when we cannot by other means secure our selves from Injuries and Assaults. For the Obligation to the Exercise of the Laws of Nature and the Offices of Peace, is mutual, and binds all Men alike; neither hath Nature given any Person such a distinct Privilege, as that he may break these Laws at his Pleasure, towards others, and the others be still oblig'd to maintain the Peace towards him. But the Duty being Mutual, the Peace ought to be mutually observ'd. And therefore when another, contrary to the Laws of Peace attempts such things against me, as tend to my Destruction, it would be the highest Impudence in him to require me at the same time to hold his Person as Sacred and Inviolable: That is, to forego my own Safety, for the sake of letting him practice his Malice with Impunity (a). But since in his Behaviour towards me he shows himself unsociable, and so renders himself unfit to receive from me the Duties of Peace, all my Care and Concern ought to be how to effect my own Deliverance from his hands; which if I cannot accomplish without his Hurt, he may impute the Mischief to his own Wickedness, which put me under this Necessity (b). For otherwise, all the Goods which we enjoy either by the Gift of Nature, or by the Procurement of our own Industry, would have been granted us in vain, if it were unlawful for us to oppose those in a forcible manner, who unjustly invade them. And honest Men would be expos'd a ready Prey to Villains, if they were never allow'd to make use of Violence in resisting their Attacks. So that upon the whole, to banish Self-defence though pursued by Force, would be so far from promoting the Peace, that it would rather contribute to the Ruine and Destruction of Mankind. Nor is it to be imagin'd that the Law of Nature, which was instituted for a Man's Security in the World, should favour so absurd a Peace, as must necessarily cause his present Destruction, and would in fine, produce any Thing sooner than a sociable Life (c).

II. But now, whether a Violent Self-defence, and such as is join'd with the Hurt or the Slaughter of the Assailant be an obliging and a necessary Duty, (as we have already shown it to be a lawful, and an allow'd Practice,) is a Question not so easy to be determin'd. In stating which Point we do not speak of Soldiers, or of the Guards hired by Travellers, who whilst they defend themselves with the Slaughter of the Enemies or the Robbers, at the same time protect and deliver their Country, or the Men who have put themselves under their Care. But we confine our selves to

(a) Herodian. l. 4. c. 5. In Extream Danger, not only Necessity but Reputation obligeth us rather to avenge an Injury, than sustain it. Since should we fall by such a Mischief, at the same time that we were pitied as Unfortunate, we should be reproach'd as Cowards.

(b) Hor. II. Sat. l. v. 44.

Qui me commovit, (melius non tangere, clamo;)
Flebit.*

Hurt not a Peaceful Man: but if you try
His Patience far, (you had best keep off, I cry;)
You may repent your Boldness. ———

(c) Add. Græc. l. 1. c. 2. & 6. 3. f. 3. To whom we may apply that Saying of Seneca (Phœnix)

Vitam tibi ipsi si negas, multis negas.

By chusing Death your self, you chuse for All.

the Case of those who are excited to make such Defence by their own Particular Danger (a). Now there are some who will have this Defence to be so strict a Command, that it cannot be taken off even by Civil Constitutions; and consequently that he who suffers himself to be kill'd, when he might have violently resisted, ought to be look'd upon as guilty of Self-Murder (b). Which is something like the Custom in Sparta, where the Ephori punish'd a Man, for having suffer'd many Persons to injure him (c).

The Author of the Treatise De Principiis Justi & Decori, declares in Favour of this Opinion: and the Argument he proceeds on is to this purpose (d), 'That since amongst other things contributing to the Preservation of Man, Nature hath given us all a quick Sense of Pain, a Desire of Revenge, together with hands for the hurting others, or the defending our selves; we may hence infer, that these Gifts not being bestow'd on us in vain, it is the Pleasure of God that we should employ them in procuring our own Safety. And that therefore not to use my hands against an Assailant, tho' to the Procurement of his Death, would be the same thing as voluntarily to cut them off. Though indeed he afterwards (e) confesses, that this Law of Self-Preservation is not of so strict necessity, but that there may sometimes happen such Cases, as shall either dispense with a Man's Obedience to it, or leave him free to do as he pleases.

For our parts, we think it ought principally to be consider'd, whether it much concern the Interest of many that the Person Invaded should survive, or whether he seem only to live for himself. In the former Case we conceive that there lies an Obligation on a Man to secure his own Life by any possible Means. But in the latter Case we take it to be a thing of Permission or Allowance only, not of Command to defend One-self by the Death of the Aggressor, especially if his Life would have been of great Service and Profit to many People; and if we may probably conjecture, that by dying in such an Attempt, he incurs the Danger of Eternal Damnation. For tho' the Greatness of a surprizing Terrour will scarce suffer one exactly to weigh the Merits of Persons; and tho' such a Danger as a Man voluntarily throws himself into, and may at his Pleasure get rid of, ought to find little Regard or Consideration from others, especially from him who is the Subject of his Fury, and at whose Cost he is thus extravagant (f); Yet that an Act from which so great Evils would be brought upon another (as there would sometimes from this Violent Defence,) should be reckon'd a matter of strict Duty, and the Omission of it a Sin, we see little Reason to allow. Especially, since the Old Maxim might be so well applied to this Case, that any Man may renounce his own Privilege, provided he do not thereby injure a third Person: Which Quintilian (g) hath thus express'd and illustrated, This, says he, is the Nature of all Benefits, that they do not impose a necessity, but grant a Power. Whatever Expedient you invent, to procure the Honour or Safety of another, loses the Name of a Privilege, if you compel him to make use of it. Run over all the Institutions and all the Rights of Mankind, and you shall never observe that the Law is so fondly solicitous for our Good, as to extort that from us, by which it intends only to do us a Favour.

III. But in order to more exact Judgment of Self-defence, and to know by what Rule it should be moderated, and how far it may rightly proceed: first of all we should examine, whether the Defendant live in a State of Nature, or of Civil Society; since the bounds of this Practice are much narrower in the latter than in the former Condition. Which difference not being observ'd by many Authors, hath been the Occasion of their delivering such things in General concerning Unblameable Self-defence, as will hold true only under one particular State. But now if we first distinctly explain what Right we have to such a Practice in a State of Nature, it will appear with great Ease and Evidence, how far and on what grounds this Liberty is stinted, in Persons living together under a Civil Government.

It is then a good Rule of Prudence, that a wise Man ought to try all other Expedients before he proceed to Arms, or Violence. For in as much as all Combat and forcible Contention is of uncertain issue, it would be adviseable first to make Experiment of safer Remedies and Redresses, e'er we enter the Lists, and come to a formal Engagement (h) (1). Thus if I can cut off the Invader's Access to me, I am a Fool if I unnecessarily meet him hand to hand. And if I can defend my self with a Wall or a Gate, 'tis absurd in me to expose my Breast to my Foe (i). Farther, Wisdom advises us to

This, if he look'd no farther than his own Person, was spoke with Honesty as well as with Bravery. But if a Man by such an Act of Generosity endangers the Safety of the State, especially being himself in a Publick Trust, I question if he does not violate that greater and more Sacred Law, his Obligation to his Country. Put up a small Injury, if we can with Convenience, and so rather to recede in some degree from our Right, than by an unseasonable Defence, to expose our selves to a greater Danger: Especially if that Thing or Concern of ours, upon which the Attempt is made, may be easily made amends for, or repair'd (a). Thus a Man who hath a Debt owing him from another, suppose to the Value of Ten Pounds, would act more wisely in my Judgment, if he made up the Business by any kind of Composition, than if he engag'd in a troublesome Suit, where the Lawyers Fees might exceed the main Sum which he endeavours to recover (b).

At the same time it may be observ'd, that the injur'd Party doth not owe this Patience and Moderation, to the Person from whom he receiv'd the Damage; who as far as lay in his Power, hath broke off all Duties of Humanity and Commerce with him; but to his own Security and Quiet. And therefore if a Man provok'd by Anger or Pain should happen to exceed these bounds, he does no Injury to the Provoker, but can only be said to have acted imprudently, or without sufficient Temper and Discretion.

But when by the Application of these moderate Expedients, I cannot secure my self from the impending Danger, I am then to oppose Force with Force, and am compell'd to enter the Combat. During which, if the Injurious Party continue to push on his Malicious Designs against me, and do not declare his Sorrow and Repentance for his Fault, and his Willingness to renew the Peace, I am at liberty to kill him. And altho' he do not directly attack my Life, as suppose he only attempts to load me with a great number of Blows, or to maim me by the loss of some Member not Vital, or to rob me of my Goods; yet since he hath once broke the Peace with me, and since he gives me no Caution or Security, that he will not from these lesser Injuries proceed to much greater, I may even in these Cases make use of Extremities for my own Deliverance. For at the same Instant, as a Man professes himself my Enemy (which he doth whilst he injures me, without shew of Repentance) he gives me (as far as 'tis in his Power to give it,) an Infinite Liberty of proceeding against him (c). Some indeed there are who do not approve of this Liberty of resisting in infinitum; For (say they) there can be no Natural Right of Defence and of Resistance against Injuries, but such as is consistent with that Order, which is the chief End and Design of a Social Life. Therefore in resisting by Natural Right, this Exception is always understood, unless the Social Order be infring'd by my present resisting, to which Order Nature hath the first and

Some upon the Resentment of one Affronting Word, have been cast into Banishment: They have incur'd the severest Troubles, by not being able to digest a slight Injury; and been made arrant Slaves, by their disdaining a petit Incroachment on their Liberty. See Stobæus Serm. XIX. To this may be applied the Interpretation of *Mat. chiefsel chiefest regard. And if this Caution were not interpos'd, upon our failing to maintain that necessary and Natural Order, we should render Society it self unsociable (a). But we do by no means assert, that this Infinite Liberty of resisting is to be actually made use of in all Cases; because several intervening Considerations may prevail with the Injur'd Party not to proceed to Extremities: But only that the Injurious Person cannot complain of hard measure, tho' he be repell'd with the utmost Violence and Severity. The Life of Men would be then indeed most properly rendred Insociable, if, in a Natural State, any bounds were set to the Liberty of Resistance. For what an Age of Torments should I undergo, if another Man were allow'd perpetually to lay me on only with moderate Blows, whose Malice I could not otherwise stop, or repel, than by compassing his Death? Or if a Neighbour were continually to infest me with Incurfions and Ravages upon my Lands and Possessions, whilst I could not lawfully kill him, in my Attempts to beat him off? For since the chief Aim of Human Sociableness, is the Safety of every Person, we ought not to fancy in it any such Laws, as would make every Good and Modest Man of necessity miserable, as often as any Wicked Varlet should please to violate the Law of Nature against him. And it would be highly absurd to establish Society amongst Men, on so destructive a bottom as a necessity of enduring Wrongs. Wherefore he is to be reckon'd a Foolish and Base Traytor to his own Safety, who whilst an Enemy persists in the Exercise of Hostility, vainly spares his Life, and chuses rather to Perish than to Destroy. For the Law of Nature obliges me thus far only to be mild and merciful towards my Enemy, as that if he shall express a Sorrow for what is past, and an Inclination to desist from farther Injury, shall make Retribution for my present Damage, and give Security for his not offending hereafter, I may entirely spare and pardon him, and, renewing the Peace, may perform all friendly Offices towards him, as he shall towards me (b). For meer Revenge, which proposes no Aim but the Grief or the Destruction of him who hath hurt us, is detested and discarded by Nature, as falling under the Vice of Cruelty. Whence it follows, that the Remembrance of Enmities and Contentions ought as soon as possible to be defac'd out of our Minds. On this account, as we find the Story in Tully (c), the Thebans were accus'd in the General Diet or Council of Greece, for setting up a Brazen Trophy of their Victory over the Lacedemonians; in as much as it did not become one Grecian State to fix an Eternal Monument of their Quarrel with another. For it seems, the Custom was to raise their Trophies only of Wood, to prevent their long and reproachful Continuance (d).

But farther, Persons in a Natural State may not only repel a present Danger that threatens them, but having got rid of that Fear, may pursue their Success against the Assailant, till such time as, upon sufficient Caution given, they shall think themselves secure of him for the future. Concerning which Caution, this is to be observ'd; if a Man having injur'd me, shall presently after, repenting of what he had done, desire my Pardon, and offer Reparation of the Damage, I am then oblig'd to be reconcil'd to him, and cannot fairly demand any farther Security than his Faith and Promise. For his voluntary Repentance and Application to me for Pardon, are a sufficient Argument of his firm Resolution to offer me no Wrong for the future. But he who must be brought to Repentance by main force, and who then only thinks of begging Pardon when his Strength fails him in Prosecuting his Violences; such an one is not safely to be trusted on his bare Promise: And therefore in order to our farther Security, we must either cut off from him all Power of doing Mischief, or we must lay some such Bond or Confinement on him as shall hinder him from appearing ever after formidable to us: In as much as his Malice having been once express'd, and never rightly purg'd or amended, hath rendred him a just Object of our perpetual Suspicion.

IV. But that which is a lawful Practice in Men, living under a Natural Liberty, who are to work out their Safety by their own Strength, and according to their own Judgment, can by no means be indulg'd in the Members of Civil States; and especially in regard to their dealings with their Fellow-Subjects. For against these who live under the same Government and Laws (either perpetually, or only for the time being) they ought to be so moderate in the Use of this Violent Self-defence, as then only to betake themselves to it, when the Time and Place will not admit of any Application to the Magistrate for his Assistance in repressing such an Injury, as puts either their Life, or something as valuable as their Life, or some Good which can never be repair'd, into present and manifest Danger. And even in such a Case we are, by our own Strength only, to rid our selves of the present Mischief, leaving both the Punishment, and the Caution for future Good Behaviour, entirely to the Magistrate's Determination. Cicero (a) tells us, that nothing is so contrary to Rights and Laws, as the using Force in a well order'd Commonwealth: But then 'tis his own Observation in another Place (b), that these Laws are silent, when Arms appear bent against us; and do not command us to wait for their Help and Protection, when we should most certainly suffer an unjust Violence, before we could procure a just Redress.

By these Rules and Foundations which we have laid, may be decided most of those Disputes, which are usually bandied in Authors, concerning the Measure and the Moderation of Unblameable Self-defence.

V. Some Men have rais'd a Doubt, whether supposing a Person assaults me by Mistake, without any evil design against me, and intending to employ his Force against another, I may in such a Case kill him in my own Defence. For the clearing of which Point Grotius (c) lays down this Principle to proceed upon, that the Right of Defence doth primarily and absolutely arise, from that favour of Nature, by which she hath recommended every Man most strongly to himself, whence no one can refuse to apply all his Endeavours for the Procurement of his own Safety; and not from the Injustice, or the Sin of the Aggressor. It will therefore be sufficient to render my Defence Innocent, if the Assailant have no Right to invade or to destroy me; and I lie under no Obligation of taking Death at his hands without Reluctancy or Resistance. Farther, since in the Case propos'd the Love of our own Persons and Lives must needs gain an easy Conquest over all other Considerations, it is impossible but that a Man who finds himself expos'd to equal Danger with another, must, if he follow Nature, give his own Deliverance the Preference in his Regard: And since such a Danger as we are speaking of is brought on me without my deserving it, my Fact is for that reason the less Odious, if I turn the Mischief on the Author. All this being taken for granted, 'twill be very easy to decide all those Particulars and Cases which may happen about the Point in hand. As suppose a Madman, or a Person walking in his Sleep and affrighted with some terrible Dream, should make an Attempt upon my Life; in as much as he hath no Right of assaulting me, and I have good Reason to prize my self above all things, it doth by no means appear why I should prefer his Safety to my own. But here it must necessarily be suppos'd, that I could not decline the threatned Danger any other way: Which is not so scrupulously observ'd, when a Man attacks me upon a Grudge, or upon a manifest ill Design. The same Decision will hold, in case a Soldier, fighting with Good Intentions, assaults me whom he mistakes for one of his Enemies. For if even an Enemy had a Right of resisting him, there's no reason why I, who am in no such State of Opposition, should patiently run upon his Sword: But he ought to impute it to his own Folly and Heedlessness, that he thus drives a Friend on the Necessity of an hostile Act; since he ought to have known against whom his Force was to be employ'd. The same is to be said, when a private Man lying in wait for one with whom he hath a particular Quarrel, sets upon me instead of him by mistake. For why should I upon account of the Aggressor's Blunder, be brought under a harder Condition than that other Man, whom perhaps he had some reason to hate? Such an Assailant is indeed by the Cornelian Law of Rome guilty of Murther. For tho' there was an Error in the Person, yet there was no Error in the Design; but the Will and the Attempt of committing Murther were both manifestly declar'd (d).

VI. To render the Defence of our selves entirely Innocent, it is commonly thought a necessary Condition, that, as to the time, the Danger be just upon us, or as it were in the very Point of seizing us: And that no Suspicion or Fear, whilst yet uncertain, is sufficient to justify our assaulting another. But this Assertion too will prove very unaccurate, unless we relieve it with our Distinction between a Natural and a Civil State. For as in neither Case the Point of Danger, which these Men speak of, can be understood without some Latitude, so is it most certain that Persons plac'd under a Natural Liberty are allow'd a longer Space in making their Defence by Violence, than those who live under the Protection and the Assistance of a Government.

In as much as Nature obliges us to maintain Peace with others, it may and ought to be presum'd, that every one will fulfil this Obligation, unless he give manifest Evidence of contrary Designs, and unless it be apparent that he quits his Obedience to sound Reason, which advis'd him to this Duty. But considering how prone the greatest part of Mankind are to violate this Precept of Reason, whoever hath a true Concern for his own Safety, will fortifie himself betimes by all innocent Methods of Defence; as suppose by shutting up the Avenues against such as are plotting any hostile Design; by providing Arms and all other Necessaries for offensive or defensive Force; by entering into Confederacies and Alliances; by keeping a watchful Eye upon the Motions and Attempts of others; and the like. Thus we justly esteem it Wisdom in a Commonwealth, to think of War during the full Enjoyment of Peace. And altho' Innocency will always find a strong Guard and Support in the Divine Providence, yet is it most senseless Vanity for that Man to expect Miracles from Heaven for his Deliverance, who lies still in a drowsy Idleness, and neglects all Care of his own Affairs. And even in Civil States, where our Goods are in some measure secur'd against Thieves and Ravagers, by the Severity of Penal Sanctions, he would be reckon'd a very ill Husband, who should forbear to secure his Doors in the Night, or to lock up his Closets and his Chests. To this purpose we are inform'd, that the Old Romans us'd to seal their meanest Utensils and Household Goods with their Rings, to secure them from pilfering Slaves; over whom, at the same time, they had the free Power of Life and Death (a).

But now, tho' my providing thus far for my Security can be injurious to no one, yet before I can actually assault another under colour of my own Defence, I must have Tokens and Arguments amounting to a Moral Certainty, that he entertains a Grudge against me, and hath a full design of doing me a Mischief, so that unless I prevent him, I shall immediately feel his Stroke. Amongst these Signs and Tokens, giving me a Right to make a violent Assault on another Man, I must by no means reckon his bare Superiority to me in Strength and Power; especially if that Happiness deriv'd its Increase from harmless Industry, or from the Bounty of Providence, without the Oppression of others. For 'twould be inhuman Malice to envy another, and to endeavour to take from him a Blessing which he came so fairly by. 'Tis a very gross Knack of Philosophizing that some Men have got, when they tell us by way of Advice, He that is able to hurt you, undoubtedly is willing; and therefore, without farther Warning, down with him, as you love your own Safety. This kind of Doctrine is manifestly destructive of all Sociable Commerce amongst Men; and the Authors commonly cited in Defence of it, either are such whose Character prevents their Authority, or else in the Passages alledg'd from them, they speak only of Precaution of our dealing with those Wretches, who have given us sufficient Tokens of their Resolution to hurt us (b). And whereas some Men bring Examples instead of Arguments for so base a Practice, this is to make another's Sin the Rule and Standard of my acting (c). Yet because any Man may abuse his Strength to ill Purposes, therefore, as we said before, we ought to fence against Danger by timely, and by harmless, Methods.

Nay, altho' such a Mighty Neighbour, hath shown himself to have the Will of hurting as well as the Power, he doth not yet give me directly a just Cause of setting upon him, because he doth not yet express this ill Will towards me in particular. For it is not sufficient Proof that a Man designs to hurt me, because he hath already hurt others; in as much as he might be provok'd to his attempt on them by some particular Reasons, which he doth not find against me. An Injury then done to another gives me no Licence of falling on the Aggressor, whilst I am tied to both Parties only by the Common Band of Humanity. But I may happen to be united by a more peculiar Obligation to the Injur'd Person; as if upon his Desire, I have promis'd and engag'd to assist him. For it is very agreeable to Social Nature, that a Man who hath himself receiv'd no Wrong, should yet join Forces on Covenant with another, to help him to drive off an unjust Assault, as being allied to him by those General Ties which hold together all Mankind. Because, supposing the two Parties to be otherwise indifferent to me, yet it is a standing Rule, that an Injury receiv'd ought to incline me to Favour, and an Injury offer'd, to Hatred and Aversion (d). But farther, if on good and probable Grounds I suspect that this powerful Aggressor when he hath dispatch'd his first Prey, will turn his Force upon me, and use his former Conquest for the Instrument of another; I may then more readily assist the distress'd Party, because his Preservation is likely to ensure my own Safety. As a wise Man will lend his best Help towards quenching a Fire in his Neighbour's House, when his own is the next in Danger.

More than this; if it appear by clear Tokens that a Man is at present under a real Design of hurting us, tho' he doth not yet proceed to the open Execution of it, supposing us to live in a Natural State, we may immediately enter on our own Defence by Violent Methods, and, prevent the Foe; provided that either upon a friendly Admonition he is not likely to be driven from his Hostile Intentions, or that the giving such an Admonition would prove of ill Consequence to our Affairs. For no Man is oblig'd to expect patiently the Insult of another, that he may thereby build the Justice of his Violence on the absolute Necessity of his Defence. And therefore, in this Case, he is to be accounted the Aggressor who made the first Motion towards hurting his Neighbour, or who conceiv'd the first design of Mischief, and was preparing to accomplish it, tho' the other Party using greater Expedition, may have surpriz'd and oppress'd him before he could bring his Plot to Perfection. For it is not absolutely necessary to the Notion and Business of Defence, that a Man receive the first Stroke, or that he only ward off or elude the Blows that are aim'd at him; but he too shall be interpreted to act by way of Self-Defence; who, taking his Foe tardy, hath prevented the Mischief that was hatching against him (a).

(a) Vid. Tabir. A. II. 1. (b) And as for that Saying of Cicero (Epist. Fam. XI. 28.) Even Slaves have been always allow'd this Liberty to fear according to their own Judgment, not another's; we may oppose to it the sharp return of Vibius Crispus (in Quintil. 1. 8. c. 5.) Who ever gave you Permission to fear so unreasonably? Nay, Cicero himself hath sufficiently overthrow'd this Opinion, Who (says he) ever made such an Ordinance as this, or to whom can this be granted without the manifest Danger of the whole Community, that a Man may lawfully kill him, by whom he shall pretend to fear being hereafter kill'd? Orat. pro Tull. in Quintil. 1. 5. c. 13. (c) Add. Alberic. Gentil. de Jure Belli, l. 1. c. 14. (d) For that of Exodus II. 14. only holds in a Civil State.

VII. But we must by no means allow an equal Liberty to the Members of Civil States. For here, if the Adversary be a Foreigner, we may resist and repel him any way at the instant, when he comes violently upon us: But we cannot (without the Sovereign's Command) either assault him whilst his Mischief is only in Machination, or revenge our selves upon him after he hath perform'd the Injury against us: lest we should by this rash and unwarrantable Proceeding involve our Country in an unnecessary and unseasonable War. And a much greater Degree of Caution must be us'd in our Dealings with our Fellow Subjects. For though I understand that such an one is now coming to do me a Mischief, or that he threatned me desperately in publick, this will on no account bear me out in assaulting him; but I am to inform against him before the common Magistrate, who is to require Security for his Good Behaviour. But if the Magistrate refuse to interpose, I may then consult my own Safety by what means I can with the same Freedom, as if I were plac'd under a Natural State and Condition. Those Moralists are widely mistaken, who, as Grotius (b) says, maintain, 'That I may lawfully kill, not only the Man who offers me present Violence, but him too whom I shall have discover'd to plot and conspire against me; as by Poyson, by false Accusation, false Witness, the Procurement of an unjust Sentence, or the like. Nor is the Absurdity at all lessen'd by that Restriction which they add, if either the Danger cannot otherwise be avoided, or if we are not sufficiently assur'd that it cannot. Because such a Delay of Time as is here suppos'd how short soever, may put us on many good Ways of Redress and Relief; besides the Variety of Accidents which may perhaps work our Deliverance. It is manifest, that these Authors suppose a Civil State, because in that only we can conceive such things as unjust Judgments, Accusations, Witnesses, &c. For the Suppression of which Injuries, if we permit the Subjects to inflict Death, what occasion have we for Magistrates or for Laws? No Man is in danger of being condemn'd, if he can prove the Accuser guilty of Calumny and Forgery. Yet, if being unable to make this out, he assaults his Life, 'twill be hard to excuse him from the Legal Censure and Penalty of Murther. But when a Man is already actually set upon, and reduc'd to such Streights, that he hath not Power or Opportunity to implore the Assistance of the Magistrate, or of his Neighbours, he may then make use of Extremities in repelling the Assailant: Yet the Reason and Ground of his proceeding to such Violence, must not be that he may thus revenge himself for the Injury offer'd; but only because he could not otherwise secure his Life from the imminent Danger. And therefore supposing that Danger to be more easily driven off, he cannot lawfully pursue the Aggressor, so as to strike or harm him in his Flight (c).

VIII. It appears then from these Considerations, that under Civil Governments the time of making an unblamable Self-defence, is set within very narrow Bounds, and indeed reduc'd almost to a Point or Instant, yet such as admits some small Latitude, and in which a slight Excess will escape the Magistrate's Censure. And therefore altho' an Understanding Judge will be best able to settle the Innocency of any Defence, from the Circumstances of the particular Facts: Yet we think it may be asserted in General, that the exact time when a Man may fairly destroy another in his own Defence, begins at the instant, when the Aggressor shewing plainly his design upon my Life, and being furnish'd with Strength and Weapons for the Execution, is already got into a Place whence he may perform his Mischief; Allowance being only made me for just so much Space as is necessarily requir'd for me to attack him in before he attacks me. For Example, if a Man is making towards me with a naked Sword, and with full Signification of his Intention to stab me, and I at the same time have a Gun in my hand, I may fairly discharge it at him whilst he is at a distance, and cannot yet reach me with his Weapon, because should he get too near me, my Arms would be of no use. And the same holds more strongly in Relation to Bows and Instruments of that Nature, which signifie nothing at all, unless we give them full room and space to exert their Force in. Again, suppose a Man approach me with full Design upon my Life, and is only arm'd with Pistols or the like, whilst I am furnish'd with a longer Piece, I am not oblig'd to wait till he comes within Pistol-shot, but may prevent him with my Arms before he can use his own. For this is what the Laws call to meet a danger in time, which is esteem'd much better, than to revenge it after it hath taken effect (d). The Continuance of this Time for Innocent Defence is so long as till the Aggressor either is repuls'd, or hath retreated of his own accord, whether repenting of the mischievous design in the very moment that he was performing it, or else because he sees he is like to lose his Aim; as suppose his Sword is broke, or his Piece hath mis'd Fire, or shot beside us; so that at present he can hurt us no farther, and we have an opportunity of retiring into a place of Safety. For the Revenge for past Injury, and the Caution for future Security, belong to the Care of the Magistrate, whom we are to address on those Accounts (a). Whoever, enjoying the Protection of a Civil Government, shall kill another beyond these Bounds and Conditions, under the Notion of Self-defence, cannot be acquitted as entirely Guiltless. Whence we may perceive how unreasonable the Assertion of Old Baldus is, when he declares, if a Man chance to say to me, I'll kill you where-ever I find you from hence forward, I may without incurring any Penalty; take his Life by way of Prevention, either in the midst of his Threats, or whenever I can do it with most Convenience. For tho' I be not oblig'd to wait till he perform his Threats, yet in a Commonwealth I ought to pursue other ways of Safety than by killing him: Even when it appears from the former Course of his Life, that that he is not backward in making good such bold Resolutions; which condition is by some Authors added to mitigate Baldus's Opinion.

IX. As to the common Determination, that this killing a Man in our own Defence is then only Innocent, when we cannot possibly escape the Danger by other means; this is not to be interpreted in too strict a Sense, but admits of a reasonable Latitude upon account of that Perturbation of Mind which arises from so surprising and so imminent a Mischief. For it is scarce possible that a Man under so terrible Apprehension should be so exact in considering and discovering all ways of escape, as he who being set out of danger can sedately deliberate on the Case. Hence, as it is meer Rashness for me to come out of a safe Hold to him who challenges me, so if another assault me in an open place, I am not strictly oblig'd to betake myself to flight, unless there be near at hand a Place of most secure Refuge, nor am I always bound to draw back from the Onset. Because I then turn my defenceless parts to the Danger, and there is great hazard of tripping or falling; and besides, when I have once quitted my Posture of Guard, 'tis not very easy to recover myself. Neither doth it render my Defence blameable, if I chose to run the Hazard of such Accidents rather than omit such Business, which was either a part of my Duty, or which however I had a Liberty of acting. As suppose, whilst I am going to any publick Place, about my Affairs, I kill a Man that sets upon me in the way, I am not the less Innocent, because if I had staid at home the thing had not happen'd. For the publick Security would be ill guarded, and our Liberty would stand us in little stead, if we might not make use of it in opposing those sudden Violences which others offer us, out of pure Malice and wicked Design.

There is no need of proving Balsaron's Distinction (b) to be ridiculous; A Man (says he) who kills another in his own Defence, is free from all Guilt, if the other Person had first given him a Mortal Wound, or the like Mischief; but if the Hurt that was first offer'd him be slight and curable, the Slaughter of the Aggressor is then unjust, and he must answer for the Fact.

Much more pleasant is their Nicety, who make it a Question, Whether an Equality of Weapons be necessary to the rendering a Defence Innocent. As if the Aggressors were so Generous, as constantly to give Notice to the other Party of their Design, and of the Arms they purpos'd to make use of; that they might have Leisure to furnish themselves in like manner for the Combat. Or as if in these Rencounters we were to act on our Defence by the strict Rules of the Common Sword Plays and Tryals of Skill, where the Champions and their Weapons are nicely match'd and measur'd for our better Diversion.

But it must be observ'd on this Head, that the Plea of Self-defence shall not excuse or indemnify him, who being challeng'd to meet in the way of Duel, doth by so appearing put himself into such a Condition, that he must either kill or be kill'd. For in the Estimation of such a Fact, the Danger will not be consider'd, since the Laws forbid him to meet it; and therefore he will not only be guilty of Manslaughter, but will stand obnoxious to those other Penalties which are particularly ordain'd against the Custom of Duelling.

X. There is one Enquiry commonly made farther on this Point, and that is whether it be lawful for a Man to kill another, who comes upon him not with a Design to take away his Life, but only to Maim him; provided the Danger cannot be otherwise avoided. And here as to a Natural State we may safely hold the Affirmative Side of the Question. For Nature hath inspir'd us with so tender a Care to preserve our Bodies whole and entire, that we cannot but make use of all Ways and Methods for that purpose; and the Loss of one Member, especially if it be of the most noble kind, is reckon'd almost equal to the Loss of Life itself. Besides Death is frequently the Consequence of such Barbarous Treatment; and I have no Security but that the Villain will proceed to greater Mischief. Lastly, as we have heretofore hinted, such an Attempt declares a Man my open Enemy, and consequently gives me a Licence in infinitum, of acting against him.

Nor do the Laws even in Civil Governments seem to engage the Subjects to such hard Conditions, as that they must rather suffer them-

elves to be maim'd, than use Extremities in repelling the Assailant: For since such a Degree of Patience surpasses the Ordinary Strength and Constancy of Mankind, 'twould look very rigid to require it, only in favour of a Malicious Rogue. But when such an Injury is once actually receiv'd, the Prosecution of the Malefactor is to be left entirely to the Magistrate.

XI. The Defence of Chastity is in almost all Nations esteem'd equal to the Defence of Life, and doth in the same manner excuse the Slaughter of those who attempt it. The reason of this Favour is grounded on the Natural Consideration that the Honour of Women is their chief Treasure and Ornament; together with the respect had to the Weakness of the Fair Sex, which 'twas convenient should be guarded by all possible means from Violence and Abuse (a). Even in Civil States, as the Legislators might very reasonably appoint Capital Punishments for Offences of this kind, so they might farther give a Liberty to all Honest Women, to use Extremities in their own Defence, upon Danger of losing what 'tis impossible for them to recover, and for which no Reparation can be made them (1). Amongst the Jews, as Mr. Selden (b) tells us, a Man was allow'd to kill another, not only in his own Defence, but in the Defence of a third Person if unjustly assaulted, whether with regard to Life, or to Chastity of either kind (c). And thus the Sentence of C. Marius was highly applauded amongst the Romans, when he not only absolv'd, but crown'd the Soldier who had kill'd his Nephew a Tribune, or Colonel in the Army, for solliciting him to an Unnatural Debauch (d). St. Augustine (e) hath a Saying, that the Holiness, or Purity of the Body is never lost, whilst the Purity of the Mind remains, tho' the Body suffer Violence (f). But it follows no more from hence, that forcible Ravishers are not to be repell'd with Extremities, than that because a Good Man is translated by Temporary Death to Eternal Happiness, therefore he ought not to defend himself with Violence against a Villain who attempts his Life.

'Tis observable what Lysias (g) reports, that the Attick Laws decreed a severer Punishment against him who perswaded a Woman into an Unchast Compliance, than against him who compell'd her by meer Force. The Reason we find subjoin'd, because (says he) Man who commits a Violent Rape is suppos'd to be hated by whom he abuses. Whereas those who by Flattery and Insinuations tempt Women to their Desires, do by this means gain a greater Interest and Authority with them than their own Husbands, and consequently have the whole Family in their Power and Disposal: besides the Inconvenience of confounding the Childrens Birth, and hindring all Distinction between those who came lawfully, and those who came unlawfully into the World (h).

XII. 'Tis another famous Question, whether the Danger of receiving a Box of the Ear, or some such ignominious tho' slight Injury, will excuse the killing of a Man in our own Defence. And Grotius's Decision (i) makes it not to be repugnant to Expletive Justice. The Sense of which Expression is this, that since Expletive Justice is equally violated by denying one that which he had a perfect Right to possess, or by bringing somewhat on him which he had likewise a perfect Right not to suffer, when a Person is kill'd for offering an Injury of this Nature, there can be no Complaint made that a Breach of Expletive Justice hath been committed upon him. For he who first makes an Attempt of any Mischief against another, retains no Right why the other should not proceed to Extremities in returning it; or, (what comes to the same thing) gives the other an Infinite Right of opposing him; tho' other Considerations may frequently hinder the injur'd Party from a full and rigorous use of this Right. Nor will it signify any thing to object, that in such Returns that Equality is neglected, which Justice commonly requires. For that Equality is chiefly concern'd with the Exchanges of things, and the distribution of common Goods. But Evils, which by way of War are mutually offer'd, cannot be exactly reduc'd to any such measure, nor is it necessary they should. As for Grotius's Remark, that the Degree of hurting in War should be stated according to the manner of Restitution and Reparation in Civil Damages, there is good Reason for this Limitation to it, as nearly as we can: And then that Moderation doth not arise from any Right inherent in the Enemy, but from the Generosity and Courage of the Victor. Grotius adds, that Charity doth not of it self require our patiently suffering such an Affront, in favour of the Person who offer'd it; tho' the Doctrine of the Gospel doth indeed forbid the Repulse of such Attempts by violent means.

For our parts, we have already shown, that in a Natural State, a Man cannot be requir'd to bear even a slight Injury, (especially if it be continued) without endeavouring even by the utmost Violence, to keep it off. And we read that the most Holy King David, for an Affront put upon his Ambassadors, rais'd a War, to almost the utter Ruine of a Nation (a).

But 'tis very doubtful, whether in Members of a Civil State, the same violent Procedure is excusable. It is indeed in common Judgment a most high Affront to receive a Box on the Ear, and the Reason of this Opinion amongst many of us Europeans, seems to be, because we treat our Servants in this manner, and other Inferiours plac'd under our Discipline. And hence 'tis a Custom in some Places, when Persons are first allow'd the Use of Arms, or come out of their Apprenticeship, and the like, to give them a Box on the Ear in formal manner, to put them in mind of their former Condition, and to let them understand, that they are above such Treatment for the future. Therefore to offer such an Affront, highly disgraces the Sufferer, and supposes him to be unworthy of bearing Arms, or of being reckon'd amongst Free and Grown Men. But here we must observe, that such a Blow never appears ignominious and disgraceful, but when it is given before the other Party prepares for Resistance: For thus Slaves and Children are beat without the Liberty of Opposition. Therefore those who fall by mutual Consent to Fifty-Cuffs, and deal freely with each others Face and Head, can on neither side complain of an Injury of this affronting Nature. Nor is it easy to conceive how a Man that bears Arms, and is preparing to use them for his Defence, can be capable of receiving a Blow under the same Notion and Aggravation of Contempt. Beside 'tis a great Mistake, to fancy that a Man's Honour is really impair'd by such a Trifle; for Honour would be a most fragile and a most precarious Good, if 'twere in the Power of every saucy Fellow to diminish and to infringe it. And as for the Contempt which is shown in such an Action, this may be either quite taken off, or however easily repair'd by the Magistrate, by setting a heavy Fine on the Offender, and by enjoining him farther to perform in Publick some Marks of Honour and Respect to the Person whom he hath injur'd. Nor is the Vulgar Notion of any Weight, which fancies the Courage of Men, and especially of Soldiers, to be indamag'd in its Character by the receiving these kinds of Affronts; and that therefore their Credit must be vindicated by Sword and Duel. For that Man shows sufficient Testimonies of his Courage, who bravely maintains and discharges the Office assign'd him by the State. And there are much more noble and more shining Occasions of exercising Valour, than, contrary to the Laws of Reason and of our Country, to pursue an immoderate Passion, or to engage in the Hazard of an unnecessary and unprofitable Combat. Yet if, as it commonly falls out, upon the offering of such an Injury, Swords are immediately drawn, and the Man who thus began the Fray happens to be kill'd, or desperately wounded; 'tis reasonable that the other Party should have his Penalty mitigated, upon account of the high Provocation. But 'tis an intolerable Paradox which some maintain, that a Man may fairly kill another not only to avoid an Affront of this kind, but for the Recovery of his Honour after the Affront has been actually given, and the Party who offer'd it is fled.

We may add to these Observations, that tho' the Rate and Estimation of things is not to be determin'd by the Multitude, but by the Judgement of Wise Men, yet if in any State the Receipt of some particular Injury is attended with extraordinary Scandal and Disgrace, there ought to be a most severe Punishment ordain'd against Delinquents in this Point; in as much as all Men have not Philosophy enough to put up these provoking Indignities; and because it would be inconsistent with the Characters and Stations which some Men are to maintain in the Commonwealth, should they be expos'd to the Contempt and Derision of the meanest Subjects. The Magistrate then hath little Reason to be angry, if neglecting or refusing to give redress in Complaints on this Score, a Man asserts his own Honour by what means he can, tho' only in regard to the Opinion of the Vulgar, since the same Opinion would otherwise load him with so much Reproach. Therefore those Governours who would effectually suppress all Duels and Private Combats, ought to enact the most grievous Penalties against those who shall offer such a Blow or other Affront, as is reckon'd ignominious in the Opinion of the particular Country. For the course and manner of Civil Life will not bear that refin'd Philosophy of Grotius; since Honour is no more than an Opinion of Excellence, and the Sufferer of such an Injury shows himself excellently Patient, his Honour is rather increas'd than impair'd (b).

XIII. From what hath been said it may likewise be understood, whether in cases of Assault, a Man is oblig'd, if he can conveniently, to betake himself to flight, so as that the Slaughter of the Assailant is never justifiable under a Possibility of running from him. Now here it is plain, that in a State of Nature, the Aggressor hath no Right, by which the other Party is bound to decline his Violence in this manner rather than oppose it. And the Reason why a Man (under this Natural Condition) sometimes chuses rather to fly than fight, is not out of any favour to him who sets upon him, but because he thinks it most convenient for his own Affairs (c). Distinct Nations and Kingdoms are set, we know, in this Natural State towards each other: And who will ever maintain, that when one King unjustly invades the Realm of another, the injur'd Prince is oblig'd to save himself if possible by flying; for fear he should kill some of his Enemies by making Resistance?

But under Civil Governments, we are to fly, if we can with Convenience, rather than take away the Assailant's Life. Nor can such a flight be at all Base or Unworthy of a Man at Arms; in as much as it is not undertaken out of Cowardice or Neglect of Duty; and because Reason can never think this a fit occasion of exerting my Valour, when I only kill a Fellow-Subject without any necessity, from whom the Magistrate could have sufficiently secur'd me. We added this Restriction, if we can with Convenience, because (as hath been already hinted in part) we are not always oblig'd to retreat and to turn our Backs, since we thus expose our selves to a greater danger of Wounds and Mischiefs, as well as to the additional one of Falling; and since a Man who hath once betaken himself to his Heels, if he meet with a Stop, or if the Aggressor happen to overtake him, cannot easily recover himself into a Posture of Defence. Therefore in case there be not a place of safe Refuge near at hand, he doth not transgress the bounds of Innocent Self-defence, who opposes an Assailant Breast to Breast, rather than he will lay himself open to his Violence, by running off on a Disadvantage.

Lastly, Grotius hath done well to censure those Authors, who allow that we may lawfully kill a Man who hath said any such thing of us, as we think will injure our Repute and Character with good Men. For, if the Man hath spoken false, have we not many more convenient ways of wiping off the Calumny? And if he hath said nothing but Truth, must we study the Concealment of one Sin by the Commission of another? How much better is Plato's Law, If a Man kill a Slave who hath not injur'd him, only out of fear he should discover some base Action, or on the like account; he shall undergo the same Penalty as if he had murder'd a Free Subject or Citizen?

XIV. All this seems plainly enough deducible from Reason. But many raise a Scruple about these Doctrines, in regard to the peculiar Temper and Genius of Christianity, asserting that altho' it be indeed lawful to kill a Man who unjustly attempts our Life, yet 'tis an Action more Praise-worthy to lose our own Life in such a case, than to take his. Because he thus dying in the Commission of a Mortal Sin, incurs the Danger of Damnation: And that it is not consistent with Justice to rid our selves of a less Evil, by bringing a greater on another Man. Now, though the Solution of this Difficulty doth not properly fall under our Business; yet, we think the Maintainers of this high Notion would do well to consider, that in the Consternation of Danger, and in the Heat of Fighting, a Man hath little leisure for a nice Reflection on such Reasons; in as much as all his Thoughts and Faculties are taken up with consulting how to save him from present Death. Again, the Person who is thus assaulted is not always so well prepar'd as not to need some farther time for composing his Mind and Conscience, and for making up his Bundles before he takes his long Journey, as Varro speaks. Besides it doth not appear very probable, that I ought in this case to be more solicitous for the Soul of the other Man, than he himself is: And therefore if he neglecting this great Concern invade my Life, ought I to pay so precious and irrecoverable a Ransom, for rescuing him from one Danger of incurring so sad a State (a)? For it is very doubtful whether, if I should now spare him to my own Ruine, he would not, for all my Charity, still deserve and still meet with the same terrible Sentence. 'Tis a Maxim vulgarly known, that no regard is to be had to such a Danger as a Man throws himself into by his own Default, and from which he may deliver himself if he pleases. Now in the case before us, provided he draw off or forbear to treat me in this injurious manner, the Danger to which he exposes his Soul, ceases as to the present matter. And doth not this Opinion allow greater Favour and Indulgence to Wickedness, than to Goodness, whilst it makes the former, as it were, Sacred and Inviolable? For according to such Rules, the most holy and vertuous Men would be always oblig'd to yield their Throats to Villains and Murderers, lest, by resisting, they should send them immediately on their Road to Hell (b). That Saying of our Saviour, in which he commands us to love our Neighbour as our selves (c), seems not so fitly to be interpreted of the Degree of Love, as of the Truth and Sincerity; in as much as no Man dissembles or counterfeits a Passion towards himself. And that Phrase, As thy self, looks like a Proverbial Speech, importing a sincere and hearty Kindness (c). But should we take the Expression in the highest Sense, it would scarce follow, that supposing the Love of our selves and of our Neighbour not capable (in some Instance) of being answer'd both together, the former ought to yield to the latter (d). Nor are the Proofs which we find sometimes alledg'd from Exodus XXIII. 4, 5. and Deuteronomy XXII. 4. sufficient to evince, that the Love of our Neighbour ought to take place before our own real Advantage. For it cannot thence be gather'd, that we are first to help our Neighbour's Beast out of the Ditch, if our own be in the same Condition; or that we are oblig'd to give such an Assistance, when the Business we must neglect for that good Office, is of more Consequence, than the thing we thus endeavour to save or rescue for another. And besides all this, it may very fairly be question'd, whether a Person who assaults us in a violent manner, ought to keep the Title of a Neighbour, as the Word seems to be meant in our Saviour's Command (a).

Lactantius (b) hath censur'd Tully for describing a Good Man to be one that doth Good to as many as possible, and that hurts no Body unless provok'd. O what a most excellent and a most true Sentence (says the Father,) hath he spoil'd by the Addition of two Words! For what occasion had he to say unless Provok'd? If a Good Man may thus hurt another when he is provok'd, the very offering that hurt, will make him lose his Character and Name: It not being less Evil to return an Injury, than at first to give it. For whence arise all the Contentions and the Combats which we behold amongst Men, unless from this Miscarriage, that Impatience opposing Wickedness occasions so many Tempests in the World? Whereas, if in opposing the same Wickedness we would make use of Patience, than which there is no truer Vertue, and none more worthy of Human Nature, we should as effectually extinguish the ill Design, as if we were pouring Water upon Fire. But indeed, as the Impatience of the Injur'd Party is frequently the occasion of unnecessary Combats, which might with Convenience have been avoided; so on the other hand, Patience is not always infallible in the Cure of Malice and Villany. Nor doth the Vertue, which under that Name is so highly recommended to Christians, equally oblige us to the putting up all Injuries promiscuously, without Difference and Distinction (1). He that defends himself in a Lawful manner, doth not act directly for the Hurt of another, but for his own preservation: And he who repels a Wrong is not Injurious, but he who offers it. 'Tis one thing to exercise an unblameable Defence, and another thing to prosecute an unmerciful Revenge. The latter may be as great a Sin as the first Offer of an Injury, but the former can never fall under so hard a Censure.

But farther, those who maintain that in Cases of this Nature it is more commendable to be kill'd, than to kill, add this Exception, Unless the Party assailed be a more useful Person than the Assailant. As if it were always possible for me under the Apprehension of so imminent Danger, to weigh my Abilities nicely with those of the other Man, and to determine whether the World would have more occasion for his Service than for mine. This is beyond Dispute, that he on whom the Safety of many depends, and whose Office or Duty it is to keep off Violence from others, ought not to resign his own Life for the sparing an unjust Invader; tho' he should be of so mild a Disposition as with Piso in Tacitus (c) to think it as great a Misery to kill another as to die himself. And the Reason is evident, because by throwing himself away, he betray'd the Safety of so many other Persons. This is the Case of those who accompany Travellers by way of Guards; as likewise of Princes, of Generals, and other Commanders, whose Deaths are usually attended with so wide a Ruine, and to whom we may apply that Saying of Lucan;

Pendeat, & tantus caput hoc sibi fecerit orbis,
Sevitia est voluisse mori.*——

Since one Dear Life ensures and guards us all,
And with the World's great Head, the World must fall,

'Twere Cruelty to court your Fate (d).

But it cannot be hence inferr'd, that supposing a Man to have the Lives of none or of very few depending on him, such an one may not fairly kill an Assailant, who is perhaps of more Service to the Publick, or in whose Life the Interest of more Persons are concern'd. For at this rate, a Man who is either Unmarried or without Children, must in no case kill an Invader, who hath a Family, for fear his Wife and Children should be left desolate and in want. But if the Affection and Concern for these Relations could not hinder the Injurious Party from attempting his Villany, what Reason hath the other Person to give his own Life for the Prevention of their Misfortune and Trouble?

Plato in his System of Laws (e) hath been very nice and exact on this Point. If the Life of a Son (says he) be attempted by his Parents, did ever any Law allow him in such a Case to kill those who gave him Being, although in his own Defence? So far from this, that he is oblig'd and commanded to suffer all Extremities rather than to engage in so unnatural a Deed. But if upon account of a Tumult or Sedition, or the like occasion, a Brother kills his Brother, to preserve himself from his Violence and Assault, he shall be equally guiltless as if he had slaughter'd an Enemy. As for the Additional Clause, If a Slave in his own Defence kill a Free Man, he shall be obnoxious to the same Penalties as a Parricide, this was not the Fault of the Law-giver, but of the Age.

XV. From what hath been observ'd on this Head it appears, that a Slaughter committed within the just Bounds of Self-Defence, doth not taint the Author with any real Blemish or Guilt, and consequently doth not render him obnoxious to any Punishment: and that it is not to be rank'd amongst those Actions, which, tho' they are in themselves sinful, yet Human Laws favour with Impunity, upon account of the violent and almost unavoidable Transports of Passion: As when they allow the Husband to kill the Adulterer (a). If therefore in any Places some Penalty or Expiation hath been enjoin'd the Actors of just Slaughter, it either belong'd not to the Case of Innocent Defence, or it was introduc'd without any true ground or reason: or lastly, it might be applied for the making Men understand how heinous a Crime it was to kill unjustly, when the killing even upon a just account stood in need of some Satisfaction. Philo the Jew, in his Life of Moses, tells us, he commanded the Priest to perform a solemn Purgation, on those who return'd fresh from the Slaughter of their Enemies; because though the Laws did by no means forbid such Attempts, yet he who kills a Man tho' by Compulsion, and in repelling an Injury, seems to contract some Stain, upon account of the near Relation which Mankind bear to one another, being all deriv'd originally from the same Head. And this therefore was the reason of the Ceremony, to take off the very Appearance and Shadow of Guilt. As for the Benefit of the Asylums or Places of Refuge and Sanctuary, a Man who preserv'd his own Life by the Death of an Assailant, seems to have had no occasion for these Reliefs; but only he who had been the Author of another's Death by an involuntary Stroke, yet such as upon exact Care and Diligence he might have forborn and avoided. That Place in the first of the Chronicles, Chap. XXIX. ver. 3. doth not belong to the Case of Self-defence; and the Building of a Temple seems to have been forbidden David, not so much because he had gather'd any Pollution by his Slaughters in War, as because he who had acquir'd sufficient Honour to himself by Martial Atchievements, ought not to have robb'd his Son of such an occasion of growing Glorious by the Works of Peace. The Scholiast on the Orestes of Euripides informs us, that 'twas an ancient Custom amongst the Grecians, for those who kill'd any one upon a just Reason, immediately to show their Weapons to the Sun for a Token of their Innocence; as desiring him to be Witness of the Fact, who, in their Opinion, over-look'd and over-heard all things. And besides this Formality, they applied some Means of Expiation, and were oblig'd to undergo one Year's Banishment (b). And we learn farther from Demosthenes, and from the Scholiast on Aristophanes, that at Athens when a Man had kill'd another, and pleaded to have done it justly, the Cause was tried in a peculiar Court, call'd the Delphinian, with Allusion to the Oracle of Apollo at Delphi. Amongst the Ethiopians, whoever had slain a Man involuntarily, quitted his Country till such time as the Gymnosophists had purg'd him by their Ceremonies (c). And we find Aeneas in Virgil declaring in Reference to the Holy Reliques,

Abluero.*

In me 'tis impious Holy things to bear,
Red as I am with Slaughter, new from War:
Till in some living Stream I cleanse the Guilt.
Mr. Dryden.

In the 18th Canon of the Council of Nantes held under Formosus, we have this nice Injunction; If a Man by accident, and unwillingly hath been Author of another's Death, let him repent forty days with Bread and Water; when this Course is over, let him for two Years be separated from the Congregation of the Faithful, and let him neither communicate nor offer. After the Space of two Years, let him offer with the Congregation, but not communicate. At the end of the five Years, let him be receiv'd to full Communion, but let his Abstinence from Meats continue at the Discretion of the Priest. Yet neither doth this Canon touch the Case of Defence, nor can it well be vindicated from too much Rigour. Thus too what we meet with in the Laws of the Lombards (d), seems not capable of being extended to the Business in hand, or if it be, may deservedly fall under the Censure of unreasonable Severity. De Mornay (e) tells us, that 'tis religiously observ'd by the Judges in France, scarce ever to absolve Persons in Causes of this Nature, without enjoining them at the same time to bestow

And the Reason he gives is this; Because whatsoever Persons we fight for against our Enemies, to rescue them from Injury or Affront, for the sake of the same Persons the Law permits us to kill even Friends, if they offer them any unjust Violence. For since Enemies and Friends are to be judg'd and distinguish'd by their Actions, those that practice Hostility, we may prosecute in an Hostile manner. Amongst the Persians he that kills the Adulterer and the Adulterers at the same time, is presented with a new Garment as a Reward of his Service to the State. peculiar Largeſſes upon the Poor, and ſometimes to be at the Charges of Chriſtian Sacrifices or Propitiations for the Soul of the Party kill'd. And tho' the latter part of this Cuſtom ſmells too much of Superſtition; yet every good Man hath reaſon to be deeply afflicted and concern'd, when he is put under the Neceſſity of depriving Another of Life, by any ſuch unfortunate Means.

XVI. Indeed, the Defence of Life, of Limbs, and of Chaſtity, as of Irreparable Goods, admits ſo large a Degree of Favour, as to ſtand exempted from one of the Poſitive Divine Laws, and to be conſtrued as no Breach of the Sabbath (a): For thoſe who maintain'd the contrary Opinion are not without reaſon ſcouted by Plutarch and Agatharchis, as Joſephus obſerves in his Antiquities (b). And therefore 'tis ſtrange that the ſame Author in his firſt Book againſt Appion, ſhould celebrate as worthy of all Commendation that Act of the Jews which we read of in the Hiſtory of the Maccabees, whiſt reſuſing to make Reſiſtance on the Sabbath Day, they prefer'd this Command of God, to their own Lives, and to the Liberty of their Country: Unleſs he is to be underſtood as rather praizing the Good Intention, than the Deed it ſelf.

But in Reference to the Defence of things or Goods, which as they may be reſtor'd or compensated, ſo they ſeem not all of them abſolutely neceſſary to Man's Happineſs, it will bear a Diſpute whether theſe may be preſerv'd and ſecur'd by the Uſe of Extremities (c). The Judgment and the Cuſtom of all Nations is manifeſt in this Point, whiſt they allow Men to fight for their Goods and Poſſeſſions even to the Slaughtering of thoſe who wrongfully invade them. It is plain likewiſe, that moſt War is engag'd in, not for the ſake of deſtroying Men's Lives, but of winning their Lands or their Wealth. And it would be reckon'd a very pleaſant Humour in an Enemy, if to hinder himſelf from being oppos'd by violent means, he ſhould make Profeſſion, that he came not to kill but to rob. Thus much therefore is certain, that he who is kill'd in the Attempt of plundering or of waſting another Man's Goods, hath no Injury done him: Though in other reſpects, thoſe Goods do not bear an equal Proportion to the Life of a Man. For in a Natural State, he who offers any kind of Injury with a malicious Intent, immediately becomes an Enemy; and then he can have no Right inherent in himſelf to forbid the uſe of the utmoſt Extremities againſt him. And ſince another hath no more Right to invade my Poſſeſſions than to aſſault my Life, I have certainly an equal Licence and Power to defend them both. Beſides, ſince Life cannot be preſerv'd without a Competency of Goods, he that goes about to rob me of theſe, doth by Conſequence endeavour to deprive me of that. And indeed, it is clearly evident, that the Security and Peace of Society and of Mankind could very hardly ſubſiſt, if a Liberty were not granted to repel by the moſt violent Courſe, thoſe who come to pillage our Goods, for which Men have commonly a very hearty Love and Concern.

Thoſe who have tormented themſelves in maintaining the more rigid ſide of the Queſtion, build chiefly on two Suppoſitions; firſt, that a juſt Punishment ought always to be ſo equal to the Crime, that the guilty Perſon be not depriv'd of a greater Good than what he attempted to hurt or to deſtroy in another. The Falſeneſs of which, we ſhall elſewhere make out. Secondly, that the Hurts which we offer to an unjuſt Invader in Defence of our ſelves and of our Poſſeſſions, are Punishments in a proper Senſe, and conſequently ought to be ſtated by the Rules of Vindicative Juſtice. But this Hypotheſis is no truer than the former. For all Punishment proceeds from a Superiour againſt a Subject by Virtue of his Sovereign Right; and the degree of it is meaſur'd with reſpect to the Publick Good. But Defence is a thing of more ancient date than any Civil command, and chiefly takes place amongſt thoſe, neither of whom are ſubject to the other; and is moderated with regard to our own Safety, and to the Neceſſity of Self-preſervation. Indeed amongſt thoſe who live under the ſame Civil Government, the Liberty of Natural Defence is very much reſtrain'd. Becauſe the inward Tranquility of a State could not ſubſiſt, if the Subjects were to return Hoſtilities to each other, for every Injury or Affront. The Members then of a Community may ſo far only make uſe of Violent Defence, as it is not taken off or forbidden by the Genius of Civil Society, or by the Laws of the State. And the Laws of moſt Places, tho' they allow one Subject to repel another who invades him, by offering a greater Evil, than the Invader deſign'd againſt him (d); yet according to the regular Courſe of Proceeding, they would not have private Perſons apply Extremities, in oppoſing ſuch Injuries as are levell'd only againſt things that may be re-

(d) Such was the Athenian Law mention'd by Demosthenes (adverſ. Aristocrat.) ordaining, that he who kill'd another in defence of Goods, which this other Perſon was taking or carrying off by Violence, ſhould not be chargeable with any Guilt.

stor'd or repair'd. In as much as such Reparation or Restitution may easily be procur'd by the help of Government; whereas when there is no Government to interpose, Men cannot be forc'd to make Requitals, but by War. There is no need then of being so solicitous with Grotius (a) to make up the Inequality between the thing invaded and the Life of the Invader, by our Favour to the Defendant, and our Hatred and Rigour against the Guilty Party. Unless we join with Bœcler in his Explanation of the Place, and say no more than this, that since in a Cause or Action of this kind, it is generally very difficult to determine what was done within and what beyond the due Bounds, it is not repugnant to Nature, that we turn our Favour on the side of the Person who suffer'd or was likely to suffer, the Damage, and our Hatred upon the Plunderer or Thief; that is, when the Case is doubtful we may fairly pardon in the former the Death of the latter. In Civil States therefore it is sufficient, that a Man do not exceed the Limits of Defence, appointed by the Laws of his Country. And yet if he should transgress these Measures, he doth no Injury to the Invader, but only is guilty of a Breach of Civil Law. But it may be ask'd farther, whether it is not at least a Sin against Charity, to kill one who comes to plunder us of a Reparable Good. In answer to which, it is our Judgment, that Charity towards one who professes Hostility against us, takes place only so long as we have probable hopes of bringing him by this means to Repentance and to Peace. But when these Hopes appear fruitless, he that spares his Enemy, betrays himself. Or if at any time my Reason persuades me, that a thing of little and despicable Value is not to be defended with the same Eagerness and Violence, I forbear, in this case, not for the sake of the Robber or Invader, but partly because I would not give my self so much Trouble about a matter of so slight Concern, and partly because I would not seem Narrow-spirited and Covetous, by resenting to so desperate a height, so inconsiderable a Damage.

XVII. It may be proper for us on the present occasion, to reflect on that most noble Lawgiving Licence to kill a Night-Robber, but not one that comes in the Day-time; which we read in Exodus XXII. 2. and which hath been so often imitated in the Grecian and the Roman Constitution (b). Now the Reason of such Distinction we take to be this, that in the Day we may easily seize the Thief and recover our Goods; whereas in the Night, he may slip from the House undiscover'd; it being difficult to know him in the dark; or if one Person should chance to have a Knowledge of him, yet this will not convict him, unless, which cannot be done without great Trouble, more Witnesses are call'd out of their Beds. But in this Opinion, there is one thing which startles most Men, and puts them to some Loss and Difficulty; for they are apt to argue thus, since the Laws which make this Allowance do not decree a Capital Punishment against Robbers, it looks like an Absurdity, that private Persons should be indulg'd with a Licence of proceeding farther in these Cases, than the Sovereign Power thinks proper for it self to do. In answer to which it may be observ'd, that all those Laws concerning the Punishment of Thieves, do suppose the things stolen to be restor'd or compensated, upon the Apprehension of the Felon. And in order to this, they judg'd the giving of two-fold, or sometimes of four-fold to be sufficient; according to the different Customs of particular

(a) L. 2. c. 1. f. 11. (b) Thus the Law of Solon recited by Demosthenes, (contra Timocrat.) If any one, in the Day-time, steal above Fifty Drachmæ, all Persons are empower'd to bring him before the Court of the Eleven. But if he steal in the Night, whatever the Value be, it shall be allowable, either to bring him before the Judges, or to pursue, and wound, or kill him. For which, Ulpian the Rhetorician, gives this Reason, In the Day we may call for Assistance, which in the Night cannot so well be had. So Plato de LL. 1. 9. He that kills a Thief entering his House in the Night shall be blameless. The same we find in the Roman Twelve Tables. Though as to this, Caius (1. 4. f. 1. D. ad L. Aquil.) affirms, that the Roman Law doth indeed permit a Man to kill the Night-Thief; but then it obligeth him to give Notice of it by crying out. The latter part of which Assertion, Jac. Godefredus (ad LL. 6. Tali) observes to be a Specimen of Tribonian's Mild Disposition, in as much as that there was no such Clause originally in the XII. Tables appears from Cicero Orat. pro Milon. The XII. Tables, says Cicero, allow the killing of the Night-Thief by any Means possible, but the Day-Thief only if he defend himself with his Weapon. M. Senec. 1. 10. Controv. ult. The Law which permits the killing of the Night-Thief any way possible, doth not speak of him as condemned, but as surpriz'd in the Fact. Gell. 1. 11. c. ult. when he reports that Draco made Theft Capital, and Solon only Double Restitution; adds, that the Roman Decemviri took the middle way between the Severity of the former, and the Mildness of the latter; then only permitting a Thief, taken in the Act, to be kill'd, if either the thing happen'd in the Night; or if, being the Day-time, he defended himself with his Arms against the Discoverer. As for the Sign of Crying out, the XII. Tables requir'd it only in the Case of the Day-Thief when he fought in his own Defence. Si luci furtum faxint, si se relo defensint, quiritato, endoq; plorato: Post deinde si casti esint, se fraude esto. Comp. 1. 3. S. D. ad L. Aquil. where the Term æque is mollified by Tribonian. Yet it is not improbable, that in Course of time, and upon the Authority of Wise Men, that ancient Law was plainly mitigated, as Cujacius allows, 1. 14. Observ. 15. This appears from Ulpian, 1. 5. ad Edict. whose Words are fully recited in the Comparison of the Jewish and Roman Laws, first publish'd by Peter Pitheus. Which are main'd as we have them in 1. 5. D. ad L. Aquil. (Add. 1. 9. D. ad L. Cornel. de Sicar.) The reason of which Alteration perhaps might be, that it was a Practice sometimes with Villains to rush out of their Houses and murder Persons, and then pretend that they found them in the Act of Thievery. As likewise, because Houses which are strongly built, and stand thick together, cannot easily be robb'd without the Master's Negligence; or at least cannot afford Rogues so frequent Opportunities. Comp. Justin. 1. 2. c. 2. f. 9. Whence Cujacius conjectures, that the said Law as by 1. 1. C. quando hic unicuique, was abrogated in Towns and Cities, and only allow'd to hold good in the Country. Though indeed this Order which he cites, doth not speak of Thieves who make their Attempts in Privacy and Silence; but of violent Robbers and open Assailants; as appears from the Reason subjoin'd, that they may meet the Death which they threatened, and incur that which they design'd against others. Sextus Calicius in Gell. 1. 20. c. 1. explains this Law of the XII. Tables falsely, when he makes it relate to the insidious Violence of Nightly Murderers.

Commonwealths. But it doth not hence follow, that therefore the same Laws in Cases where Reparation was not to be had, could not furnish the Subject with some larger Power taken out of the Stock of Natural Liberty. For the Law-givers of Kingdoms and Republicks have not always thought it necessary, in ordaining Penalties for Offences, to take their Standard from what in a State of Nature the Right of War allow'd to be done. Thus there are some States in the World where Adultery is not a Capital Crime; And yet the Husbands are Indemnified if they kill the Adulterers, upon surprizing them in the Act. Now supposing Men to be plac'd in a Natural Liberty, the Performance, or the very Offer of an Injury to their Bed, is plainly a sufficient Cause of War, and how far the Licence of War extends every one is sensible. And yet these Laws would not stretch the Punishment of Adultery when once actually committed, to such Violence as might be allowable in a War undertaken upon that Score. But for their Indulgence to private Persons of farther and severer Methods, we may borrow this very good Reason from Dr. Cumberland (a), that in as much as Offences of this kind escaping the Cognizance of the Civil Magistrate do frequently pass unpunish'd, therefore whensoever their Circumstances make them capable of receiving Punishment, it hath been thought proper to allow the most rigorous and extreme; that the Boldness of wicked Men, as much as it increases by Common Impunity, so much it may be lessen'd and kept under by the Fear of meeting sometimes with so grievous and so terrible a return. That Clause in the Roman Law giving Authority to kill a Day-Thief si telose defenderit, If he defends himself with his Weapon, plainly intimates that I am hereby permitted to kill him, tho' barely for the Preservation of my Goods, and not then only when he at first assaults me with his Weapon, but when upon my endeavouring to recover my things from him, he employs it against me for his own Security.

XVIII. And therefore it is clear, that they are in the Wrong who make the Reason of the foresaid Law to be only this, lest if the Robber escap'd in the Night, the Crime should pass unpunish'd. As to Grotius's (b) Discussion of this Point, there are many things in it to which we cannot subscribe. He makes the Laws we have been speaking of to be founded on this Bottom, that the Legislators hereby intimated, no Man ought to be kill'd, directly for the sake of our Goods. Which is more than we can discover in those Laws which treat of such Thieves as creep into Houses with Design to carry things privily away. 'Tis true in the Case of the Nightly Thief, it may happen that whilst I endeavour to save my Goods, my Life too may be in danger. And then the Slaughter of the Thief is permitted me upon a double account. Nor here will it be an Objection against my Innocence, that I seem to throw my self into this danger, by attempting to retain or to recover my Matters. For I am then engag'd in a lawful and almost a necessary Act; from which no effect that arises without my Fault, can be imputed to me. But were it not lawful to kill another purely on the account of Goods, how can we utterly clear him from all Guilt, who for the Preservation of those Concerns, casts himself deliberately into such a Condition as makes it necessary for him either to kill, or to be kill'd? As we do not allow him the Plea of Self-defence, who kills a Man in a Duel voluntarily undertaken.

The other Reason which Grotius assigns for the Hebrew Law seems not of sufficient Strength and Solidity. In as much (says he) as by Night Witnesses of the Fact are difficult to be procur'd, therefore more easy Credit is given to him who shall affirm (1) that he kill'd the Thief in defence of his own Life; as having found him with an Instrument that might have done hurt. For granting that the Hebrew Word in the Text cited by him signifies an Instrument of Digging or Stabbing, yet if the Intent of the Law had been as he makes it, 'twould have been much plainer to have said, if he be found with a Weapon. Nor indeed is it, after all, a good Consequence to say, that because the Thief was found arm'd with a Weapon, therefore he came certainly to assault the Life of the Person who kill'd him. No more doth it follow, that because by the Law of the XII. Tables the Day-Thief could not be kill'd unless he defended himself with his Weapon, therefore there lies a fair Presumption against the Nightly Thief that he actually made use of his Weapon in the same manner. For that Law gave Commission to kill the Nightly Thief without Conditions and by any means possible. In after Ages indeed, this farther Clause was added to it, si parcere ei sine periculo suo non potuit, dum rem servare conatur (c), if whilst he endeavours to save his Goods he cannot spare this Robber's Life without manifest Danger. But before this Addition it cannot be prov'd, that a Person stood Guilty of Homicide, who had kill'd a Nightly Thief, tho' there were Witnesses to prove that the Party Slain never brought him into danger of his Life. The Example of a Maid Ravish'd in the Field, which Grotius here alledges, is nothing at all to his Purpose. For in that Case, the Law expressly commands us to presume that Violence was offer'd her: But in the Matter we are now concern'd about, we cannot discover that any Presumption of Mortal Danger is made or suppos'd by the Laws. As indeed it is not the Business of these purloining Rascals to Fight, but to Run. Yet after all we are ready to confess, that a Man who in defence of his Goods, only lays hold on the Night-Robber, (if he can with Safety and Convenience) and carries him before the Magistrate, acts much more generously than if he had unnecessarily depriv'd him of Life (a).

(a) L. 5. f. 26. (b) L. 2. c. 1. f. 12. (1) If the Affirmation, or Word of every particular stood for a legal Evidence in this case, this great Inconvenience would follow, that any malicious Person (tho' his Credit be no better than his Temper) might, with Impunity destroy his Neighbour, if he would but give his Word his Neighbour first assaulted him. (c) In l. 9. D. ad L. Cornel. de Sicar.

XIX. The last Point usually disputed on this Subject is, whether the Party who first gave and begun an Injury, may fairly resist the other Man when he endeavours to return or to revenge it. Many here take the Affirmative side, upon this Reason, that whilst Men undertake to right themselves by their own Pleasure and their own Force, they are very seldom very exact in proportioning the Punishment to the Crime. But we conceive the Question ought to be determin'd with more Caution, and with more Distinction. The Law of Nature, then, commands, that he who has injur'd another should offer him Satisfaction: And at the same time it obliges the other Party to pardon the Offender, when he intreats him with Signs of Penitence, offering reparation for past Damages, and Security for his Future Good Behaviour (b). He therefore that refuses to make Satisfaction, and hereupon resists the Person demanding it, manifestly heaps one Injury upon another. But when a Man refuses to accept fair Satisfaction when offer'd him, and resolves to prosecute his Revenge by open Arms, in this case he practices unjust Force, and consequently it can be no fault to make Resistance against him (c).

CHAP. VI.

Of the Right and Privilege of Necessity.

THE Case of Necessity is a thing in every Body's Mouth, and the Force of it generally acknowledg'd in the World. Hence we commonly say, that it bath no Law, that 'tis a suppos'd or presumptive Exception to all Human Ordinances and Constitutions; and that therefore it gives a Right of doing many things, otherwise forbidden (a). Now whence this Force or Power arises, and how far it extends, we ought with the more Accuracy to examine; because some Casuists seem to allow it none or very little Efficacy as to the Morality of Human Actions. But before we proceed to this Enquiry, we may observe in general, that Tully in his Second Book of Invention, makes a two-fold Necessity, the one simple and absolute, which can by no possible means, be resisted, alter'd, or abated; and the other Conditional or Respective. This again he divides into three kinds, with regard either to Honesty (b), to Safety, or to Convenience. Of which, he says the first is by many degrees the highest, the second of next Moment and Consideration, and the third very much inferior, and not able to stand in Competition with the rest. He proceeds to give it for a Rule, that altho' Honesty be better than Safety, yet in some Cases we may give the Preference to the latter; when what we take from Honesty in the consulting our present Safety may be recover'd and made up by our future Vertue and Integrity: When this cannot be done, Honesty is absolutely to be prefer'd and embrac'd. Others chuse to say, that when the Necessity of Safety is prefer'd to the Necessity of Honesty, such a Fact cannot be defended in a direct way, and by any Prescription of Right, but leans wholly on the Excuse which we allow to Human Infirmity, and on the Indulgence of our Mercy and Pity. But that Necessity of Convenience is still much weaker, and weighs very little either in the Defence or the Excuse of Actions; unless when the Cause comes before such a Judge, as hath more regard to his own partial Inclination, than to the Suggestions of Wisdom and to the Demands of Right.

Now our Business on this Subject lies chiefly in examining and stating the Necessity of Safety, and in considering what force it hath to exempt any Action from the Obligation of

(a) M. Senec. l. 4. Controv. 27. Necessity is the Great Patronage and Shelter of Human Infelicity. Callimach. Hymn. in Del. Necessity's a Mighty Goddess. ——— Add. *Orat. Common Laws. That is, whether we may not sometimes do things forbidden, and omit things commanded by the Laws, when we are (not by our own fault) cast into such Straights, that we cannot otherwise secure our own Preservation. And here it is apparent, that the Favour, the Right, the Leave, or whatever it is that in such Cases we attribute to Necessity, doth spring from this single Principle, that it is impossible for a Man not to apply his utmost Endeavour towards preserving himself; and that therefore we cannot easily conceive or suppose, such an Obligation upon him, as ought to outweigh the Desire of his own Safety.

II. No Good and Pious Man can question, but that GOD ALMIGHTY who is the absolute Master of our Lives, and whose free Bounty gave us the precarious Enjoyment of them, may impose on us so severe a Law, that we ought rather to die, than to recede the least degree from it. Of which kind the Jews took their Law against eating Swine's Flesh to be; as we find in the History of the Maccabees. And their Judgment was then indeed right; because as the Case stood with them, to eat that sort of Flesh was look'd on as an open Denial of the True Religion. Whereas, were they under no such hard Circumstances, it was no Sin for a Man to keep himself from starving by feeding on this forbidden Meat, when no other could be procur'd. Sometimes too by the Authority of a Civil Sovereign, Men may receive so strict and rigorous Commands, that they must rather part with their Lives, than omit the Duty enjoin'd them. But the Obligation of Positive Laws is not always presum'd to be so harsh and severe. For in as much as the Authors of these, or of any other Rules and Constitutions in the World chiefly design'd by them to promote the Safety or Convenience of Mankind, we may suppose them, generally speaking, to have had before their Eyes the weak Condition of Human Nature; and to have reflected on the Impossibility which every Man lies under, not to avoid, and to drive off, all things that aim at his Destruction. Upon this account then, most Laws, especially those which we call Positive, are judg'd to except the Cases of Necessity; that is, not to oblige, when the Observance of them must be attended with some Evil, destructive of our Nature, or exceeding the ordinary Patience and Constancy of Human Minds: Unless when this very Case is included plainly in the Injunction, either by express mention, or because the Nature of the Business cuts off all Exception and Reserve. Hence it is clear that no such Power ought to be attributed to Necessity, as that it should give us the Privilege of directly violating a Law, or of committing a Sin; but we only presume from the favourable Intention of Legislators, and from the Consideration of the Nature of Man, that the Case of Necessity is not comprehended under the General Terms of a Law. An Instance of this our Saviour himself hath been pleas'd to give us, in David's eating the Shewbread (a), intimating, that the Matter and the Reason of the Law which forbid that Action in general, could not be suppos'd to have any such rigorous design, as that a Man ought rather to die with Hunger, than to touch the Consecrated Food (b).

It is plain then, that as to Positive Laws this Privilege of Necessity, is admitted and allow'd: But 'tis a Point much more difficult to determine whether the same Favour can take place in the Laws of Nature; That is, whether in Necessary Cases we may fairly omit what is Naturally commanded, or perform what is Naturally forbidden. As for the first Question, it appears from the Nature of Affirmative Precepts, that whenever they oblige a Man to the actual exerting of such a Performance as is enjoin'd, they at the same time suppose him to have Opportunity, Subject and Power of acting: But now we may fairly judge these Conditions to be wanting, when I cannot do a thing without the Loss of my Life. Since to throw off the Love and the Care of our selves, is justly rank'd amongst impossible Attempts; or however amongst such as surpass the common Strength of Mens Souls. Therefore, unless it either be expressly and particularly provided by the Law, or deducible from the Quality of the Business to be undertaken, that I must rather lay down my Life, than omit the Duty, all affirmative Edicts of Nature may be understood to except the Case of extreme Necessity: Especially when a Man hath not fallen under such a Necessity thro' his own Neglect and Default. Thus I am not bound to furnish an hungry Person with Bread, when I want it for my own Sustainance (c); Or to help a Man that is drowning, when I cannot save him without losing my self. Seneca's Resolution is good in both Cases, I will give (says he (d)) to those that are in need; but so as not to put my self in the same needy Condition: I will succour those who are ready to perish; but so as not to expose my self to certain Ruine.

As for the Negative Precepts, or the Prohibitions of Natural Laws, this in the first place is most certain, that no Necessity can make it allowable for us to undertake an Action directly dishonouring Almighty GOD; as suppose, to blaspheme or to deny him, and renounce his Worship and Service, tho' for the avoiding of present Death. For in as much as GOD is able to inflict on a Man a much more grievous Evil than Natural Death can be imagin'd to be; our Reason doth with good Probability assure us, that he will requite us with a much more noble Happiness when we part with our Lives for his Sake: On the other hand it would be absurd as well as impious to sin against the Divine Honour for the escaping of a lesser Evil, than what he incurs by such an Offence (a). Yet the unhappy Case of those who yield to the Force and Violence of Tortures, is not altogether unworthy of our Pity.

Concerning those Laws which contain the Mutual Duties of Men, it may be first observ'd, that some of these Natural Precepts do presuppose some Human Deed or Institution; which, as may be gather'd from its End and Purport, not extending to the Case of extreme Necessity; the same Exception may be fairly understood in the Law. And then we may remark farther, that a Man cannot be said by his own Act immediately to have violated a Law, unless the Act can be rightly imputed to him. Now an Act may proceed from a Man two ways, either as he is the Principal, or as he is the Instrumental Cause of it. And this Instrumental Cause is again of two kinds, either as it exercises no Motion but what is impress'd on it by the Principal Cause, and against its own Natural Inclination, if it have any; or, as it applies it self upon its own proper and internal Impulse to such a Performance, tho' the Influence and the Direction of the first Cause do likewise assist in the Operation. If then a Man be according to this latter way Instrumental in an Act, the Act may not only be imputed to the Principal Cause, but also to him, as his true and proper Work. But if he be Instrumental or Concurrent only in the former manner, the Act shall not be imputed to him, but only to the Principal Agent. What farther Conditions are requisite to this Case shall hereafter be more largely explain'd.

III. Thus much being premis'd, we may go on to discuss the particular Cases, and Questions usually disputed on this Head. In reference then to a Man's self, tho' otherwise he hath no such Right and Power over his Members as to destroy, to distort, or to maim them at his Pleasure; yet it shall be lawful for him to cut off a Limb, that is either possess'd by an Incurable Gangrene, or that is rendred useles by a Wound; in the former Case, to keep the whole Body from perishing, or the sound Parts from being infected, and in the latter, that the Use of the other Members be not hindred by the Clog of an unserviceable and cumbersome Appendage. Whether the extremest Necessity doth farther give a Man any Right over his own Life, that is, whether for the escaping a Death of Ignominy or of Torture, he may lay hold on more gentle Means of leaving the World, we have enquir'd and stated in the preceding Chapter. We may proceed therefore to examine what Right Necessity can give us over others. To feed on Man's Flesh in the desperate Extremity of Famine, when no other Sustainance can be procur'd, is a lamentable indeed, but not a sinful Expedient. But as for those Instances, when in Distress and Want of all Provisions, Men have been kill'd to preserve their Fellows, either by Compulsion and against their Consent, or else by the Determination of Lot, the Decision of them is a Point of some Difficulty and Uncertainty. In as much as whatever the Law against Murther suggests on one side, the Sharpness of Hunger pleads as loud on the other, and the Belly that Advocate without Ears: Especially considering that unless this unhappy Means was made use of, the whole Company must have inevitably perish'd (b) (1). To this purpose we have a Story of Seven English men, who being toss'd in the Main Ocean without Meat or Drink, kill'd one of their Number, on whom the Lot fell, and who had the Courage not to be dissatisfied, affwaging in some measure with his Body, their intolerable and almost famish'd Condition: Whom when they at last came to Shore, the Judges absolv'd of the Crime of Murther. Ziegler upon Grotius (c), giving this Relation, is of Opinion, that the Men were all guilty of a great Sin, for conspiring against the Life of one in the Company, and (if it should so happen) every one against his own; thus regarding Bodily Peril, more than the Danger of their Souls. That no one ought to have set so little a Value on his Life, as to lose it for satisfying the Hunger of the rest: And that the rest ought not to have been so cruel to their Fellow, in Compliment to their own Stomachs. But to this it might be answer'd, that 'tis too harsh and rigorous a Censure, to say that those Men conspire against the Life of another, who agree to take the Chance of dying one of them, for preserving the Lives of all the rest (d). And consequently they could put their Souls into no Danger by this Unfortunate Resolution. Nor is the Charge of undervaluing their Lives any better grounded; since he only can fall under this Imputation who throws himself away without Necessity. Nor, in the third Place, doth there lie any Objection of Cruelty, when the Person dying for the Safety of his Companions, receives the Instrument of Death with less Grief and Reluctancy than the others apply it. There is another Case worth examining; suppose in a Shipwreck more Men leap into the little Boat than it is able to carry, and the Boat belongs to no one by a more peculiar Right than to the rest; whether they may not fairly draw Lots who shall be cast over-board; and whether if any one refuse thus to take his chance, he may not be thrown out without farther Deliberation, as one that seeks the Destruction of the whole Company. But these Cases being such as very rarely fall out, we chuse at present to suspend our Positive Judgment concerning them.

IV. This may more frequently happen, that two Persons being under imminent Danger of their Lives, both must unavoidably perish, unless one of them for his own Deliverance, hastens, by some Act the Fate of the other, which would however have soon arriv'd. Or, that upon Necessity we may bring on another indirectly the Danger of Death, or of some grievous Hurt; not designing to harm him, but only to exercise such an Act, as may probably prove mischievous to him; at the same time desiring any other way to get rid of our Necessity and Streights, and endeavouring as far as lies in our Power to make the Damage fall light on the suffering Party. Now this kind of Hurt, as we judge it not to cause any Sin in the Giver, so we think the Receiver ought to look on it as purely an Accidental Evil, upon account of which he has no reason to be angry at the Author. Let us consider an Instance or two of both Cases. If I, being a skilful Swimmer, fall into deep Waters with another utterly ignorant of that Art, and he, as the usual way is, clings fast about me, who am not able to drag out both Burthens; who will blame me for using all my Strength to get rid of him, and so to prevent my own Death, tho' perhaps I could, with hard shift, have held him some few Minutes above Water? So in a Wreck, if I have taken Possession of a Plank which will not hold two, and another, swimming towards me, shall endeavour to throw himself upon it, to the Destruction of us both; there seems to be no reason why I should not apply the utmost Violence in keeping him off. And thus likewise if two Men are pursued hard by an Enemy bringing Death in his hand, if both cannot be saved, one of them may, for his own Security, either by breaking down a Bridge, or shutting a Gate after him, leave the other in imminent Danger of being kill'd.

This kind of Necessity often happens in War; where 'tis a Rule, that at any time some few are to be left in Distress, for securing the Main Body (a). Yet Darius in Quintus Curtius (b), when things were not brought to desperate Extremity, bravely refus'd to break down the Bridge of the River Lycus which he had pass'd with some part of an Army in a Retreat; making this Generous Declaration, that he had rather give a Passage to those that pursu'd, than take it from those that fled.

An Instance of the other Case which we mention'd in General, may be this: Suppose a Person of more Strength than my self, follows me close with Intention to kill me, and I meet one in a narrow Passage thro' which I must take my Flight, if upon my Request he will not get out of the way, or if he has not time or room to stand off, I may throw him down and run over him, tho' the Fall in Probability will be very grievous and hurtful to him: Unless he be such an one, as, by Virtue of some peculiar Obligation, I am bound at any time to serve voluntarily with my own Danger. And if the Person who thus stops my Flight be not able to look to himself upon my calling to him, as suppose a Lame Man or a Child, I shall certainly deserve Excuse, if I attempt to leap over him (either being on Horse-back or a-foot) rather than fall into my Enemies hands by my Delay. As for that other Example, which some give, it plainly appears not to be without Fault. The Case is this, a Captain flying from a Battle, and being closely follow'd by the Enemy, one of his Men happening to be got just before him in the Crowd, he runs him thro', to get off with the more Expedition. Now here the Captain was strong enough to have made his way only by pushing down the Fellow that stop'd him, and therefore ought not to have us'd so violent Means. Yet if in getting by him, he had undesignedly hurt him with his Arms, the Mischance would have been very pardonable. But in case a Man either out of a Frolicksome, or a Cruel and Barbarous Humour, stops me on purpose, and refuses to make room for me to escape, I may presently use him as an Ene-

Florus (l. 2. c. 18.) says of the Numantines, At length they entred into a Resolution of Flight: But this their Wives prevented, by cutting in pieces the Harness of their Horses; committing a Base Cruelty through an Extremity of Love. Tacitus (Ann. 14.) censures it as the Effect of ill Conduct or of Treachery, that when the Romans were besieg'd in Camolodunum, non motis senibus & feminis juvenus sola restiterit; the Young and Able Men did not throw out the Women, and Persons useless through Age, and so clearing the Place, make it more capable of Defence. (Add. Livy, l. 5. c. 40.) On the contrary he tells us in the same Story, that Suetonius resolv'd to hazard the Loss of one Town, for the Security of the whole Province; And therefore he would not be mov'd by the Cries and Intreaties of those who begg'd him to stay and protect them: But giving the Sign for Marching, he receiv'd all into his Troops that were willing and able to follow him; and as for those whom either the Weakness of their Sex, or the Burthen of their Age hindered from stirring, they were left to the Mercy of the Barbarians. my, and thrust him down by any means I can, how much soever he is like to suffer by the Bruise (a). To conclude this Point, as the declining Death any way, admits of much Favour and Excuse, so if the Danger offer'd be no more than a Maiming or a Grievous Wound, and we fly from it with the Hurt of those that chance to stop us, the Fact will bear much the same Apology or Defence. For he who offers such a Violence, may be resisted as much as if he directly attempted to murder us; and when we are compell'd to consult our Safety by Flight, the Consternation we must needs lie under, vindicates our Innocence, as to any sudden and unfortunate Accident, that we chance to trespass in.

V. Let us enquire in the next place, whether the Necessity of preserving our Life, can give us any Right over other Men's Goods; so as to make it allowable for us to seize on them for our Relief, either secretly or by open Force against the Owner's Consent. For the more clear and solid Determination of which Point, we think it necessary to hint in short on the Causes upon which Distinct Proprieties were first introduc'd in the World; designing to examine them more at large in their proper place (1). Now the main Reasons on which Proprieties are founded, we take to be these two, that the Feuds and Quarrels might be appeas'd which arose in the Primitive Communion of things, and that Men might be put under a kind of Necessity of being Industrious, every one being to get his maintenance by his own Application and Labour. This Division therefore of Goods was not made, that every Person should sit idly brooding over the Share of Wealth he had got, without assisting or serving his Fellows (2); but that any one might dispose of his things how he pleas'd, and if he thought fit to communicate them to others, he might at least be thus furnish'd with an Opportunity of laying Obligations on the rest of Mankind. Hence when Proprieties were once establish'd, Men obtain'd a Power, not only of Exercising Commerce to their mutual Advantage and Gain, but likewise of dispensing more largely in the Works of Humanity and Beneficence; whence their Diligence had procur'd them a greater Share of Goods than others: Whereas before, when all things lay in common, Men could lend one another no Assistance but what was supplied by their Corporal Ability, and could be Charitable of nothing but of their Strength (b). Farther, such is the Force of Propriety, that the Proprietor hath a Right of delivering his Goods with his own hands; even such as he is oblig'd to give to others. Whence it follows, that when one Man has any thing owing from another, he is not presently to seize on it at a venture, but ought to apply himself to the Owner, desiring to receive it from his Disposal. Yet in case the other Party refuse thus to make good his Obligation; the Power and Privilege of Propriety doth not reach so far as that the things may not be taken away without the Owner's Consent, either by the Authority of the Magistrate in Civil Communities, or in a State of Nature, by Violence and Hostile Force. And though in regard to bare Natural Right, for a Man to relieve another in Extremity with his Goods, for which he himself hath not so much Occasion, be a Duty obliging only Imperfectly, and not in the manner of a Debt, since it arises wholly from the Vertue of Humanity; Yet there seems to be no Reason why by the additional Force of a Civil Ordinance, it may not be turn'd into a strict and perfect Obligation. And this Seldens observes to have been done among the Jews: Who, upon a Man's refusing to give such Alms as was proper for him, could force him to it by an Action at Law. 'Tis no Wonder therefore, that they should forbid their Poor on any account to seize on the Goods of others, enjoining them to take only what Private Persons, or the Publick Officers or Stewards of Alms should give them on their Petition. Whence the stealing of what was another's, though upon extreme Necessity, pass'd in that State for Theft or Rapine. But now supposing under another Government the like good Provision is not made for Persons in Want, supposing likewise that the covetous Temper of Men of Substance cannot be prevail'd on to give Relief, and that the Needy Creature is not able, either by his Work or Service, or by making Sale of any thing that he possesses, to assist his present Necessity, must he therefore perish with Famine? Or can any Human Institution bind me with such a force, that in case another Man neglects his Duty towards me, I must rather die, than recede a little from the ordinary and the regular way of Acting? We conceive therefore that such a Person doth not contract the Guilt of Theft, who happening, not through his own Fault, to be in extreme want, either of necessary Food, or of Cloaths to preserve him from the Violence of Weather, and cannot obtain them from the voluntary Gift of the Rich, either by urgent Intreaties, or by offering somewhat equivalent in Price, or by engaging to work it out, shall either forcibly or privily relieve himself out of their Abundance; especially if he do it with full Intention to pay the Value of them, whenever his better Fortune gives him Ability. Some Men deny that such a Case of Necessity, as we speak of, can possibly happen. But what if a Man should wander in a Foreign Land, Unknown, Friendless and in Want, spoil'd of all he had by Shipwreck or by Robbers, or having lost by some Casualty whatever he was worth in his own Country; should none be found willing either to relieve his Distress, or to hire his Service, and should they rather (as it commonly happens,) seeing him in a Good Garb, suspect him to beg without Reason, must the Poor Creature starve in this miserable Condition? It may be objected indeed, that in Proverbs VI. 30, 31. he is call'd a Thief, and pronounced obnoxious to the Penalty of Theft, who steals only to satisfy his Hunger. But whoever closely views and considers that Text will find, that the Thief there censur'd is neither in such extreme Necessity, as we are now supposing, nor seems to have fallen into his needy Condition merely by ill Fortune without his own Idleness or Default. For the Context implies, that he had a House and Goods, sufficient to make Seven-fold Restitution; which he might have either sold or pawn'd; a Chapman or Creditor being easily to be met with in times of Plenty and of Peace. For we have no Grounds to think that the Fact there mention'd is suppos'd to be committed, either in the time of War, or upon account of the extraordinary Price of Provisions. Besides, this Thief was faulty on another Account: For if he had not wherewithal to maintain himself, the Laws oblig'd him to sell himself for a Slave (a).

VI. Grotius (b) proposes another way of solving the Difficulty under our present Debate. He says, that the first Introducers of distinct Proprieties, must be understood to have done it with this Exception and Limitation, that the Right of this Propriety excluding others from the Use of every Man's proper Goods ought then to expire and to give place, when another cannot possibly without making use of them, be sustain'd or preserv'd: And consequently, that in such a Case of Necessity, a thing possess'd in peculiar, when another Man's Life cannot be sav'd without it, is turn'd again into Common. Or, what amounts to the same Purpose, that when Men Originally instituted separate Proprieties, they agreed by Mutual Covenant, to forbear using the particular Goods of each other, any farther than the Owner should give leave: Yet so as to make it allowable in extreme Necessity, for a Man to seize on any thing absolutely requisite for his Preservation, as if it still lay in its primitive Indifference and Community. For since in Written Laws, that Interpretation is to be follow'd which recedes the least from Natural Equity, he presumes this will hold more strongly in regard to Customs, which obtain only by Tacit Agreement. And surely it must be in the highest Degree Equitable, that a Man be permitted to save his Life, by using any thing at hand, when all other Means fail him.

But this Exposition lies open to several Exceptions and Difficulties. For if Necessity gives a Man a Right of seizing on the Goods of others as if they lay in common, what hinders but that, if he have sufficient Strength, he may take them from the Owners, when they themselves are at the same time pinch'd with the like Necessity? Yet this Grotius doth by no means allow. Again, Grotius requires Restitution to be made in these Cases: But I am oblig'd to no such Duty, when I take a thing by Virtue of my Right. Besides he forgot to mention how different the Case is, when a Man falls under such Necessity by his own Sloth or Negligence, and when it comes on him without his Fault. Which Distinction being omitted, a Right seems to be given to idle Knaves whose Vices have brought them into Want, to seize forcibly for their own Use the Fruits of other Men's honest Labours; and so continuing their Poverty and their Laziness together, to put a Necessity on Industrious Persons, of feeding such useless Bellies for Nothing. But all wise Men, as they allow such as are innocently Miserable to deserve Assistance and Relief; so they advise us to pack off Mendicant Drones and Lubbers, with the old Answer that the Ant gave the Grasshopper in the Fable (c). Since then it is lawful for every Proprietor to distinguish between such as are Indigent out of Misfortune, and such as are reduc'd to the same Condition by their own Demerit and Neglect; 'tis plain, that he has such a Right over his own Goods, as shall in some measure prevail even against a Person in extreme Necessity: So far at least as that he shall have the Privilege of judging, whether the Man be an Object worthy of his Relief or not; that it may be in his Power to oblige and win a necessitous Person by his seasonable Succours: For nothing raises the Value of a Kindness so much as its being done for the Removal of an extreme Distress. But all this Merit and Obligation is cut off, when we give another, only what he might otherwise, as his own Right and Due, violently take from us.

We think therefore, that this Point of Dispute will be more clearly determin'd by the Principles and the Method which we have laid down: That is, by saying in short, that the Wealthy Person is bound to relieve him who Innocently wants, by an Imperfect Obligation; to the performing of which though regularly no Man ought to be compell'd by Violence, yet the force of extreme Necessity is so great, as to make these things recoverable by the same means as those which are truly and rightfully due: That is, by making Complaint to the Magistrate, or when the Urgency of the Distress cannot allow time for such an Expedient, then by seizing what is ready at hand, either in a secret or in an open manner. Now the chief reason why we affirm those things which proceed purely from the Virtue of Humanity to be owing only by an Imperfect Right, is that Men may be allow'd both an occasion of showing their voluntary Propension to the Discharge of their Duty, and likewise of endearing others to them by their voluntary Benefits. But now if a Man should despise these Considerations, must a poor necessitous Creature be famish'd, because he cannot prevail on the Unmerciful Miser? Certainly such an inflexible Churl ought rather to be depriv'd of his Gift and of his Merit together; since he had not Heart enough to venture on an Act of common Humanity.

(a) See Levit. XXV. 39. Selden. l. 6. c. 7. Nothing can be drawn to the contrary from Prov. XXX. 7. Other Authors give this Example of Extreme Necessity. A Man being in an unknown Country, is attack'd by an unjust Assailant, and cannot otherwise save himself than by speedy Flight. He finds ready at hand, a Horse belonging to some Person of the Country, but which he sees no means of restoring, as well because he is Ignorant of the Owner, as because he may be oblig'd to ride far to escape the Danger. (b) L. 2. c. 2. f. 6. (c) And thus in Plutarch, (Apothegm.) when a Captain of Coasting Robbers, made an Inroad into the Territories of Lacedemon, and being taken, urg'd in his own Defence, "That he was neither able of himself to pay his Companions, nor could prevail with those that had Money, to supply him; and therefore he ventur'd to take it by Force. Cleomenes call'd this Proceeding ὀνίπμ@ ἢ πικρῆλα, A very Compendious Wickedness. Add. Pandulf. Collenut. rer. Neapolit. l. 5. p. 373.

From what has been hitherto offer'd, it is easy to gather the Reasonableness of those Exceptions which Grotius subjoins to his and our main Assertion. For since nothing but inevitable Necessity can justify the taking by force what is owing only upon an Imperfect Obligation, in the first place it is clear, that all fairer Courses are first to be tried, as complaining to the Magistrate, begging and intreating, promising Restitution if we are ever able, or offering to discharge the Debt by equivalent Labour and Service. Secondly, this Licence can by no means take place, when the Owner of the thing which we want, lies under as great a Necessity as we our selves: On the contrary, we suppose the Owner to abound. This Caution or Exception may be extended farther, and we may say, that a distress'd Person cannot fairly take a thing from the Owner without his Consent, if it be only manifest that upon the Loss of that thing the Owner will hereafter fall into the like indigent Condition. For in these Cases, 'tis fit Charity should begin at home. That Rule of Civil Law which Grotius applies to the present Business, that when the Considerations on both sides are equal, the Case of the present Occupant, is to be preferred; doth not seem so exactly to hit the Purpose. For that Maxim only imports, that Judgment ought to be given for the Possessor, whilst the Claimant's Title and his are alike disputable. But in the Matter before us, the Possessor's Right and Title are granted, and the only Question is, whether I am oblig'd by the bare Law of Humanity, to perish myself for the sake of preserving another: which is a Paradox that no Man will pretend to maintain. The other Sentence which Grotius applies, out of Curtius (a), is much more proper and more agreeable to the Point; Melior est causa suum non tradentis, quam poscentis alienum. He who refuses to deliver what is his own, has a fairer Cause than he who demands what is another Man's.

Thirdly, we lay it down as an indispensable Condition, that Restitution is to be made if possible; especially, if the thing taken were of great Value, and such as the Owner could not well part with without some Consideration. But if the thing were small and inconsiderable, and the Loss so light that the Owner's Fortune could not feel it, 'twill be sufficient when opportunity serves, to show that we should not have been wanting in Gratitude, if his Greediness would have given us leave to be obliged to him. As for Grotius's requiring Restitution, it seems not to suit with his Hypothesis. For if upon a Case of Necessity the Right of Primitive Communion returns, so as to give a Man a just Title to the Goods of others, then Restitution can on no account be desir'd or demanded. But since this is necessarily to be made, it appears that the Right of the Owner doth not expire thro' the Necessity of the Petitioner; but that he ought voluntarily to have given Relief, either gratis, or upon Receipt of the Price of the thing or any other Compensation. Which Duty when he neglects to perform, then indeed the Necessity of the Distress'd Person gives him a right of taking the thing by Force, but still with the same Burthen, or under the same Condition which the Owner might have impos'd on him; that is, either to refund the Value hereafter, or at least to make a grateful Acknowledgment of the Benefit.

VII. If we look on other Authors, we shall find them much divided about this difficult Point. The fourth Chapter of the fifth Book of the Decretals (b), enjoining Penance to Thieves who steal out of Necessity, is by the Gloss expounded of little and indifferent Necessity, not of such as is Extreme and Insupportable. Covarruvias (c) delivers his Opinion almost to the same purpose as Grotius. The Reason (says he) why a Man in extreme Necessity may without incurring the Guilt of Theft or Rapine, forcibly take Goods of others for his present Relief; is, because this Condition renders all things Common. For it is the Ordinance and Institution of Nature it self, that Inferior things should be design'd and directed to serve the Necessities of Men. Wherefore the Division of Goods afterwards introduc'd into the World, doth not derogate from that Precept of Natural Reason, which suggests that the extreme Wants of Mankind may be in any manner remov'd by the use of Temporal Possessions (d). Peregrinus (e), arguing on the same side, alledges,

(a) L. 7. c. 1. (b) Cap. si quis X. de furtis. (c) P. 2. f. 1. n. 3. (d) There is alledg'd a Passage of St. Ambrose from Gratian, Decret. c. Sicut. hi. dist. 47. It is the Bread of the Hungry which you detain: It is the Raiment of the Naked which you lock up. (e) Ad Tit. Cod. de furtis, l. 3.

that in this Case a Man is compell'd to the Action by a Force which he can't resist; and then, that the Owner's Consent may be presum'd on, because Humanity obliges him to succour those who are in Distress. Besides, he observes, that the Necessitous Person doth not properly take the Goods which were another Man's, but which lay in common: And yet that he is bound, when he has obtain'd Deliverance from his Want, to make fair Restitution. Anton. Matthæus (a) is of Opinion, that a Distinction should be made in this case between the Crime and the Punishment; the Crime of Theft, he says, is not taken off even by extreme Penury, but he would have the Punishment either wholly remitted, or considerably mitigated and abated. Now that the Crime of Theft is committed even under these Circumstances he endeavours to prove from the Definition of Theft in the Civil Law, which he makes to reach this Action. Theft, the Emperour Justinian tells us, is a fraudulent seizing on the Goods of others, for the sake of making a Gain of them. But we may fairly plead (in Opposition to Matthæus,) that neither of these Imputations can fall on the Fact which we defend. For how can this be term'd a fraudulent seizing on another Man's Goods, when both the Owner lay under an imperfect Obligation of giving the thing desir'd, and the other Person had a Right, by Virtue of his present Condition to possess himself of it, by the most convenient means he could? Nor can he well be said to take a thing of another Man's for the sake of making a Gain of it, who designs it purely for the Relief of his extreme Distress, with full Wishes and Resolutions to restore or to repay it as soon as possible. That part of his Argument is meer Bravado, where he tells us, that no Violence can compel a Wife and a Good Man to defile himself wilfully with any uncomely Action: And that in these Cases, every one should, as Tully (b) advises, rather patiently endure his own Inconvenience, than trespass on the Conveniencies of others. Now besides that, 'tis an easy matter to talk Philosophically, whilst we do not ourselves feel the Hardship any farther than in Speculation (c); the Fact under Debate can, according to our way of determining it, include no other Turpitude or Indecency than such as Persons of Breeding and Quality are guilty of, when the Severity of Famine compels them to feed on the basest and most filthy Meats. And then the Rule about Conveniencies and Inconveniencies is beside the Question, which only supposes some little Matter to be taken from a wealthy Person, who doth not feel the Loss, to keep another from perishing by the Extremities of Hunger or of Weather. The same Author observes on the Lex Rhodia de jactu, that tho' for the Publick Benefit, in a time of Scarcity, every Man is oblig'd to bring what Corn he has by him into the Common Market, yet People are not hereupon empower'd to carry off what they please, because they are in want, and others abound; but the whole Business is to be left to the Care and to the Directions of the Magistrate. But must the Poor therefore be content to starve, when the Magistrates neglect to make due Provision for their Sustenance?

As to what some urge, that there doth not appear any Dispensation of the Law in this matter, 'tis an Objection that may be easily spar'd. For sufficient Reasons have been given why we may well presume, that the Law which forbids Theft is not to be extended to the present Case.

VIII. Lastly, the Danger or Necessity of our own Goods, seems to allow us the Privilege of destroying or of invading those which belong to other Men. Yet with these Proviso's, that the Danger did not happen thro' our Fault; that we cannot find a more convenient way of removing it; that we do not ruine a more valuable Thing of our Neighbour's, for saving one of our own, inferiour in Price and Consideration; that, in case the other thing had not been lost but for our sake, we pay the Price of it; and lastly, that if what belong'd to our Neighbour must have otherwise been destroy'd together with ours, if we had not preserv'd the latter by making away with the former, that then we consent to bear a part in the Damage. On this Foundation is grounded the Equity of the Rhodian Law de jactu, by which it was provided, that if for the lightening of a Ship the Men were compell'd to throw any Goods overboard, the Loss should be made up by general Contribution, since it happen'd upon account of the general Safety (d). Thus too if my Vessel be driven upon the Cables, or the Nets belonging to another, I have Liberty to cut them in Pieces, if I cannot otherwise get clear. And if my own Neglect did not bring me into that Trouble, I am to answer but for half the Cost. Thus in a Fire, I may pull down my Neighbour's House for the Security of mine; if I am willing to make good all that he suffers by the Mischiefe. For tho' in one of the Roman Constitutions (e), it is determin'd, that in Case the Fire had Actually reach'd to the House that was pull'd down, the Person who procur'd it, shall not be Responsible; yet the common Opinion inclines more to Equity (f), which asserts, that upon such Demolishment of one House for the Security of many, the Damage shall be repair'd by those Neighbouring Inhabitants, who thus escap'd the Danger; though the House which they in this manner ruine, hath not been touch'd by the Flames. For it would be indeed unreasonably hard, that when I have sav'd my own Concerns by destroying those of another Man, the whole Loss should be thrown upon him, whilst the whole Advantage lights on me. From the same Rules and Principles the Roman Lawyers deduce most of their Doctrine concerning that kind of Damage which they call Damnum Infectum (1). Thus, for Example, if my next Neighbour has a Ruinous House, very likely to tumble to the Prejudice of my Effects, he shall be oblig'd to give me Security for answering all Damages that I sustain; and if he refuse this Condition, upon applying myself to the Prætor, I obtain an Edict empowering me to enter the Ruinous Place. On the same account they assert, that in case a Man has a Field surrounded in such a manner on all sides, by the Lands of others, that he cannot get to it without seemingly committing a Trespas; the Borderers shall be compell'd by the Judge, to grant him Passage, at least upon the offering of a reasonable Consideration.

Grotius (a) makes this farther Deduction from the Doctrines we have been now laying down, that it is lawful for him who wages a Just War, to possess himself of a Place seated in a Country that is at Peace with him; if there be certain (and not only imaginary) Danger, that the Enemy will otherwise surprize it, and from thence annoy him with irreparable Mischief: Provided he take nothing but what is necessary to his own Security, as the bare Custody of the Place, leaving both the Jurisdiction and the Profits to the right Owner; and fully purposing to restore the Custody too, so soon as the Necessity that brought him thither shall cease. To these Conditions it should be added, that the Lord of the Place is first to have frequent notice given him, and to be desir'd that he would himself secure and defend the Place, upon a Promise from the other Prince to defray the Charges; or that he would demolish and render it untenable, if he thinks that the most proper Method. And another equitable Caution is, that in case the new Possessor has expended any Sum in raising Works and Fortifications, the proper Lord is not oblig'd to refund, unless he intended to have built the same Defences himself; in as much as the other did not make it his Aim purely to improve the Place, but chiefly to secure his own Territories. Bæcler in his Notes on this Passage of Grotius well observes, that it is apparent from the usage of all Ages and of all Nations, that no one thinks himself oblig'd to allow another thus to seize on any Fort or Place of his, if he be able to hinder his Attempt. And that therefore if the other do actually take Possession, the Fact is such as may admit of easy Pardon, but not such as can be fairly and strictly defended on the Grounds of Natural Law. To which purpose we may consider farther, that 'tis very probable the Enemy may hence entertain a Suspicion, that the Lord of the Place is in secret Confederacy against him; and so the whole Burthen of the War may be easily devolv'd on the third Party. And tho' the Enemy be well satisfied that the Place was seiz'd without the Leave or Concurrence of the Lord, yet if he resolve and endeavour to dispossess those who hold it, the Innocent Prince cannot but feel some part of the Calamities of Arms; which if he keeps off by any Means, he cannot justly fall under Reprehension. And thus too in a lesser Case, it can never be advisable for a Man to admit more Strangers into his House, than he can conveniently get rid of when he pleases: Since otherwise he is under a Necessity of being at their Disposal; and must perhaps be content to walk out of Doors, and to leave all to his New Masters.

LAW of NATURE

NATIONS.

B O O K III.

C H A P. I.

That no Man is to be Injur'd; and that if any Damage be done, Reparation is to be made.

WHAT Duties the Law of Nature enjoins a Man to Exercise towards himself; and what Indulgence, what License or Favour it allows him in the Preservation of his own Person or Goods, we have hitherto endeavour'd to explain (1). We may now pass on to those other Natural Precepts which contain the Duties we are to practise towards other Men. These we have formerly divided into Absolute, and Hypothetical or Conditional. In the Series of absolute Duties, or such as oblige all Men antecedently to any Human Institution, this seems with Justice to challenge the first and noblest Place, that no Man hurt another; and that in Case of any hurt or Damage done by him, he fail not to make Reparation. For this Duty is not only the widest of all in its extent comprehending all Men, on the bare account of their being Men; but it is at the same time the most easie of all to be perform'd, consisting for the most part purely in a negative Abstinence from Acting; except that its Assistance is sometimes necessary in restraining the Lusts and Passions, when they fight and struggle against Reason, amongst which Rebellious Desires, that boundless Regard which we sometimes show to our own private Advantage, seems to be the Principal, and the Ring-leader. Besides, it is the most necessary of Human Duties, in as much as a Life of Society cannot possibly be maintain'd without it. For suppose a Man to do me no good, and not so much as to transact with me in the Common Offices of Life, yet provided he do me no harm, I can live with him under some tolerable Comfort and Quiet. And indeed this is all we desire from the greatest part of Mankind; a mutual Intercourse of good Turns lying only between a few. But what possibility is there of my living at Peace with him who hurts and injures me; since Nature has implanted in every Man's Breast so tender a concern for himself, and for what he possesses, that he cannot but apply all means to resist and repel him, who in either respect attempts to wrong him (a)? Now as the strength of this Precept is a Guard and a Fence to those things which we receive from the immediate hand of Nature, as our Life, our Bodies, our Members, our Chastity, our Reputation and our Liberty; engaging Men to keep them Sacred and Inviolable. So must it be supposed to spread it self thro' all those Compacts or Institutions, by which the Propriety of any thing is made over to us; since without it they could obtain no Force or Effect. Whatever therefore we can on any good Title call our own, Men are by this Precept forbidden to take away, to endamage or to impair, or any way to withdraw it from our use, in Whole or in Part. The same Duty is virtually contain'd in many Affirmative Commands, which

(1) B. II. C. 3. (a) Seneca of Anger. B. II. C. 31. It is a Sin to injure ones Country; and therefore to injure a Fellow Subject, in as much as he is a Member of our Country. The Parts ought to be held Sacred, if the Whole deserve our Veneration. And hence likewise, the Person of every Man ought to be inviolable, because every Man is our Fellow-Citizen in the great and Universal Society. What a Distraction would arise, should the Hand practise Mischief against the Feet, or the Eyes prove Treacherous to the Hands? As all the Members conspire in an exact Union and Agreement, because the safety of each in particular is the Interest of the whole Body; so particular Men ought to spare each other, because we are all born for Society. And no Society can remain secure, without a firm Love and Concord amongst the Members of which it is Composed.

enjoining some one positive Practice, remove and restrain the contrary Enormities. How plainly the necessity of this Law insinuates itself into the Minds of all Men, let Seneca's Observation inform us. Ask a Common Rogue (says he) whether he had not rather obtain by honest Means, what he now gets by Theft and Villany: He who makes it his Gain to assault and pillage all he meets, would be more willing to find the Money by Chance, than to take it by Violence. There is no one who would not be better pleas'd to enjoy the Fruits of his Wickedness, without the Practice of it (a). Tully says excellently to the same purpose, that for a Man to rob and injure another to promote his own Advantage, is more against Nature, than Death or Poverty, or Pain (b).

II. Farther, it follows from this Precept, that in Case a Man be hurt or injur'd by another, in any respect, the Person who stands justly charg'd as Author of the wrong, ought as far as it lies in his power to make Reparation. For otherwise it would have been a vain Command not to harm another, if the Party who actually suffers such a Harm, must be content to put it up without farther notice, and leave the Offender to enjoy in Peace the Fruit of his Injury, never obliging him to refund or to restore. Were not Restitution made a necessary Duty, neither would wicked Men ever abstain from wronging others; nor would those who have been injured, find it an easy task to compose their Mind in such a manner, as to maintain Peace with the other Party, so long as they have obtain'd no Recompence or Consideration for their Sufferings.

III. The word Damage which seems properly to refer only to Goods and Possessions, we here use in an extended Sense, so as to make it take in likewise all manner of Harm that may be offer'd to a Man's Body, his Chastity, or his good Name. In this Latitude, then, it implies all Hurt, Spoil or Diminution of whatsoever is already actually our own; all Interception of what by a perfect and absolute Right, we ought to receive whether such Right be the Original Gift of Nature, or whether it be allow'd us by Human Institution and Law. And lastly, all Omission or Denial of any Duty, or Performance, which others by a perfect Obligation, stand bound to pay us (c), we say by a perfect Obligation; because if the Obligation in the other Party be only Imperfect, and we consequently have only an Imperfect Right, the withholding of any such Due, cannot really be esteem'd a Damage. For since all Performances of this kind, ought to proceed from the voluntary Motion of some vertuous Principle in the Giver, and since I have no Power or License to exact the Payment of them by force, it would by no means be convenient that I should think myself Damaged, in not receiving such things as I could not otherwise expect, than in the way of free Gift and Benefit. And as I cannot reckon those things amongst my own which I have only a Fitness or Capacity to possess, so I have no reason to complain of injurious Practice, if they happen to be kept from me. Aristotle says elegantly to this purpose, he who out of a narrowness of Spirit, refuses to assist another with his Wealth, doth not hereby increase it. And since he has not more, the Person whom he thus sends away unreliev'd, has not less. On the same Principle is founded the Argument which Cicero makes use of in his Defence of Plancius, that altho' the other Gentleman Lateranensis, might perhaps be the more worthy Competitor, yet it was in the Power of the People to pass him by, and to chuse Plancius into the Office of Edile, in as much as neither of the Candidates had a Perfect Right to that Honour. It is a Privilege, says he, belonging to the very Condition and Constitution of free States, that they be able by their Votes, to give to a Person, or to take from him what they will. Yet in the same place, the Orator distinguisheth between what the People could do, and what they ought to do; the Term ought implying that less perfect Obligation, by which we stand engaged to the Exercise of every Vertue. But here Grotius well advises us to take heed, of Confounding Points which belong not to the same Head. For the People in a Commonwealth, who are obliged to confer Honours on the most deserving, only by the Rules of State Prudence, yet in Case they intrust any Person with this their power of chusing Officers, if he prefer those who are less worthy, the others who are pass by, cannot bring an Action of Injury or Damage against the Elector. Yet the People, by whose Deputation he acted, have a Right of calling him to an Account for his Proceedings, and may require Reparation for any Damage which the Commonwealth hath sustain'd by his unworthy Choice. And thus to a Citizen indued with Arts and Abilities sufficient for the discharge of an Office, tho' in Reference to obtaining it, he has no Right which will hold good against the State; yet he has an equal Right with others to sue for it; in which Right if any Person by Force or Fraud shall prejudice or obstruct him, he may demand Satisfaction; tho' not to the full value of the Office desired, yet to the value of his uncertain Expectation. And now we are settling the Notion of Damage, we are farther to remark, that it affects not only the thing it self, which being either our Possession or our Due, is hurt; destroy'd or intercepted, but likewise the

(a) Sen. de Benef. l. 4. c. 17. (b) De Offic. l. 3. (c) Remarkable to this purpose, is Quintilian's Thirteenth Declamation, where it is proved at large, 'That the Man was guilty of a Trespass, who by poisoning the Flowers in his own Garden, had caused the Death of his Neighbours Bees. The main Argument runs thus, that since Bees are naturally wild and wandering Creatures, and cannot by any means be confin'd to a certain place of feeding; therefore wheresoever a Person hath a Right to keep them, there is at the same time an Obligation laid on all the Neighbourhood to let them ramble without hurt or hindrance. Ad. l. 17. s. 11. 49. D. ad L. Aquil.

Fruits or Profits accruing from the thing, whether they have been already received (tho' then indeed they may be valued as particular Goods or Things) or whether they are yet only in Hope and Prospect, if the Owner had a Right of receiving them (a), provided still a Deduction be made of the Expences, he would have been put to in securing and gathering in such Fruits, lest he enrich himself at the Charge of the other Party. Now the value of Fruits in Expectation, rises and falls according as the time of receiving them, is more or less distant, and consequently the Issue more or less uncertain. Thus the losing a Field of Corn, in the Blade, will not be rated so high, as if it had been destroy'd in the Ear. Some Consideration too is allowed for what we call Civil Fruits. Thus he who sets on Fire another Man's House (b), is not only bound to rebuild it, but likewise to make good the Rent, which they would in the mean time have brought to the Owner. Philo Judæus (c) informs us, that in his Nation, when a Man had any way damaged his Neighbour, and done Penance for the Fact, he was obliged, besides paying to the full Value, to add one fifth Part more, as a Comfort to the Person who had sustain'd the wrong.

Lastly, it is a clear Point, that all Evils or Mischiefs following by a Natural Consequence from any Damage given, ought to be adjudg'd Parts of it (d). Strabo (e) relates of King Ariartbes of Cappadocia, that having stop't up the little Passages, by which the River Melas emptied it self into the Euphrates, that so covering the greatest Part of the Neighbouring Plain, he might divert himself with the Childish play of making little Islands; at length the Damms all giving way on a sudden, the Flood pour'd it self so violently upon Euphrates, as not only to make it carry off part of the Cappadocians Country, and some of their Houses, but to cause great Wast and Mischief in the Lands of their Neighbours, the Galatians: whereupon the matter being refer'd to the Arbitration of the Romans, they condemn'd the King in Damages of thirty Talents (f).

IV. In stating who are to be esteem'd Authors of Damage, it will be necessary to recollect from our first Book, Chap. 5. how many ways the Act of one Man may be imputed to another. A Person then may damnifie his Neighbour, not only immediately by himself, but likewise by the Ministry of others. And farther, a Damage immediately done by one Man, may be chargeable upon another, (who is consequently obliged to make reparation,) in as much as he contributed somewhat to the Action, either by doing what he ought not, or by omitting what he ought to have done (1). He may stand guilty of this Charge in three ways and degrees; for he may either be the Principal Cause, or he may be equally concern'd with the Actor; or lastly, he may be only an Accessory, and an Inferior Cause. Of all which Cases this may in general be observ'd, that the Persons thus Chargeable are bound to Restitution, according as they were either the real Cause of the Damages, or contributed to it in whole, or in Part. For it often happens, that Persons may concur less principally to the Fact of another Man, by some Omission or Commission, and yet that he would most certainly have done the same Damage, whether they had thus concur'd or no; so as to render their Concurrence altogether superfluous. Now here tho' they are justly punishable for the Will and the Endeavour, yet since no part of the present Damage flow'd from them, they cannot be required to make Restitution. Some indeed are for bringing off all Accessories at a venture; because say they, if these had not lent their Counsel or Assistance, there would not have been wanting others to help forward with the Mischief, and consequently the Damage had been done without their means. But this Argument is of no Weight, 'tis sufficient to make them Guilty, if their Aid had any real Efficacy in producing the Trespas; and had those other Persons join'd their Hands to the Business, they too would have been proportionably responsible. This Rule then may be fix'd as an Universal Standard, to know who are bound to make Reparation, and who are not; that when any one did not give real Assistance in the Act of Damage, nor by any antecedent Motion or Default, caus'd it to be undertaken, nor came in for any Part of the Advantage, such a Person tho' by giving any the least occasion to an ill Action he contracts a Sin, yet shall not be obliged to Restitution. And hence 'tis easy to conclude on the other side who shall be oblig'd. Those who insult over their afflicted Neighbours, and rejoyce in their Calamities, brought on them by wicked and injurious Men, are sinful no doubt in an heinous Manner (g); and yet it would be absurd to affirm, that they are bound to repair such Damages as they delight to see. The same must be said of those who defend, excuse, or praise, a Trespas already committed, provided they do not hereby hinder the Duty of Restitution, as likewise of those who either with Success to such a Fact before it is committed, or entertain a silent Joy and Satisfaction, during the performance. There is no ground to build a contrary Opinion on the passage of Cicero (h), which some would make use of to that purpose. What difference is there, says he, between him who persuades a Man to an ill Action, and him who afterwards approves of it? Or what signifies it whether I would have a thing done, or whether I rejoyce when it is done? For the Orator employs this Sentence, not to express his serious Mind, but to refute an impertinent Objection. And had it been spoken never so gravely, it could not be strain'd so high, as to assert the Necessity of Reparation in these Cases. And therefore Ammianus Marcellinus (a) seems not very properly to apply this saying of Tully to the business of Probus, Præfectus Prætorio, to the Emperour Valentinian, who, as he relates, did indeed never command any of his Clients or Servants to undertake an unlawful Action; yet if he found them to have committed any Crime, he protected and defended them in spite of Justice it self, without ever enquiring into the Fact, and without the least regard to Honesty or Truth. For here the Dependance on so great a Patron, added Strength and Boldness to their Enormities; and his Protection interposing, hindred them from making good the Damages they had been guilty of. As to the point of Counselling or Advising, this is most certain, that he who suggests to another the way and manner of committing a Trespass, is bound to Reparation. Whereas the same Obligation doth not seem to lie on those who either perswade a Man in general Terms to apply himself to an ill Course, as to Theft or Robbery, for instance, or joyn their Approbation and Consent to his Resolution, when already fixt and settled; as is often the Case with timorous Counsellors, or base Flatterers of Princes (b). Lastly, concerning those who concur to an injurious Action, by omitting somewhat which they ought to have perform'd, this may be observ'd, that their Omission doth then only bind them to repair the Damage, when it is of a Duty, to which they stood engaged by a perfect Obligation; not if the thing was only a matter of Charity and Humanity. For, since what is owing to me in this imperfect Manner I cannot yet account my own, neither if it be intercepted can I go about to recover it, whatever Ziegler in his Observations on Grotius (c), alleges to the contrary.

V. Where therefore many Persons have concurr'd to one Act of Damage, in making Reparation, this Order shall be observ'd; those shall be in the first place chargeable, who set forwards the Mischief, either by their Commands, or by some other powerful Means, amounting almost to a necessary Influence. And the immediate Actor of the Crime, or he who was thus forced to lend his Hands for its Performance, shall in these Cases be esteem'd only as the Instrument (1). Where any one appears to have engag'd himself in the Enterprize, without being driven on it by Necessity, he shall be first Obnoxious, and then the Rest who contributed their Assistance. Yet so, that if the former of these Parties con-

cern'd shall have made good the Damage, the others shall be then clear, as to Reparation, tho' not as to Punishment. But what if an Act proceeds from many Persons, who are all Authors or Causes of it in the very same Degree; shall each Party be responsible for the whole, or only for an equal Share of the Damage? Grotius (d) pronounces in this Case, that each Person is to answer for all, if the whole Fact proceeded from each, tho' not from each alone. Which Rule is somewhat obscure, unless we illustrate it by an Instance. Here are three Men, then, who at the same time, tho' perhaps in different Parts, all set Fire to an House. This Fact of burning the House, seems to have proceeded from each Man entire, and in whole, although not from each alone; in as much as the same Mischief would have follow'd, had one only applied the Fire. But suppose several Persons join in beating, or cudgelling a Man, one of whom perhaps gives him a Wound in the Head, another breaks his Arm, and a third strikes out his Eye; here each Person shall not answer for the whole Hurt, but only for that part of it, which he himself effected. Though in Case one of them escape, it is usual to condemn the rest, who are taken in the whole, especially when it appears, that they combined together to execute the Mischief. We may still set this Matter in a clearer light, by distinguishing between divisible and indivisible Acts. The latter which we are now concern'd with, are such in which many Persons concur, but in such a manner that the whole Act would have follow'd from the Endeavours of one only; and therefore cannot conveniently be divided in Shares amongst them all; of this kind are the firing of Houses, the breaking down of Banks and Damms, or the like. For the same Damage would have ensued, had one only of the many Parties set his Hand to the Exploit; so that it is impossible to define and settle what part of the Fire or of the Flood proceeded from each in particular. When many join in an Act of this Nature, each Person shall be thus far Responsible for the whole; that in Case they are all apprehended, they shall contribute equally to the Reparation, but if upon the Escape of the rest, one only be taken, he shall then be charg'd with the entire Summ. After the same manner, if some of the Persons apprehended, prove Insolvent, the whole Burthen shall be laid on those who have more Substance and Ability. In this too the Reparation of Damage, differs from the Exaction of Punishment, that in the former, if full Payment or Restitution be made by one of the Parties concern'd, the rest are cleared and excus'd; since it is not consistent with Equity, that the same Damage should be twice made good, (though by way of Punishment, this is frequently practis'd.)

But on the other hand, in penal Cases, nothing is more usual, than that every particular Accomplice in a Crime, be made to suffer all that the Law inflicts (a).

VI. Now whenever we hurt or endamage another, we do it either out of full Purpose and premeditated Guilt, or by a fault of Negligence only, and not of Design; (and this Negligence, as it is more or less Gross and Supine, is more or less Culpable). Or lastly, we may do it by meer Chance, so that the Injury cannot rightly be imputed to us (b). Among some People, those Damages are not only imputed to a Man which are committed with his Assistance or Concurrence, but those likewise which are caused by his Servants or Cattle, without his positive Influence. It is beyond doubt, that he who offers Damage to another out of an evil Design, is bound to make Reparation, and that to the full Value of the Wrong, and of all the Consequences flowing from it. But those likewise stand responsible, who commit an Act of Trespas, tho' not designedly, yet by such a piece of Neglect as they might easily have avoided. For it is no inconsiderable part of Social Duty, to manage our conversation with such Caution and Prudence that it do not become terrible or pernicious to others; and Men under some Circumstances and Relations, are obliged to more exact and watchful Diligence (c). Indeed the slightest Default in this Point, is sufficient to impose a Necessity of Reparation; unless under one of these Exceptions, either that the Nature of the Business was such as disdain'd a Care more nice and scrupulous, or that the Party who receives the Wrong, is no less in fault, than he who gives it; or lastly, that some Perturbation of Mind in the Person, or some extraordinary Circumstances in the Affair, leaves no room for accurate and considerate Circumspection; as suppose a Souldier in the heat of an Engagement should hurt his next Man with his Arms, whilst he brandishes and employs them against the Enemy. To this purpose the Story in Ælian (d) is remarkable; a Young Man travelling towards Delphi, as he defended his Companion from the Robbers, happen'd to kill him by an unlucky Turn of his Weapon; and upon Application to the Oracle, receiv'd his Pardon in this comfortable Answer.

Ἐξήκοντα ἢ ἑπταῖον ἀμύμων. ἢ σ' ἐμάμεν
 Αἶμα, πέλεις ὃ χρεός καθαρώτερον ἢ πῶρον ἦδα.

Striving to save your hapless Friend you've slain; His Blood may purifie, but ne'er can Stain (e).

But in Cases of pure Chance, where the hurtful Action is not mix'd with any Fault of ours, it is evident we are not oblig'd to Reparation. For when I have done nothing that can be fairly laid to my Charge, there seems to be no Reason why the Misfortune, and the Damage of a Harm which I unwillingly caus'd, should rather fall on me, than on the Person who receiv'd it (f). Yet if a Person of Wealth hurt a Poor Man, though meerly by Chance, it will become him by some Act of Liberality, to support and comfort the Sufferer. As for those Actions which lie against us for any Trespas or Hurt committed by our Cattle or Slaves and the like, Grotius is of Opinion, that they owe their Rise to Civil and Positive Laws; in as much as the Master or Owner being Innocent of the Fact, is not by any Natural Obligation made responsible for it. Yet others hold that Actions of this kind, are most agreeable to Natural Equity, although they are not precisely suggested by the Law of Nature. It is one of Plato's (g) Constitutions, 'If a Man or Woman being a Servant, shall injure the Goods of another Person, either by an unskillful, or by an immoderate use of them, the Person who receives the Wrong, not being himself the Cause of it, the Master shall either make him Satisfaction for the Damage sustain'd, or shall deliver the offending Servant into his Power and Pleasure. And the same way of proceeding is observable in the old Roman Story of Evander, delivering up his Servant Cacus to Hercules, who had convicted him of stealing his Cattle. But why the Owner of a Beast should rather suffer Damage, than he who upon provoking a Creature not Violent by Nature, has without the Owner's fault receiv'd a Hurt, the Reason seems to be this, that the Settlement of Proprieties does not impair or prejudice this Antecedent Natural Precept of Reparation. And therefore, since supposing Things to lie in their primitive Community, in Case I had been hurt by a Beast, I had the power of requiring, or satisfying my self upon the Beast, by any means I thought fit; this Power or Liberty of proceeding, is not suppos'd to be taken from me by the Introduction of distinct Proprieties. And in as much as the Owner of such a Beast makes a Gain of him,

(a) Such a Case we have in Quintilian Institut. l. 7. c. 6. Two Thieves had stolen together Ten Thousand Sesterces, they were sued in Court, and Forty Thousand demanded of each Man, according to the Law enacting, that every Thief shall pay Four-fold. They petition that each may pay no more than Twenty Thousand. Here the Judgment ought to goe against the Thieves, in as much as by the Roman Laws, these Actions of Restitution are reckon'd under the Head of Punishments, s. ult. de Oblig. qua ex delict. nasc. l. 7. f. 5. l. 8. and I suffer'd Loss by him, the Reparation of Damage taking place in Equity and common Favour before the Procurement of Profit, it hence appears, that I can rightly demand of the Owner, either to make good the Loss sustain'd; or in Case such a Charge would rise higher than the Value of the Beast, then to deliver him up as a Criminal, to be destroy'd. The same Rule holds much stronger in the Case of a Slave, since he is by Nature made liable to answer for any Damage he shall give. But now, since he has no Goods of his own to repay or requite the Loss, and since his very Body is his Master's, it follows in Equity, that the Master either repair the Wrong, or give him up to the Sufferer. Especially since without this Provision, a Slave would be empower'd to act what Hurt and Mischief he pleas'd; whilst neither he (who is Possessor of nothing, nor indeed of himself,) nor his Master could be oblig'd to Restitution. Nor, should the Master by the severest Course of Blows, or of Imprisonment punish the Offender, would this be any real Satisfaction to the injured Party (a).

Much more then is it clear beyond the least Doubt or Dispute, that the Owner stands responsible for those Damages which his Beasts commit, either by his own Fault or Instigation, or by their natural and accustom'd Violence, and the common Force of their peculiar Instinct. For the Owner ought either not to keep such Creatures, or carefully to restrain them from doing Mischief.

Of Reparation in general, we have this farther to observe, that when the Hurt or Wrong is done by an Evil and Criminal Act, there to make good the Damage, is not sufficient to take off the Punishment (b). Though the voluntary Offer of Requitall, as a Sign of Penitence and Sorrow, frequently lessens the Severity of farther Prosecution (c).

It is time now to illustrate this Doctrine by such Instances and Examples as Grotius (chiefly) will supply us with.

VII. An unjust Slayer is obliged to defray the Charge of Physicians and Chyrurgions, and to give to those Persons whom the Deceas'd was by full and perfect Duty bound to maintain, as Parents, Wife and Children, (not to any whom he kept out of Charity and Pity;)

so much as the hope of their Maintenance shall be fairly valued at; Regard being had to the Age (i), both of the Deceas'd, and of themselves (d). As to Ziegler's Opinion on this place of Grotius, that some Consideration is to be allow'd for the Gain which the Deceas'd might have acquired, had he lived longer, which consequently would have made their Portions the larger; we think it will scarce hold good. In as much as all Advantage of this kind being yet uncertain, cannot be reckon'd amongst our Possessions; and since future time lies equally open to Loss as to Gain; and lastly, since it cannot clearly be made out, how much the Deceas'd would have spent of any such Gain, had he been suffer'd to live and to procure it.

Now he is an unjust Slayer that kills a Man, who had a Right not to be kill'd by him, and who therefore by the Act that caus'd his Death was truly injur'd. And this Right appears to belong to every individual Person, since Nature by a general Command, binds all Men to live like Sociable Creatures, and to abstain from mutual Hurt. Which Right a Man may, as far as in him lies, renounce; at least so as to make it fair and just for him to be hurt by such or such particular Persons; and this may be done either Tacitly or expressly. He Tacitly disclaims this Right, who in a violent manner sets upon another without just Cause. For since the other has Right of repelling the Violence by any means he can, the Assailant is to accuse himself only for any harm he suffers in the Repulse of his own unlawful Force. The same Right is expressly renounced by him who enters into War with another upon mutual Appointment and Consent. For 'tis a Law of War, that every one have fair Liberty to use his full Endeavour for the Defeat and Suppression of his Enemy (e). And though in such War, the prevailing Person may perhaps Sin against Charity, yet the Violation of Charity only, will not oblige him to repair the Loss he has thus occasion'd.

The Life of a Free-man does not admit of any Rate or Valuation; and had it any, there is no Person to whom the Debt should be paid. For his Life does not properly belong to his near Relations, it is only their Interest that he should live; and therefore the Value of that Interest or Advantage being paid to them, they can demand no such farther Recompence as the full worth of his Life. The Case is otherwise with a Slave or Vassal, who being entirely the Propriety of his Master, and falling under Exchange and Commerce, in the manner of other Goods, has really a Price set upon him, which if he be wrongfully kill'd, the Master has a Right to demand. If it seem hard and somewhat like Inhumanity to rate our Slave, thus in the same manner as we would our Beast, it may be answer'd, that we do not make this Valuation of his Person, but only of the Work and Service which he would have done us.

(a) Vid. Interp. Jur. Roman. ad Tit. si quadrupes pauperiem, & ad L. Aquiliam, & de damno infecto. (b) Vid. l. 48. D. de Furtis. (c) See Luc. XIX. v. 8. 'Tis remarkable, what Glycus tells us, in his Annals of Michael the Paphlagonian. But the Emperour Michael, says he, 'Did not forbear all his Life time to lament his Villany towards Romanus, and endeavour'd by building Monasteries, by Charity to the Poor, and other good Works to appease the Anger of Heaven. And this Method might have prov'd Beneficial to him, had he laid down the Empire (for the sake of which the Fact had been committed,) and throwing off the Adulterers, bewail'd his Sin in a private Condition. But he neglecting such Means of Repentance, and still using Zoa as his Wife, still holding fast the Imperial Dignity, and only making a shew of doing good at the Publick Charge, thinking thus to obtain his Pardon, betray'd an Impious Opinion of God Almighty, as if he would suffer us to buy our own Forgiveness at the Loss of other Men. Valer. Max. l. 2. c. 8. f. 4. So much difference there is, whether you really add any thing to another, or whether you only restore what you had taken from him, as there is between the beginning of a Benefit, and the End of an Injury. (i) See Mr. Placotte's Treatise of Restitution, l. 3. c. 4. (d) The way of reckoning the Maintenance, we learn from, L. 68. D. ad L. Falcidiam. (e) To this Purpose we have a Story in Plutarch's Laconian Apothegms; the Two Boys, one of them with a Sickle, gave the other a Mortal Wound; when the Companions of the wounded Boy, who had hasten'd to part the Fray, promis'd him to revenge his Death on his Murderer; by no means, says he; this would be to act unjustly; for what he hath done to me is no more than I had done to him, had I been strong enough to have prevented him. Add. l. 4. c. 7. f. 4. l. 52. f. 1. D. ad L. Aquil.

Those in like manner stand bound to Reparation, who kill another out of Wantonness, which is esteem'd equal to deliberate Mischief (a). And those also who commit the same Mortal Violence, through their own unweariness and neglect. Examples of which Case we find set down in the Institutions (b). As if a Souldier practising with his Arms in another place, than what is set apart for those Exercises, shall slay a Man who was casually passing by; or if one who is not a Souldier shall happen to do the same; though in the place ordain'd for the Publick Training of Military Men. But if a Souldier in the same Place of common Duty shall undesignedly take away a Man's Life, he shall stand excused; for he was performing his proper Business, and the other Party was in fault for throwing himself into the Danger (c). If a Feller of Wood shall with the Limb of a Tree which he is cutting down kill a Servant passing by in the High Road, or in a Way near a Town; without having first cried out to give warning. But in Case he did thus cry out, and the Servant neglected to save himself upon timely notice, the Feller shall not be charged with his Death. No more shall he if the same Misfortune happen'd at a distance from the High way, or in the middle of a Field, although he did not give the usual sign of crying out; because there the Stranger had no Right of passing, and consequently ventured at his own Peril (d).

If a Physician destroy his Patient, either by plain Neglect and Dejection, or by Administering through Ignorance, improper and dangerous Medicines (e).

If a Muletier, through Weakness or Unskilfulness, shall have suffer'd his Mules to run over any Person; provided he undertook this Business of driving at his own choice, or made it his Profession, not if he was press'd and compell'd to the Service, protesting at the same time, his want of Art or of Strength (f).

In the Alcoran (g), he who shall ignorantly kill a Musulman, is enjoy'd to make good to his Relations the Damage they sustain'd by his Death; and to redeem one Person of his own Religion from Slavery.

It seems probable that those likewise were obliged to some such Method of Reparation, who by the favour of the Jewish Law, enjoy'd the Privilege and Protection of the Afylums, or City of Refuge (h). Since in the Case there specified, of a Man's killing his Neighbour by the fall of the Head of his Ax from the Helve, the Man is not entirely blameless, in as much as he ought to have strengthen'd his Instrument better, for the Prevention of such a sad Mischance. But how it came to be allow'd, that the Revenger of Blood (i) should dispatch such an Innocent Slayer, if taken without the Bounds of his Sanctuary, which seems not altogether consistent with a Regular State of Government, we have this only reason to assign, that God was pleas'd to grant some little Instances of Indulgence to the Cruel and Implacable Genius of that People (j).

VIII. He that has maimed a Man, shall be obliged to pay the Charges of the Cure, and to make up what he now gains less than before, by his Labour or Calling (k). On this Head the Jewish Constitutions are very worthy of Remark, as we find them deliver'd in Constantine l' Empereur (l). He that hurts his Neighbour is responsible on five Accounts; for the Damage, for the Pain, for the Cure, for the Cessation of Work, and for the Affront or Disgrace. The Damage they compute in this Method. If for example, he has beat out the others Eye, or cut off his Hand, or broke his Leg, they then consider the suffering Party as if he were a Slave to be sold in the Market, and so reckon how much he would have yielded in Sale before the Hurt, and how far his Price is now fallen. For they judg'd there would be no certain way of settling these Rates and Accounts, should they in this Case distinguish between the different Qualities and Conditions of Men, since the Professions of Life, and the States of Persons admitting so endless a Variety, the Sufferer would be always throwing in some new Reason to enhance the Damage, and aggravate the Hurt, and consequently to enlarge his Demands of Compensation. They thought it convenient therefore to set all Men, with regard to this Business, in the one general Condition of Slaves, the just value of whom was discoverable beyond dispute. So that if the Maim'd Person, suppos'd to be a Slave, would before the hurt have brought fifty Sheckles, and could be sold afterwards for no more than thirty, the Maimer was enjoy'd to pay him twenty Sheckles.

As to the Point of Pain, if a Man for instance, had burnt another, although in the Nails, where no Blister follows, they consider'd how much a Person of that State and Fortune would have taken to suffer voluntarily such a pain. For one may find a Wealthy or a Nice and delicate Person, who would not be hired at any rate to endure a Slight and moderate Smart; and at the same time one may light on a Poor and hardy Labourer, who would be content to undergoe some sharp Degree of Torture, for the earning of a Penny. Farther, in rateing the Pain, they proceed thus; they suppose, for Instance, that a Person of that Condition was condemn'd to have his Hand cut off, and then they consider'd how much he would give to lose his Hand, rather by some easy consuming Application, than by the violent stroke of a Sword; and so much the Party from whom the Hurt was receiv'd, was bound to give him on account of the Pain (a).

Concerning the Cure, they observ'd these Rules. If after the Cure perform'd, any Sores or Tumours arose, in Case it appear'd that the former Wound was the real occasion of them, the Person who gave it stood farther bound to pay for his second Cure, if they proceeded from any other Cause, he was not responsible. As often as the Wound being imperfectly heal'd broke out again, he was still charged with the Expences, but not after it had been once brought to a perfect cure. It might be added, that his Obligation continued only in Case the Wound thus broke out of it self; not if the thing happen'd thro' the fault of the Patient, or thro' the Unskilfulness of the Chirurgeon.

In rateing the allowance to be made the Sufferer for the Cessation of his Work, they consider'd him as a Keeper of Cucumers. The Jewish Doctors thus enlarge on the Point; they suppose him already to have receiv'd Satisfaction for the Defect or Damage sustain'd in his Body, and likewise for the Pain he has endured. And therefore supposing him, (for Instance) to have lost the use of a Hand or a Foot, they do not now consider what Gain he would have made, had those Limbs remain'd entire; but because he hath been already paid for the disabled Part, they only compute what Damage he suffers, during his Sickness in respect of such Work, as he could have perform'd, though maim'd in Body, if well in Health. And they think he may fairly demand so much for every day of his Sickness, as his daily Wages had been for watching a Cucumber Garden. But because it is a different thing, whether a Man loses a Hand or a Foot; whether only lying sometime sick of his Wound, he afterwards recovers without prejudice, or whether he is actually depriv'd of a Limb, Maimonides proposes a nicer and more exact way of rateing

the Cessation of Work, according to particular Cases. If the Sufferer shall not be Maim'd, but only cast into a Sickness, and confined to his Bed, or if the affected Limb only swell for a time, and afterwards regain its soundness and use, the other Party shall allow him daily for the loss of his Work, according to the usual Wages or Hire receiv'd by Men of the same Calling. But if he is maim'd in a Limb, or has lost a Hand, Satisfaction being already made him for that loss, or what they call Damage being before discharg'd, as to the bare Cessation of his Work, they then consider him as a Keeper of Cucumers, and computing the Pay, generally allowed for this Work, order him so much for every day of his Illness. In like manner, if he has lost a Leg, they consider him as a Sentinel or Watchman at a City Gate; if an Eye, they suppose him to work at turning a Mill; and so agreeably of all other Hurts and Mischiefs.

Lastly, in rateing the Affront or Disgrace, they consider the Condition and Degree of both Parties. Since an Affront is much more provoking from a mean and vile Person, than from one of Quality or Power; and since the same piece of disrespect may be light and inconsiderable to one of vulgar Condition, and yet be heinous and intolerable, if offer'd to a Man of Honour. And here we may by the by observe the Distinction added, concerning the Place or the Scene of the Action, which sometimes very much varies this Point. Thus if a Man sliding down from the Roof of a House, shall hurt one that passes by, and at the same time affront him, for Instance, by making the Dirt fall on him, he shall be responsible for the Damage or Mischief, not for the Ignominy. Thus much we have gather'd from the Jewish Laws; and on the same Head the Reader may consult the Roman; particularly, l. ult. D. de his qui effuderint vel dejec &c. l. 3. D. Siquadrupes. Where we must take notice, that when 'tis said Scars and Deformity are not capable of being prized or rated, the Rule will hold good only in the Case of Freemen. For since the debauch'd Manners of that Nation, set a higher Price than ordinary on handsome Slaves, they might consequently claim a pecuniary Satisfaction from those who should rob a Slave of this Advantage, by a Wound in the Face, or any Injury of that kind. So the disfiguring the Face of a Virgin or unmarried Woman, whose Beauty sometimes is the best part of their Fortune, may be reckon'd amongst Hurts, requiring Compensation. And indeed Deformity if very remarkable, is in general a sad Unhappiness, rendring us disagreeable to others, and exposing us to the Contempt and Derision of Proud and of Satyrical Men. Yet Scars receiv'd in War, pass for marks of Honour and Valour by the common Vote of Mankind (b).

(a) Conf. l. 5. princ. & l. 1. D. de injuriis. Where since there is this difference made between Verberatio and Pulsatio, that the former is with, and the latter without Pain, it seems to follow that even Pain may fall under Valuation.

As to the Compensation after an Act of Maiming, this is farther observable, that in such Cases the Limb it self is not properly rated or valued, it being a thing really incapable of a pecuniary Price; but the design of these Proceedings is only to repair the Damage sustain'd by the loss, or by the disuse of such a Part, with regard to the difference of Times, of Persons, and of Abilities; and whilst the Judge is settling these Points, 'tis necessary he should speak of the Members themselves (a).

IX. The next Instance produced by Grotius of the Adulterer and the Adulterers, who he says are bound not only to save the Husband harmless, as to the Maintenance of the spurious Issue, but likewise to make good to the Legitimate Children any Damage which they shall sustain, in Case so false a Sharer should be admitted with them into the Inheritance; falls under that kind of Damage, which Men are said to cause only Indirectly, and by Consequence. For as to the direct Crime of Adultery, that does by no means belong to Pecuniary Damage. On this Point Ziegler observes that Grotius is indeed in the right, when he asserts, that the Husband ought to be secured from the Burthen of keeping the Adulterous Off-spring: But that it will bear a Dispute, whether Restitution should be made to the Legitimate Children for what they suffer by such a Partner in the Inheritance. For he says the Question here is concern'd only about the Mothers Estate, to which the Adulterous Children cannot be admitted, but by the Ordinance and Prescription of Law. And therefore when the Law of any Nation does thus actually allow them to share in the Maternal Inheritance with the Legitimate; the Damage here given proceeds from the Law it self, and not from the Adulterers. To which might be added, that the Adulterers are not obliged to such Reparation for this farther Reason, That Children have not a perfect Right to the Goods of their Living Parents; and no Necessity of Reparation can arise but from the Breach of a perfect Right. Thus a Parent cannot be said properly to injure the Children by passing to a second Marriage, though their Hopes of Inheritance may sink considerably by such a Proceeding. But the Truth is, the Instance alledged by Grotius, abstracts both from the Provisions made by Civil Laws, about the Succession of Adulterous Children, to the Goods of their Parents, and also from the Penalties decreed against the Adulterers, If convicted; and 'tis but reason to affirm with him, that the Adulterers tho' unconvicted or undiscover'd, do really owe such Reparation, both to the Husband and to the Legitimate Children. For by the End and Design of the Matrimonial Covenant, the Children had a perfect Right, that no one should thrust new Co-heirs amongst them, besides the lawful Husband of their Mother. And by the same Covenant the Husband had a Right of refusing to maintain, not only out of his own proper and separate Goods, but likewise out of his Wife's Dowry, the base Progeny of his polluted Bed (1).

X. If a Man has either by Force or Fraud defiled a Virgin, he is oblig'd to pay her so much as she appears to be damnified in her hopes of Marriage, by the Loss of her Honour. For pure Virginitie is a very valuable Possession, and as it were the common Portion which Nature gives her Daughters (b). And therefore he who robs a Maid against her Will of this Treasure, ought so largely to refund to her, that the Improvement of her Fortune may hide the Blemish of her Body. Though indeed the true way of proceeding is, that he marry her himself; unless hinder'd by the Disparity of their Condition, or some other extraordinary Circumstances (c). But she who by a lustful Compliance, voluntarily parts with her Chastity, is to thank her self for the Loss. Yet commonly speaking, the Man in these Cases is presum'd to be more faulty than the Woman. He who shall entice a Virgin to prostitute her self on the promise of Marriage, should be bound to make good that Engagement. Nor will the Objection hold here, that Covenants about base or dishonest things are invalid. For since the Law of Nature requires no Interval betwixt the Covenant and the Completion of Matrimony (d), (all such distance being introduc'd by Civil Customs and Constitutions) (e), with regard to that Law, we can scarce call this a base Condition, 'You shall be my Wife provided you consent, that I shall immediately use you as such. Or if there be any thing which seems foul in so overhasty a Match, it is not judg'd sufficient to invalidate the Contract; because Marriage is, in this Case, the more favourable side.

XI. A Thief or Robber is bound to restore the thing taken away, with its natural Increase or Improvement (2); and to make good, not only the Damage Actually ensuing to the Owner, but likewise the surceasing of his Gains; and this, although he be compell'd to suffer the just Punishment of his Crime. For 'tis the injur'd Party who demands Reparation, and it is the Commonwealth which requires Punishment for the Publick Good; and the Judge can by no means reckon this as a Satisfaction to the private Person, so as to make him lose his Goods without Remedy and Restitution. Therefore 'tis an absurd way of proceeding in some States, where the Magistrate claims the Goods found on the Robber, and commands

(a) Baeler. ad Grot. l. 2. c. 1. f. 6. (b) Apuleius in Apolog. A beautiful Maid, though in the Condition of Poverty, hath a sufficient Portion, she brings her Husband, Sweetness of Spirit and Disposition, fair Charms and honest Purity. And indeed Virginitie alone is commonly, and ought to be esteemed by the other Sex, a full and just Recommendation. (1) See Placcete upon Restitution, l. 3. c. 12, 13. where he has handled this very Case at large. (c) See Exod. XXII. 16, 17. Deuterom. XXII. 28, 29. (d) See Tobit. VII. 10, 18. (e) *Vid. the true Owner of them to content himself with seeing the Villain brought to publick Justice (a). Nor is it more agreeable to the Law of Nature, that the Charges of Punishing the Thief should be laid on the Person he has rob'd, since the inflicting due Penalties, belongs entirely to the Government to effect, which if more Expences are requir'd, than the Estate of the Criminal amounts to, the Remainder is to be made up by the Publick; especially since at other times the Treasury gains so considerably by Forfeits and Confiscations. For Instance, if a State engage in a War, upon account of some private Members who have been injured, all are obliged to contribute to the Charges, as well as those whose Defence is particularly undertaken. The Case is otherwise, if the Judge puts it to the injured Parties choice, whether he had rather recover his Goods, or see the Thief executed; for here if he prefer the latter Condition, he can lay no claim to farther Satisfaction. Though the Judge cannot fairly propose such Terms, since the Punishment of Malefactors ought not to depend on the Pleasure or Humour of private Men, but on the Publick Advantage of the State.

If the thing stolen be spent and embezzl'd, Grotius will have it to be paid for according to a middle Valuation; not to the full worth, nor yet considerably less. Which Direction Ziegler does not without reason dislike. For what Title has the Thief in this Case to Favour? If I can demand the full and highest Price when to oblige a Person, I sell a thing otherwise not Vendible, why should I here make any Abatement to the Thief, who seizes my Goods against my Will? and is my Chapman only upon Compulsion (b)? And in this Case too Reparation is due from the Thief or from his Heirs, (yet not beyond the Value of the Inheritance,) although he has suffer'd the Corporal Penalty of his Crime. For it does by no means look like Injustice or Cruelty, that the Offender after he has thus satisfied the Law, either by Death or other bodily Pain, should likewise recompense the Person he has endamaged. The trite Objection of Mors omnia solvit (c), Death pays all, has no manner of Force in the present Business. Death indeed discharges personal Performances, but not proper Debts, which cleave as it were to the Goods and Possessions, and follow them to any new Master. And such is this Debt for Damage given.

The other Species of Hurt are more easy to be settled and decided; and some of them will hereafter be particularly insisted upon in their proper place (d).

CHAP. II.

That all Men are to be accounted by Nature Equal.

BESIDES that Affection which every Man maintains for his own Life and Body, and Possessions, by which he cannot but resist and repel whatever threatens Destruction to those dear Concerns; we may discover likewise deeply rooted in his mind, a most tender Esteem and Value for himself; which if any one endeavour to impair, he is seldom less, (and sometimes much more,) incens'd, than if a Mischief had been offer'd to his Person, or to his Estate. This Passion, though it may be heighten'd and improv'd by various external Causes, yet seems to lay its first Foundations in the very Constitution of Human Nature. The word MAN is thought to carry somewhat of Dignity in its sound; and we commonly make use of this, as the last and the most prevailing Argument against a rude Insulter, I am not a Beast, a Dog, but I am a Man as well as your self (a). Since then Human Nature agrees equally to all Persons, and since no one can live a sociable Life with another, who does not own and respect him as a Man; it follows as a Command of the Law of Nature, that every Man esteem and treat another as one who is Naturally his Equal, or who is a Man as well as he.

II. For the better understanding this Equality amongst Men, we may observe, that Hobbes (b) restrains it to a parity of Strength, and of other Human Abilities which attend a ripe and perfect Age; and would from hence infer, that all Men have good Cause, naturally to fear each other. For he indeed can strike no Terrour into me whose power reaches not far enough to hurt me. But now amongst Men, he who is inferior to another in bodily strength, may either by Treacherous Contrivance, or by Art and Dexterity, take away the Life of the stoutest Mortal (c).

Brave Theseus, they were Men like all before,
And Human Souls in Human Frames they bore,
With You to take their Parts in Earthly Feasts,
With you to climb one Heaven, and sit Immortal Guests.

(b) De Cive, c. 1. f. 3. (c) Seneca de Ira, l. 1. c. 4. There is no Man so contemptibly weak, who may not hope some way or other to wreck his Revenge on the bravest Person breathing. We are all strong enough to do Mischief. Since

Since therefore the greatest of Natural Evils, which can proceed from Human Power is Death, which any grown Person is able to bring upon another; since those may be term'd Equal, who can do equal Mischiefs to each other, and since to kill is equally (because in the highest degree) to Mischieve, it follows hence that Men are by Nature equal (a). When he subjoins that the present Inequality has been introduced by Civil Law, he seems to me very much to have forgotten himself. For he had been speaking before of the natural Equality of Men's Strength, to which it is a great Impropriety to oppose the Unequalness, arising from Politick Institutions, which does not affect or regard the Strength of Men, but their State and Condition; does not make one Man stouter than another, but greater in Quality and Honour. Nor has the same Author much better Success, when he pretends (b) to discover in the Faculties of the Mind, a greater Equality than that of Strength. He says indeed, that all Prudence is but Experience, which Nature in equal time equally bestows on all Men, in those things they equally apply their Minds unto. But do not we see one Man piercing more deeply than another into the Consequences of things (1), applying more dextrously what he observes, and distinguishing with more Perspicacity, the likeness or unlikeness of Cases and Circumstances? And hence it frequently comes to pass, that of Two Men who have been employ'd an equal Time in the same Business; one shall grow Eminent for Management and Address, whilst the other's Natural Heaviness shall be little amended, by so long a Course and Experience of Affairs. Nor does the great Disparity of Men's Prudence arise only from their own false and over-weening Conceit of their Particular Worth; every one thinking himself to have a higher Degree of Wisdom than the Vulgar; that is, than all except a few, whom by Fame, or for concurring with himself, he is wont to approve and admire. For this Disparity appears, not only when a Man compares himself with others, but when he compares others amongst themselves, and is not concern'd as to his own Interest, which side carries the Advantage. Nor do we always favour and commend him, who conspires with our own Thoughts and Designs; but whom the fair contrivance and the good Success of his Project, entitles to our Approbation. And although such is the Natural Temper of Man, so greedy of Esteem and Applause, that every one Disdains to be upbraided with Ignorance or Folly, and is exceedingly incens'd against those who boast of much larger Talents, much higher Attainments than his Neighbours, yet it does not follow hence, that no one allows another to be wiser than himself. For what if we fancy Two Men falling together into the same Danger, one of whom by his dexterous Management comes cleanly off, whilst the other is basely hamper'd, and escapes not without considerable Hurt or Prejudice, will not the latter here acknowledge his Fellow to have had a better Head-piece than himself? This is indeed, a part of that Freedom which Men equally enjoy, that a wiser Person shall have no right to challenge the Government of one more simple, unless with his Consent; especially if the latter professes himself to be contented with his own little Sagacity, and not desirous of the Controul, and the Direction of others.

But although the Consideration of equal Strength is thus far serviceable to our present purpose, that it may restrain one Man from rashly insulting over another, in as much as all Contention with an Equal is of dubious Issue, and because it is extreme Folly to desire the hurting another by undergoing our selves the same Proportion of Mischiefs: Yet the Equality which we are now treating of, is of a different Species, and the inviolable Observation of it, is in the highest Degree Conducibile to the common Benefit and Interest of Mankind. And here, as in all other things, may we justly admire the wise Contrivance of Nature, that whilst she distributes amongst Men the Goods of the Body and of the Mind, by unequal Parcels and Measures, she introduces this general Equality, to form an agreeable Harmony amongst all the other Varieties and Disproportions. For as in well order'd Commonwealths, one Subject may exceed another in Riches or in Honour, but all are equal Sharers in the Common Liberty; so under this Regulation of Nature, how much soever a Man may surpass his Neighbours, as to Bodily or Intellectual Endowments, he is still obliged to pay all Natural Duties, as readily and as fully as he expects to receive them; nor do those Advantages give him the least Power or Privilege to oppress his Fellows. Nor on the other side, does the bare unkindness of Nature or of Fortune, set a Man in a worse Condition than others, as to the Enjoyment of Common Rights. But whatever one Man requires or expects from others, the same may others (all Circumstances being alike) demand from him; and the same Judgment one decrees against another, he is obliged in like Case to submit to himself (c).

(a) It is the Argument of Pallas in Virgil's Æn. 10.

'Tis best my Son to keep Equality;
The Mighty Band which Friends unites to Friends,

And States to States, and links confederate Wars.

On this Account we can by no means admit of Cicero's Rule which he lays down in his third Book of Offices; Lex ipsa naturæ, &c. The Law of Nature it self, which preserves and holds together the common Profit of Mankind, does decree, that things necessary for Life and Sustenance, may be transfer'd from an idle and uselefs Person, to a Man of Wisdom, Goodness, and Valour, who should be suffer'd to perish, would exceedingly prejudice the Publick by his Death. Much more unworthy of Approbation is that saying of the American, recorded by Montaigne (a), who coming to Roan in the Reign of Charles IX. and being ask'd what he observ'd that was singular in France, answer'd that amongst other things, he could not but wonder to see some Persons abounding in all manner of Plenty, and others oppress'd with the most grievous Want, begging at their Doors, and not rather chusing to invade and pillage them for their own support. For as those who excel in the Goods of the Mind, of the Body, or of Fortune, ought not to treat Men of lower Condition with Haughtiness and Insolence, so neither ought these to envy or to rifle their Superiors.

And this Equality we may call an Equality of Right, the Principle from which it springs is this, that the Obligation to a social Life equally binds all Men, in as much as it is the inseparable Companion of Human Nature, consider'd simply as such. Where we may observe farther, that between Obligations enjoy'd by a Superior, and those which arise from Mutual Compact, there seems to be this difference, that the latter immediately cease to bind a Man, when the other Party hath broken the Agreement; whereas the former may still engage us to some Performances towards a Person who is wanting in a mutual return of Duty. And the reason of this is, because the Author and Imposer of the Obligation is able to make up to us some other way, what we lose by being more just than our Neighbours. But our Obligation to the practice of Natural Duty and Right, although imposed by the supreme Lawgiver, does thus far agree with Obligations of common Bargains and Covenants, that so soon as one Person recedes from it, he can no longer require the same Offices from another; and besides, the other Party does hence acquire a Right of compelling him by force to make Satisfaction. Though the Genius of Civil Society makes it necessary to abridge and allay this Liberty adhering to a State of Nature, for the support and maintenance of Government and of Peace.

III. Other Reasons there are Popular and Plausible, which might give us no little Assistance in discovering, and in illustrating this Equality. Amongst which this is not the least considerable, that we all derive our being from one Stock, from the same common Father of Human Race. On this Consideration Boetius Checks the pride of the insulting Nobility.

*Quid genus & proavos strepitis?

Farther, that our Bodies are all composed of the same Matter, frail and brittle, liable to be destroy'd by a thousand Accidents of Mischiefe. We all owe our Existence to the same Method of Propagation, we are all by the same Degrees fashion'd and compacted in the Womb of our Mother; and the Noblest Mortal in his Entrance on the Stage of Life, is not distinguish'd by any difference of Pomp or of Passage, from the lowest of Mankind (b). Our Growth and Nourishment is perform'd alike, and the gross remainder of our Food are carried into the same Common Shore. Lastly, our Life hastens to the same General Mark, Death observes no Ceremony, but knocks as loud at the Barriers of the Court, as at the Door of the Cottage (c), and after Death, our Bodies are resolv'd into the same Dust and Corruption (d). Besides, wise Men are ever pressing it upon our Consideration, that we are alike obnoxious to the sports of Fortune, to the endless variety of Dangers and Mischances; or rather, that the Divine Disposer of all things, ensures no Man in his present State, or in the Possession of unshaken Felicity: but according to the Secret Counfels of his Providence, difpofes of different Men by different Changes and Removes (*). Our Christian Profeflion fuggelts many Motives to the fame purpofe; as that God does not efteem Men according to their Nobility, their Power, or their Wealth, but according to their fincere Piety and Goodnefs. And that at the laft great Day of Judgment, of the Diftribution of Rewards and Punifhments in another Life, no regard will be had to thofe who fwell in Port and Figure, beyond their Neighbours of this World.

IV. This Equality being admitted, there flow from it feveral Precepts, the Obfervation of which bears a very great force in the maintaining of Peace and Friendfhip amongft Men. And this in the firft place is moft manifelt, that he who would ufe the Affiftance of others in promoting his own Advantage, ought as freely to be at their fervice, when they want his help on the like Occafions. One good turn requires another, is the common Proverb. For he muft certainly efteem others unequal to himfelf, who constantly demands their Aid, and as constantly denies his own. And whoever is of this infolent Temper, cannot but highly difpleafe and provoke thofe about him, and foon give occafion to a breach of the Common Peace. It was a Manly and a gallant Reproof which Caractacus gavè the Romans, Num fi vos omnibus imperitare vultis fequitur ut omnes fervitutem accipiant? Because you defire to be Mafters of all Men, does it follow that all Men muft defire to be your Slaves (a)? (1) And indeed, it as much implies a Contradiction to determine differently in my own Cafe, and anothers, when they are exactly Parallel, as to make contrary Judgments on things really the fame. Since then, every Man is well acquainted with his own Nature, and as well at leaft as to general Inclinations, with the Nature of other Men, it follows that he who concludes one way as to his own Right, and another way as to the fame Right of his Neighbour, is guilty of a Contradiction in the plaineft Matter: an Argument of a Mind unfound in no ordinary Degree. For no good reafon can be given, why what I efteem juft for my felf, I fhould reckon unjuft for another in the fame Circumftances. Thofe therefore are moft properly fociable Creatures, who grant the fame Privileges to others, which they defire fhould be allow'd themfelves (b); and thofe on the other Hand, are moft unfit for Society, who imagining themfelves a Degree above Vulgar Mortals, would have a particular Commiffion to do whatever they pleafe; they give themfelves a free Pardon for all things, and vouchfate not to others the leaft Indulgence; they demand the Principal Share of common Honours, and of common Goods; though their Right and Title is not diftinguifh'd by any peculiar Excellence or Advantage. For as in raifing an Edifice, a Stone which by reafon of its rough and angular Figure, robs others of more room than it fills it felf, and upon account of its exceeding Hardnefs, cannot conveniently be cut into Regularity, and fo hinders the whole Frame of Building from clofing together, is thrown afide by the Workman, as unfit for all ufe and Service; fo thofe πλεονέκται, thofe greedy Churls, whofe rough and favage Temper inclines them to heap Superfluties on themfelves, and to deprive others of meer Neceffaries, and whofe violence of Paflions makes them incapable of being reclaim'd, are indeed the great Impediments of Society, and the Plagues of Mankind. Hence it is a Command of Natures Law, that no Man who has not obtain'd a particular and efpecial Right, fhall arrogate to himfelf a larger fhare than his Fellows; but fhall admit others to an Enjoyment of equal Privileges with himfelf (c). Therefore the Commiffioner in Livy (d), who came to treat with the common People in Sedition, was guilty of Infolence, when he told them, Satis

Which Wifdom never trusts, but Folly fears.

Mr. Creech.

A moft noble ftain we have to the fame purpofe in Seneca's Thyeftes. Ille qui donat diadema fronti, &c.
Arrian (in Epi&et.) tells a Story of a poor Shoemaker, whom his Mafter Epaphroditus fold off as a Slave of little ufe. (c) Thus the Tribune of the Commons fpeaks in Dionyfius Harlicarnaffeus, with regard to the unwritten Laws of Nature, O ye Senators, we demand that the People may thus far enjoy the fame Rights with you. We grant that thofe of your Number who excel in Vertue and in Fortune, ought to poffefs the chief Offices and Honours of the State: But this Privilege we preſume may be fairly Challeng'd by every Member of a Commonwealth, to be fecured from Injuries, and to obtain Juftice againft thofe who offer them. La&ant. Sen. de Irâ, f. 2. c. 28. (d) Book III. Chap. 53.

Superq;

superq; humilis est, qui aequo jure in civitate vivit, nec inferendo injuriam, nec patiendo. He is humble enough, and indeed too humble in a State, who is content to live upon equal Terms and Rights, neither doing an Injury nor taking one. As if it were a hard Case, that the Privilege of Nobility should not be strong enough to dispense with that Fundamental Law of Equity, Do as thou wouldst be done by (a)! On this Principle is built that gallant Compliment of Pliny to the Emperour Trajan, Unum ille se ex nobis, & hoc magis excellit atque eminent quod unum ex nobis se putat: nec minus hominem se quam hominibus praeesse meminit. He thinks himself one of us, and 'tis this makes him more our Superiour, that he passes in his own Judgment for our Equal; and remembers himself to be no less a Man than the meanest Subject whom he governs. For that excellent Prince when he accepted the Supreme Command, had promised that private Men should find him such an Emperour, as he himself desir'd to find, whilst a private Man. Galba in Tacitus (b), gives Piso an admirable piece of Advice to the same purpose. Utilissimus idem ac brevissimus bonarum malarumq; rerum delectus est cogitare, quid aut volueris sub alio principe aut nolueris. The best and the shortest Rule to obtain the true Art of good Government, is to consider what you would your self approve, and what you would condemn in another Prince; and accordingly to practice the former, and to avoid the latter. And Seneca (c), joins in the same wise Direction; this (says he) is the Sum of my Advice, shew such behaviour towards an Inferior, as you would have a Superior shew towards you (d).

V. The same Equality teaches a Man how to carry himself, in Case he be appointed Arbitrator of any Right betwixt others, namely, that he treat them as equals, and give no Favour or Indulgence to one above the rest, except such as he can claim by Virtue of some peculiar Right. For he that by a partial preference of one Person to another, violates the Rule of Natural Equality, is at the same time guilty of an Injury, and of an Affront, by denying a Man what is his just Due, and by detracting from that Worthiness, which Nature gives him in common with his Fellow (e). It follows as a Corollary from this Doctrine, that if the thing which is to be distributed amongst in any, admit not of a Division, the Persons who have an equal Right to it, use it in Common, and without Stint, if the Quantity of the thing will allow it; if not, that they then use it in a certain and limited manner, and with Proportion to their Number. For it is not possible to find out any other way of observing an Equality in these Cases. But if the thing can neither be divided, nor possess'd in Common, then the use of it shall either be taken by turns (f), or if this Course too fail of Success, and if likewise one of the Contenders cannot give the others an equivalent to secure to himself the whole Enjoyment of the thing desired, then one shall carry it from the rest, by the fair Decision of a Lot; which is the most proper Remedy that can be applied to all Differences of this kind, in as much as it takes away the Notion of Contempt by setting all the Parties on a Level, and if it does not favour a Man, yet does not in the least disgrace him (g). Hobbes (h) has divided Lots into two sorts, Arbitrary and Natural. The former is such as the Competitors agree upon, engaging to stand to the Event, whilst they cannot by any Art govern or foresee it; and therefore this kind of Lot with regard to Men, depends entirely on meer Chance and Fortune. Natural Lot, he says, is either first Seisure, by which a thing which can neither be enjoy'd in common nor divided, passes to him, who shall first lay hands on it with a design to keep it; or Primogeniture, by virtue of such Paternal Goods as can neither be divided nor possess'd in the common by many Children, are adjudg'd to the Firstborn. Yet if we accurately consider things, there will appear to be no proper Lot but what we may call Arbitrary. For 'tis not easy to assign a reason why such an Event as a Man cannot procure by his own Industry, should give him a Right which should hold good against his Equals, unless this Right was assign'd or adjudg'd to this particular Event, by the Arbitrary Appointment, and Institution of Men. Thus a thing which no one has a particular Right to claim, belongs to the first Seiser; because when distinct Proprieties were introduced, there seems to have pass'd this tacit Agreement amongst Men, that those things which were not peculiarly assign'd to any Owner, and yet could not without a prejudice

This my Lord Bacon calls a Gigantean Temper of Mind, possessing those Grand Disturbers of the World, who seem to aim at nothing less than to render all Men happy or miserable, according as they appear their Friends or Foes; and as it were to make all Nature bear their own Image; which is properly fighting against Heaven. *De augment. to Mankind be always left in common, should be the Right of the first Possessor. And thus too the Right of Primogeniture, owes its original to Human Constitution and Compact. For otherwise, why should the younger Brothers born of the same Parents, be placed in a worse Condition than the Eldest, barely upon account of an Accident or Circumstance, which it was not in their power to hinder (a)? Now the reason why these two Claims by Primogeniture, and first Seizure, are sometimes, tho' improperly call'd Lots, is this, because they cannot be foreseen or directed by any power of Human Industry, and because it reflects no real Disgrace on a Man to lose the Preference, for want of these Advantages.

VI. This Rule of Equality is likewise transfere'd by Pride, when a Man for no Reason, or without sufficient Reason, prefers himself to others, bearing a lofty Carriage towards them, as base Underlings, unworthy of his Consideration or Regard. How vastly distant this Temper is from the Vertue of Generosity and true Greatness of Mind, Des Cartes has most elegantly shewn in his Treatise of the Passions. 'He lays it down as a Principle, 'that it is one of the chief Parts of Wisdom 'to know how and on what Accounts every 'one ought to esteem or disesteem himself; 'and then he makes out, that the only just 'Cause of esteeming our selves, arises from 'the lawful use of our Power of free Choice, 'and from the Command and Authority which 'we exercise over our Wills; since besides the 'Actions which depend on that Faculty, there 'is nothing in us that can properly merit 'Praise or Dispraise. Hence he concludes, the 'true Notion of Generosity which Prompts a 'Man to value himself as highly as in Reason 'he ought, to consist in this, that he acknowledge nothing to be truly his own but this 'free Disposition of his Will, that he be sensible he cannot purchase Blame or Commendation, otherwise than by the ill or the good use of this Power, and that at the same time 'he feel within himself a full Purpose and Resolution of using it well. He proceeds to observe, that those who have such a true Sense of themselves are easily inclin'd to think, that every Man judges of his own Worth in the same manner, since there is nothing in this Notion which hath any Dependence on external Things or Persons. That for this Reason they never despise others, but are ready to excuse their Faults, as proceeding rather from Mistake, than Design. That as they think themselves not much Inferior to those who exceed them in Wealth, Honour, Beauty, Wit, or Learning, knowing that these Advantages ought not to come into the Account; so when they find themselves possess'd of the like Goods, they do not fancy

' they are much Superior to those who want ' them. Hence, he says, there is discoverable ' in the most generous Spirits an honest Humility; a Vertue consisting in the Reflection ' which we make on the Infirmity of our Nature, ' and upon the Miscarriages which we either ' have formerly been guilty of, or may be hereafter, these being no less than we see committed by others; whence it comes to pass, ' that we prefer not our selves to any Person ' living, wisely considering that all Men have ' the same Faculty of Free-will, and may all ' employ it to as good use. He remarks farther, ' that those who entertain a good Opinion of ' themselves for any other Cause, are not endued with real Generosity, but puffed up ' with empty Pride, which as it is always ' vicious, so it is aggravated the more, the more ' unjust the Cause is on which the Self-Conceit ' is founded. And the most unjust Cause of ' Pride, is the being proud without Cause; ' that is when a Man being conscious to himself, that he has no real Merit which should ' entitle him to Esteem, imagines Glory to ' belong to every one that pleases to usurp it, ' and that the greater Share a Man claims of ' it, the greater he really enjoys. A Vice so extremely absurd, that 'tis scarce credible any ' should prostitute themselves to such a Baseness, were there not a Pack of idle Flatterers ' in the World, who by their false Praises, ' swell Men of heavy Parts, into this most stupid ' Degree of Folly (b).

Nor does a Man's Advancement to Honour or Power, give him any just Reason to be Proud; On which Point Menelaus in Euripides (c), thus admirably expostulates with Agamemnon.

Lucian (a) has left an excellent Observation to the same purpose; No Man, says he, will envy one advanced to Eminence and Grandeur, if he see him bear his Fortune with Moderation.

VII. A much heavier Breach of this Equality is it, for a Man to shew his Contempt of others, by outward and open Signs; whether by Actions or Words, by a Look or a Laugh, or any such Affront; one kind of which is often express'd by troubling another with a Ridiculous or a Disagreeable Present (b). Which Sin is to be reputed so much the more Heinous as it gives the highest Provocation imaginable, and inflames the Sufferer with the greatest violence of Anger and Revenge. For we find many Persons who will expose their own Life to present Danger, and much more break the Peace with others, rather than put up such a grateing Indignity. In as much as every Act of this Nature is a Wound to a Man's Glory or Reputation, of which Goods we are more proud, and more tenderly sensible than of any thing else we possess, and in the safe and flourishing State of which, almost the whole Pleasure of our Mind consists (1).

VIII. From what has been offer'd on this Head, it is easy to discover the Absurdity of that Opinion, derived from the Ancient Greeks, of some Men's being Slaves by Nature. Which if taken in the same Crudeness of Sense as it bears in the Expression, is directly repugnant to that Natural Equality, which we have been endeavouring to establish (c). Thus much indeed is most evident, that some Men are endued with such a Happiness of Wit and Parts, as enables them not only to provide for themselves and their own Affairs, but to direct and govern others. And that some again are so extremely Stupid and Heavy, as to be unfit to govern themselves, so that they either do Mischief or do nothing, unless others guide and compel them. And farther, that these last being commonly furnish'd by Nature, with strong and hardy Bodies, are capable of bringing many notable Advantages to others by their Labour and Service. Now when these have the Fortune to live in Subjection to a wise Director they are without doubt fix'd in such a State of Life, as is most agreeable to their Genius and Capacity. If therefore these Two Parties of Men voluntarily consent to the Establishing of some common Government amongst them, it is consonant to Nature, that the former be invest'd with the power of Commanding, and the latter with the Necessity of Obeying, by which Method the Interests of both will be best promoted and secured. And in this Sense we may without Danger admit of Aristotle's Aphorism, laid down in his first Book of Politicks, Τὸ αὐτὸ δουλεύειν τῷ Στιβαίῳ καὶ σοφῷ, &c. which according to Heinsius his Paraphrase, runs to this purpose; Nothing is more suitable to Nature, than that those who excel in Understanding and Prudence, and are able to judge of things at a Distance, should rule and controul those who are less happy in these Advantages; on the other hand, those whose Bodily Strength and Vigour, enables them to put the Commands of wiser Men in Execution, are by Nature framed and design'd for Subjection and Obedience. From this Constitution of things, the Sovereign and the Slave receive equal Advantage, the Benefits and the Conveniencies are alike on both sides (d). Yet it would be the greatest Absurdity imaginable to believe, that Nature actually invests the Wise with the Sovereignty over the Weak and Imprudent, or with a Right of forcing them to submit and obey against their Wills. For no Sovereignty can be actually establish'd, unless some Human Deed or Covenant precede. Nor does a Natural fitness for Government presently make a Man Governour over another, who is as Naturally adapted for Subjection; nor, supposing a thing to be profitable for another, is it therefore lawful for me to force it upon him against his Inclination. For all Men enjoy a Natural Liberty in the same Measure and Degree, which before they suffer to be impair'd or diminish'd; there must intervene either their own Consent; Express, Tacite, or Interpretative, or some Fact of theirs, by which others may obtain a Right of Abridging them of their Liberty by Force, in case they will not part with it by a Voluntary Submission. 'Twas therefore well urged by Quintilian's Declaimer (e). What hath Nature produced amongst all her Works which she hath not set in a State of Freedom? I forbear to speak of Slaves, whom the hard Chance of War hath deliver'd up as a Prey to the Conquerours, though they were born by the same Laws, by the same Necessity, by the same Accidents contributing to their Original. They draw Breath out of the same free and common Air; and 'twas not the Decree of Nature which gave them Masters, but the Unkindness of Fortune. 'Tis a Maxim of Ulpian, that all Men by a Natural Right are born free (1); which Freedom Grotius interprets, 'To be such as is only a Privation of Servitude, not a Contradiction to it; that is, it provides, a Man shall not be by Nature a Slave, but it gives him no Right that he shall not become a Slave afterwards; for no Man is in such a Sense Free, as that it shall be impossible for him to lose his Liberty. The same Truth may be thus explain'd in other words; since Nature hath produc'd all Men Equal, and since Servitude cannot be conceiv'd without Inequality, (for Servitude necessarily brings in a Distinction of Superior and Inferior: whereas in the Notion of Liberty, it is not Requisite that we should have an Inferior, but 'tis sufficient that we are Subject to no Superior;) it follows that all Men Naturally, and Antecedently to any Human Deed, are conceiv'd to be Free. But Natural Ability, or the Possession of such Qualities as are Requisite for any State, do not immediately set a Man in that State. Every one who hath Capacity enough to rule a People, or to command an Army, is not without more adoe a King or a General. Nor can such an accomplish'd Man as Horace's Lollius presently challenge to himself the Consular Fasces; tho' he fully answer that fine Character,

(c) And therefore Strabo, l. 1. speaking of those who advised Alexander to treat all Grecians as Friends, and all Barbarians as Enemies, wisely observes, that the Distinction ought rather to have been founded in the Goodness, and Badness of the Persons; many Grecians being wicked and cruel, many Barbarians virtuous and obliging. (d) Apuleius in Philosoph. delivers the same Opinion. It is most agreeable, says he, that a Man who is neither by Nature nor Industry, prepared for a Right way of living, should not govern but be govern'd; should be a Servant not a Master; should upon account of his own Weakness and Incapacity be under the Controul of others; should sustain the Part of Obeying, not of Commanding. (e) Declam. 13.

— Est animus tibi
Rerumq; prudens, & secundis
Temporibus dubiisq; rectus.
Vindex avaræ fraudis & abstinens
Ducentis ad se cuncta pecuniæ;

A Mortal Enemy to Knaves,
And Gold that makes them: Gold enslaves
The wicked World, but owns its Charms
A Match too weak for Vertues Arms.
Not Consul of a single Year, &c.

And what Plutarch reports of Pelopidas, that he held the Supream Command longer than the Laws allow'd of, least his Successors thro' Idleness or Mismanagement, should prejudice the Affairs of the State, must be look'd on as an Instance, not of any standing Right, but of an extraordinary Indulgence (a).

And here too we have an Opportunity of interpreting that saying of Albutius in Seneca (b), which is commonly cited on this Subject. By Nature a Man is neither Bond nor Free; 'twas Fortune that afterwards introduc'd these Names. That is, so long as all Men were Equal, they could not be distinguish'd in our Mind by such a State as is opposite to their Natural State of Equality. But afterwards, when those who lost or quitted that Natural State, got the Appellation of Bondmen, in like manner those who retain'd it did now entirely engross the Title of Free. The Thing may be explain'd by this familiar Instance in a like Case; so long as there are no Military Men in a State, the Subjects all keep the same common Name and Condition; but when part of the Subjects are list'd into armed Troops, the Distinction of the Souldiery and the Country immediately arises. And according to this Explication may we admit of that Notion, which Aristotle (c) cites and rejects, that Bondage and Freedom owe their Original to Law. For were not Servitude introduced by human Compacts and Constitutions, such a Difference would be unintelligible, all Men being placed by Nature in the same equal State; as the Emperor speaks in the Institutions (d), whereas before all Men enjoy'd the same general Name, the Law of Nations brought in three kinds of Men, Liberti, Servi, and Libertini; Men that are born Free, Men that are Slaves, Men that being at first Slaves have obtain'd their Freedom. Or it may be enough to justify that Saying, which Aristotle dislikes, to give it this Sense, the Rights of Liberty and Servitude, as they are consider'd in Men living under settled Governments, are defined by Civil Laws.

Many other Considerations there are of sufficient Strength, to overthrow that vain and gross Opinion of Slaves by Nature. For there is scarce any Man so dull and stupid, but he fancies it will be more proper and convenient for him to live according to his own Inclinations, than to submit himself to the Command, and to the Pleasure of another. This Natural Desire appears more evidently in whole Nations, none of which are ever so low-spirited as to prefer a Foreign Governour to a Prince of their own Country and Race. Lastly, since Nature does not actually constitute any Superiority or Government, and since those Natural Slaves whom Aristotle speaks so much of, are commonly Men of strong Hands and able Bodies, there would be a hard Scuffle betwixt them and their wiser Neighbours for the Mastery; in which Contention the latter Party with all their Sagacity, could not promise themselves any infallible Success. Aristotle's Argument borrow'd from the Poets, deserves likewise to be thrown out as most Arrogant and Unreasonable. Therefore, says he (e), the Poets tell us, 'tis just the Greeks should rule the Barbarians, as if to be a Barbarian, and to be a Slave were naturally the same thing (f). For according to this Doctrine, if we had a Mind to destroy any Nation differing from us in Customs and Manners, it were only to Brand them with the reproachful Name of Barbarians, and then to invade them without farther Colour or Excuse. It is manifest, that this absurd Notion of the Grecians arose chiefly from hence, that they were wholly inclin'd to a Democratical Government: whereas their Mighty Neighbours the Persians were constant Maintainers of a Monarchy, whom for this and other Reasons they mortally hated beyond all Bounds of Justice or Humanity. On this account Isocrates (a) calls the Persians οἱ ἐχθροὶ τοῦ ἑλληνισμοῦ, Enemies by Nature to the Greeks, 'And says that in the general Councils or Assemblies, before any Business was transacted, a Solemn Curse was denounc'd against those who should desire Peace or Friendship with the Persians; and that at the Great Feast of the Mysteries, the Publick Heralds forbid all of that Nation, as Murderers, to be present at the Holy Ceremony.

As for Aristotle's whole Discourse on this Subject, we shall put a more Respectful and a more Favourable Construction on his words, if we say that by making two kinds of Servitude, Natural and Legal, he means the former to be when a Man of more Strength than Wit, serves another, whose Parts and Genius dispose him for Command; in which Case both enjoy a Condition most agreeable to their Nature and their Necessities. And that the Legal Servitude which he speaks of, is when a Person of good Endowments and Abilities of Mind, is thro' the Meanness of his Birth, or the Hardness of his Fortune, compell'd either by his own Fear, or by publick Constitutions to serve a Master Inferior to himself in those Accomplishments of Mind; and whenever this happens, 'tis scarce possible but that the Vassal should hate his Lord; whereas on the other hand, these Relations produce a firm Love and a kind of Friendship, when each Party bears that Character which is most suitable to his Disposition and to his Power. But still this must be fixt as a most undoubted Principle, that the bare force of such a Natural Aptitude, does neither give the one a Right of imposing a Condition of Servitude, nor oblige the other to receive it.

IX. It will be proper to add somewhat in short, concerning the other kind of Equality, which differs from the former, in that it is rather a Consequent, than an Ingredient of the State of Nature; we may call it an Equality of Power, or of Liberty, by which all Men are reckon'd Naturally Equal in this Respect, that Antecedently to any Deed or Compact amongst them, no one hath Power over another, but each is Master of his own Actions and Abilities. This Equality is taken away when Men enter into a Civil State, where whilst one or more are invest'd with the Power of Commanding, and all the rest enjoyn'd the Duty of Obeying, there arises the greatest Inequality imaginable between the Sovereign and the Subject. But since there still appears some Inequality, even between the Fellow Subjects, not only with regard to Honour and Esteem (b), but likewise as to the Power which one obtains over another; we may observe that part of this Inequality proceeds from the State of Fathers of Families, who being the chief Rulers before the Institution of Publick Governments, brought into such Governments the Power which they before held over their Wives, their Children, and their Servants (1). So that this Inequality being more Ancient than the Erection of Civil States, can by no means owe its Original to them; nor do they give this Power to the Fathers of Families, but leave it in their Hands as they found it; tho' in some Places it is thought convenient very much to abridge, and to restrain it. If any further Inequality, as to Power, be discoverable amongst Fellow-Subjects, it is plain the Fountain and the Occasion of it must be the supream Civil Authority. For those whom we suppose to have pass'd into a Publick State, did at their Entrance on it, make over to their Common Sovereign, so much of the Power which they before possess'd, as was necessary to support this new Constitution. And therefore in case any Person had before this Change transferr'd to another, any Right over himself, that Right would either cease and be extinct in the present Regulation, or it must submit to the Pleasure and Disposal of the Superior Authority. But after a Man hath once join'd himself as a Member to any Civil Community, he cannot on any Account give another such Power over himself, as shall hold Valid against the Right, acquired by the Chief Ruler; since this would be to admit two Independent Masters, whom 'tis impossible to serve both at once. Whatever Inequality therefore amongst Fellow-Subjects commences, after the Settlement of the Civil State, must take its Rise, either from the Publick Administration, on account of which the Sovereign conveys by Delegacy, to some of the Subjects, a Command over others; or from some certain Privilege, granted by the same Supream Governing Power. But Disparity of Riches does not of it self, cause any Inequality amongst Fellow-Subjects; only as great Wealth affords Men matter of actual Hurt or Benefit to others, on which Score the Poorer sort are wont to seek the Favour of the Rich, by the most submissive Methods of Address, either to obtain Advantage, or to secure themselves from Injury (c). But there is nothing in this Civil Inequality, any ways Repugnant to those Precepts, which we have before deduced from a Natural Equality.

C H A P. III.

Of the Mutual Duties of Humanity.

IT is but a poor thing not to have hurt another, or not to have robb'd him of his just Esteem (1): this Negative Kindness to a Man will barely hinder him from having any fair Reason to hate, but can give him little Encouragement to love, us. To knit Men's Minds more strongly together, it is necessary to add to this Forbearance of mutual Evil, the real Practice of mutual Good. The Debt which I owe upon Account of my being a sociable Creature I have not yet Discharg'd, whilst I have not estrang'd a Man's Affection from me by any Mischievous or Distastful Deed; but I ought farther to promote his actual Profit and Benefit, that I may shew it is a Pleasure to me to see others Partners of my Nature, and Sharers with me in the World which we possess. The near Relation which Men Naturally bear one to another, is lost, unless it be cherish'd and kept up by a constant Commerce of kind Offices betwixt them (a). It was a noble Saying of Plato (b). Ἐκείσδε ἡμῶν ἐκ αὐτῶ μόνον γέγενεν, ἀλλὰ τῆς ἀρέσσεως ἡμῶν τὸ μὲν πῆ πατεῖς μείξεται, τὸ δὲ π οἱ ζυνήσαντες τὸ δὲ οἱ λοιποὶ φίλοι. Which Passage Tully has thus borrow'd and enlarg'd upon in his Offices. Non nobis solum nati sumus, &c. We are not born for our selves alone; our Country, our Parents, and our Friends have all a Share, and an Interest in our Being. 'Tis a Maxim with the Stoicks, that as the Earth and all the Productions of it were created for the Use of Men, so Men themselves were, for the sake of Men, brought into the World, that they might Assist, and Benefit each other. In this we ought to follow the Guidance of Nature, to bring common Goods together, and freely lay them in Common, and by an Intercourse of giving and receiving kind Offices, by Art, Industry, and by

How much more ugly and deform'd a Sin will it then be, for a Man to rejoyce in the Afflictions and Calamities of others, especially of Innocent Persons; or on the other side to grieve and repine at the Prosperity of his Neighbours?

II. Now we may promote the good of other Men, either Indefinitely or Definitely, and this either so as to part with somewhat of our own or not. A Man Indefinitely advances the Common Benefit, when he so polishes and prepares his Mind or his Body, as to render them useful to the Publick; particularly if by Sagacity of Parts and Judgment, he discover such Inventions, as may serve the Necessities or the Conveniencies of Human Life. Columella (d) observes with great Wisdom, 'That it would be 'a thing of the highest Value, and Advantage 'in the World, if every one were sensible of 'his own Ignorance, and always desirous to 'learn what he knew himself at present to be 'defective in.

Hence it appears, that those Persons are guilty of a Sin against Nature's Law, who neglect to exercise themselves in some honest Art or Employment, but living unprofitable to themselves, and troublesome to others, use their Soul only for Salt, to keep their Body from stinking.

— Numerus tantum & fruges consumere nati; Born only to increase the number of Mankind, and to help to rid, and devour the superfluous Fruits of Nature. For the rooting such useless Animals out of their State, the Egyptians had a Decree, obliging all Men to give in their Names to the Magistrates, and withal to intimate by what Calling or Profession every one got his Lively-hood. He that brought in a false Account, or practis'd an unlawful way of Gain, was punish'd with Death (a). In the same Rank we may justly place those, who having a sufficient Fortune left them by their Ancestors, think their own Industry would be unnecessary trouble, since they have gain'd so fair a Subsistence by the Industry of others; and accordingly sacrifice their Time and Thoughts to Sottishness and Sloth. Nor does Virgil without good Reason assign a Station in Hell, to those useles and unmerciful Wretches.

The Apostle amongst the Reasons, obliging a Man to labour, sets down this as no inconsiderable one, "ἵνα ἔχη μετὰ δόξου τῷ χρεῖαν ἔχοντι, that he may have to give to him that needeth (e). And Horace could ask the covetous Man,

Why should any one undeservedly reduced to Poverty, continue to want whilst you abound?

Such great Churls are like Swine, good for nothing till they are dead. The old Greek Epigram rallies them very pleasantly, and represents them very justly.

Πλεῖστον φασὶ σε πάντες, ἐγὼ δὲ σε φημι πίνεσθαι, Χρήσις γὰρ πλεῖστον μάρτυς, Ἀπυλλόφρανης.

In my Opinion we ought not to judge more favourably of those useles Burthens to the Earth, who under the pretence of Religion, study only the Improvement of a fat Carcass, and in a lubberly Laziness, consume the Fruits of other Mens honest Labour. Zozimus the Historian, though in other Things as Profane as Paganism could make him, yet has pass'd a Censure Just enough, on some of these Monastick Brethren; they abstain (says he) (f) from lawful Wedlock, and fill City and Country with numerous swarms of Men, useful neither for War, nor for any other service of the Commonwealth. Yet they have pursued their Designs with so much Success, from those times to the present Age, that they have engross'd to themselves the greatest part of the Lands and Estates, and under Colour of Communicating all things with the Poor, have almost reduc'd all others to Poverty. To these we may add such begging Strollers, as they tell us are found amongst the Chinese, who fight with their Heads like Rams, till you part them with some piece of Bounty; or such as threaten to lay violent Hands on themselves, unless you give them what their Laziness craves (g). Valerius Maximus justly commends the Custom of the old Massilians, who as he reports the matter, 'Used to shut up their Gates against all such who made the Plea of Religion a Cloak, and Shelter for Idleness; thinking it highly worth their Care to remove by all the Methods of Discouragement, such a false and dronelike Superstition.

On the other Hand, those worthy Persons have been ever celebrated with the highest Praises, whose happy Parts and Study have invented new Arts, and Advantages of living; and then have not kept the Benefit of them to themselves, but communicated them freely to all Mankind. For as Horace observes,

Conceal'd Vertue or Worth, has little Advantage above the dullest Idleness.

Virgil has wisely placed in his Elysian Paradise.

(a) Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 77. Ælian. Var. Hist. l. 4. c. 1. mentions such a Law amongst the Sardians. (b) Æn. 6. (c) Diog. Laert. in. Democrit. (d) Lib. 4. (e) Ephes. IV. 28. (f) L. 6. 5. (g) Of whom see Neuhof. in Legat. (h) Those who instructed, and adorned Life by the invention of Arts. He means those Philosophers that advanced any useful Improvement in the World. Servius ad loc.

Thus Antiquity advanced many to Divine Honours, who had rendered Human Life more Commodious, by being the Authors of useful Discoveries, or of wise and wholesome Institutions (a). Hence the Retirement of great Men, whilst they are capable of serving their Country in Publick Employments, is an Humility, not altogether commendable. And therefore it was too high a strain of Philosophy in Similis, Chief Minister to the Emperour Adrian, when quitting all his Honours and Offices, and spending his last seven Years in the Country, he left this Sentence for his Epitaph. Here lyes Similis, whose Life was to many Years long, but he lived only Seven.

By these and the like Methods then may we promote the Good of others Indefinitely, and in General; or without proposing to serve particularly such or such a Person, but by laying as it were our Benefits in Common, and offering them to the Publick Use. But some on this Point will have the Curiosity to enquire, whether supposing a Man to find such a famous Secret, as what they call the Philosopher's Stone, the Art of changing with little trouble, the meanest Materials into the Richest Metals; whether I say, he ought to Communicate so rich a Discovery. And if any ask so nice a Question, we may venture to resolve it in the Negative, since were it possible to bring this grand Invention into ordinary Practice, Trade would be ruin'd, Inheritances and all kind of Riches would lose the good Force and Authority which they now bear in the World; and the whole Method and decent Orders of Life, would be changed into endless Tumults and Confusion.

III. We may be said to serve or benefit others, more definitely and expressly, when we confer on particular Persons, any thing that may be useful and profitable to them. And this we may often perform, not only without our own Loss and Prejudice, but likewise without giving our selves any Labour or Trouble. To deny, or to grudge another a Kindness of this easy Nature, is justly censured as most detestable Malice and Inhumanity. For such a Power by which we may oblige others, and not injure our selves, unless it be on due Occasion, put into Action and Effect, appears to be Vain, and only turns to the Reproach of him that has it. Hence it is usual to compare such unreasonable Churls to the Dog in the Fable, who refused that Provender to the Oxe's Hunger, which was so improper to satisfy his own. Therefore when we dispense this kind of Benefits, we regard only Man in general or the Common Nature which we all enjoy. Thus Aristotle, when some reproved him for bestowing an Alms on a Vicious Person, wisely answer'd, ὃ δὲ πρόπον, ἀλλὰ τὸ ἀνθρώπων ἡλέησα (b). I did not relieve the Manners, but the Man; or as some report it, ἐκ ἀνθρώπων, ἀλλὰ τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ. Not the Man, but Humanity.

Thus supposing me to be unwilling to keep a thing any longer; either because I am overstock'd, or because the Possession of it is some way troublesome, how barbarous would it look in me, not rather to leave it safe and entire, that it might prove Serviceable to others, than to imbezil and destroy it. The Case indeed is otherwise in War, where we ruine what we cannot keep, lest the Enemy should employ it to our Prejudice.

In like manner we are to allow freely to others, those things which they call res innocuæ utilitatis, things of Innocent Profit, or of Harmless Use. Let us hear Tully settling this Point. As to those things, says he, which Men ought to hold in Common, we may apply to many Cases, the Instructions which Ennius gives us in one Instance.

Quasi lumen de suo lumine accendat, facit:
Nihilominus ipsi luceat cum illi accenderit.*

To set a wandering Traveller in's way,
Is but to light one Candle with another:
Yet put not out your own; let that no less Shine clear, and not be Loser by its Bounty.

From this one Example, we may sufficiently apprehend, that whatsoever we can part with to another, without any Damage to our selves, this it is our Duty to give, though to a Stranger. Of which kind are these cheap and common Benefits, to afford Water from a River, Fire from Fire, good Counsel (c) to a Man that is in doubt or distress. All these things are profitable to the Receiver, without any loss or trouble to the Giver. Wherefore we ought both to use them our selves, and likewise to exhibit them to the Common Good. But in regard, that particular Persons have not much to give, whereas the number of those that want it is almost Infinite, in exercising this Duty of Common Bounty, we must have a respect to Ennius's wise Caution, NIHILOMINUS IPSI LUCEAT; that is, we must keep enough to have the Means of being Liberal to our own Relations and Dependants (d).

Of these Favours, then none is to be debar'd, unless such an one, as by his Abominable Villany, has rendred himself detestable to Mankind, and unworthy the Common Privileges of his Nature. Thus Plutarch (a) reports of those false Accusers, who took away Socrates's Life, 'That the Athenians thinking them 'the vilest Men that lived, express'd so high a 'Degree of Hatred and Aversion to them, that 'they would neither lend them Fire, nor so 'much as answer them when they spoke, nor 'bath themselves in the same Water which they 'had used, but would order their Servant to 'pour it away as Polluted and Defiled, till impatient of a State of Constant Reproach, the 'Wretches became their own Executioners. In the same City, when Men were condemn'd for some Heinous Crimes, it was held unlawful to let them light fire, to be in their Company at an Entertainment, or at any part of Religious Worship (b).

When Seneca says, who will call it a Courtesy or Benefit, to give a piece of broken Bread, an Alms of small Money not worth keeping, or the favour of lighting a Fire; he does by no means deny the Obligation that lies on all Men, freely to dispense their Kindnesses; he only shews how impudent and how base it would be for a Man to value himself on such petit Bounty, and to expect a return like some mighty Benefactor. For although these inconsiderable Offices prove sometimes of great Value and Consequence to the Receiver, yet the Cheapness of them in respect of the Giver, be they never so luckily timed, hinders them from being placed to Account (c).

IV. For the farther Illustration of these Offices of Humanity, Plutarch will do us good Service whilst he discourses so admirably on those old Roman Customs of leaving something always upon the Table, and of never putting out their Lamps. These Practices (says he) (d) serv'd us Lessons of Humanity. For neither is it lawful for us when we have satisfied our own Hunger, to throw away the residue of our Provision, nor to stop up, or any way to conceal a Spring, when we have drank enough of the Water our selves; nor to remove the Marks and Directions of sailing and journeying, after they have serv'd our own Occasions. But all these things are to be left behind us, that they may afterwards prove useful to other Men. In like manner, it is a very unbecoming Niggardliness to put out a Candle, when we have made what use of it we intended; but we ought to leave it, that those who come after us may have the Benefit of its Light. Nay, were it possible to be effected, we ought to lend others our Sight, and our Hearing, and even our Wisdom and Courage, to employ for their Service, whilst going to our Repose, we for sometime lose the use of them our selves (e).

Prometheus, in Lucian, chargeth the Gods with Envy, and Narrowness of Spirit, that they should resent so highly his Action of Communicating Fire to Mankind. 'Since this could 'not be the less for being made Publick, nor 'be it self extinguish'd by lending its Light to 'others.

To the same Head belongs the use of running Water, for the ordinary Occasions of Life. For though Rivers may be the Property of whole States, or of private Persons, yet Humanity enjoyns us to allow the Privilege of drinking, or of drawing for other Uses to any one, not actually engag'd in Hostility against us. We think the Point is settled with more Clearness this way, than if we should say with Grotius, that the River, as a River, is the peculiar Right of such a People, but as running Water it remains in Common. For it seems less agreeable to call the same thing in different Respects, Proper and Common, than to affirm that the use of a thing ought by the Laws of Humanity to lye freely open to all, though the thing it self may be really a Propriety, or Peculiar Now to impute this as a Loan, which would otherwise be lost, and will be immediately repair'd by the Springs, would look most ridiculously Sordid (f). Thus Latona argues with the Lycian Clowns in Ovid Metam. VI.

But though the use of Water is Common, yet the Possession of them may, no doubt be turn'd into a Propriety. On this Account we find the Israelites offering to pay for what Water they or their Cattle should drink, in passing through the Country of Edom (g). However, if the Waters are in great plenty, what the Current throws out at random, we ought freely to afford to all; so far as our Indulgence brings no Trouble or Inconvenience on our selves.

We see then, that Duties of this kind do originally belong to the Law of Nature; yet 'tis not unusual to have many of them farther confirm'd and enjoy'd by Civil Constitutions. It may not be improper to set down an Instance or two. Solon's Law about Wells we find thus recorded by Plutarch. Because the Country hath but few Rivers, Lakes, or large Springs, and most use Wells, which have been dug, he made a Law, that where there was a Publick Well within four Furlongs, all should draw at that; but when it was farther off, they should search after a private Well. And if upon digging ten Fathom deep they could find no Water, that then they should fetch from their Neighbours to the Quantity of about ten Gallons every day. For he thought it prudent to make Provision against Want; not to encourage Idleness. 'The same Author tells us, that Plato in his Laws, permits none to borrow Water from their Neighbours, but such as having first dug in their own Ground as deep as the Clay, could find no Spring. For he would have those only come in for a Share with others, who could not provide for themselves. And the Spartan Legislator Lycurgus, allows a Person in Necessity to make use of the Servant, the Beast, and even the Food of another Man (a).

V. Amongst the same Duties of Humanity, Grotius, L. 2. C. 2. 'Reckons the granting free Passage through any Lands, Rivers, or parts of the Sea, which have fallen under our Propriety, if any have just Occasion to desire it; as suppose when any People expelled out of their own Country, are going to find a new Seat; or when they desire to trade and correspond with a Nation, which we divide from them; or when they are marching to recover what is their own in a just War; or when, being at a Distance from home, they are hastening to the Defence of their Country, at present under some extraordinary Danger or Distress. But we ought to allow this Point a fuller Discussion. Thus much then is clear beyond all Doubt, that in case the Request be made by a small Number of Men unarm'd, and willing to live at their own Charge, Passage is to be granted them, provided they ask it upon an honest and necessary Account. But the Case of great Armies is not so easily to be decided; since the admitting of them may create just Fears and Suspicions in us, not only on their own Account, but in respect of the People, whither they are bound. Grotius maintains, that notwithstanding any such Fear, their Petition is to be complied with for this Reason; 'Cause in that grand Division of things, by which the Primitive Community was abolished, and distinct Proprieties introduced, all may be suppos'd to have reserv'd to themselves, so far the use of each other's Possessions, as should prove serviceable to their Wants, and not injurious to the Owner; and that therefore when any stand in need of such a Use, they have a Right to demand it. If any dislike this Argument, a plainer Reason may be thus offer'd, that the Law of Humanity obliges every Man to allow another the harmless use of his Goods or Possessions; which upon urgent Necessity, may be challeng'd in a forcible manner, in as much as the Denial of it is presum'd to spring, either from Groundless Diffidence, or from wicked Perverseness of Mind. Yet in such Cases, Leave is first to be ask'd fairly and peaceably, and Violence must not force a Passage whilst it is yet uncertain, whether the Lord of the Place grounds his Refusal on any just Reason, or acts only out of a Barbarous and Inhospitable Temper. When Cimon with his Troops broke through the Territories of the Corinthians, without giving Notice to the State, they gave him that handsome Reproof, κὶ γὰρ δούραν κώσαντο ἀλλοτρίαν, ἐκ εισέναι πείτερον ἢ τὸν κύριον καλεῖσαι (b). That when a Man knock'd at another's Door, he forbore in Civility to enter, till the Master had him come in (c).

Those who take the same side of the Question with Grotius, add, that a Fear upon account of the Numbers of those who would enter, doth not seem a sufficient Reason to deny Passage; Since a Multitude as well as a few Persons may inoffensively use this Privilege, and not trespass against the Law of Nature. However, the same Law impowers us to take security of the Men, whom we

This is not properly Love, or any Personal Esteem and Reverence; but a provident Fear of the like Accidents, and a Religious Apprehension of common Dangers. When we relieve a famish'd Wretch, we do but as it were pity our selves. Hence in a Siege we lay our Provision in common. Hence in a Distress at Sea, the Food of one Passenger hath supported the whole Company. And hence too ariseth, that Affection which puts us on covering with Earth, the dead Body of a Stranger; and how hasty soever our Journey be, we never fail stopping, to perform in some sort or other, this pious Office. admit, admit, to engage them to do no Damage, or to repair what they do. For the common Proverb tells us, that Opportunity makes the Thief; and he is a very unwise Master of a House who lets in so many Strangers, as to be turn'd out himself. Nor are there wanting Instances of several Cities, which have lost their Liberty, by unwarily receiving too great a number of Armed Guests. And what should make us more Cautious is, that few Generals deserve the Encomium, which Tully (a) on this Score hath given of Pompey the Great, that he march'd his Legions through Asia, in such a manner, as to keep not only the Hands, but even the Feet of so vast an Army, from committing the least Trespass, on any peaceful and friendly Person. When the Helvetians, or Suisses in the Gallick War, sent Deputies to Cæsar, to beg a Passage through the Roman Province, we find Cæsar rejecting their Petition, on this very good Account, 'He remembered how the same People had formerly defeated and kill'd L. Cassius the Roman Consul, and forced his Soldiers to pass ignominiously under the Yoke; and he imagined it scarce possible, that Men who were Enemies in their Hearts, should pursue their way fairly, and without launching out into any Injury or Disorder (b).

Many ways of taking Caution or Security in this Case are propos'd; as first, that they shall pass through without their Arms; but 'tis very hard to get this Condition accepted of by Military Men; ask them to part with their Weapons, and they take it as if you desired leave to cut off their Hands (c). It may be a more proper Expedient, that the Forces make their Passage in small and separate Bodies, or that Hostages be given for their Peaceable Behaviour. For what some propose, that those who grant the Passage, shall hire sufficient Guards at the Charges of those who desire it, would take up too much Money as well as too much Time.

It is farther said on the same side, that it will not justify us in denying this Favour to alledge, that Passage may be had elsewhere, upon taking a larger Circuit; because should this Pretence always be used, the Request would never be granted, though in the most Reasonable Case, and so the Right would utterly cease and come to nothing. It is sufficient therefore, in their Opinion, if without any Fraudulent Design, Passage be there desired, where it lies most ready and convenient.

Some there are who maintain the Right of free Passage, on this Argument, that High- ways are common to all Mankind, and do not come under the Propriety of those, in whose Territories they lie. As if at the first Creation of the World, the Roads had been chalk'd out immediately by the Divine Hand, and left as Universal Benefits. A Notion too Ridiculous to deserve a serious Refutation.

On the other side there have been good Arguments offer'd, to evince that this Liberty of Passage is not owing by a meer Natural Right, without any Compact or Concession intervening; especially when the Case is, that an Enemy to some of our Neighbouring States desires leave to carry his Troops against them, through our Territories. For it seems to be part of the Duty, which we owe to our Neighbours, especially such as have been kind and friendly, not to suffer any Hostile Power to march along our Country, to their Prejudice, provided we can hinder the Design with no great Inconvenience to our selves (d). And it is indeed one express Article in most Leagues, that neither Party shall grant Passage to the Foes of the other (e). Nor will it solve the Difficulty, to say that we ought to allow Passage, if the War which is undertaken be just; not if it be unjust. For there is commonly much time and much Thought, requir'd to make such a Judgment; and besides it is look'd upon as a piece of Rashness, to thrust in our Arbitration between two armed Parties, without their desiring it, and to constitute our selves Judges of so great a Cause. But farther, supposing we grant the Request, it is very possible, we may by this means fix the Seat of the War in our own Country. For what if the other Party should meet and stop his Adversary, whilst yet in our Borders? And I do not see how we could blame him for this Proceeding, since he is by no means oblig'd to receive the Foe into his own Dominions, on purpose to rid us of the Burthen and of the Trouble. It seems therefore the safest way of Acting in this Case, if we can without any considerable Prejudice to our own Affairs, to deny the Enemy Passage, and actually to oppose him, if he endeavour to force it without our Consent. But if we are either too weak to hinder his Progress, or must on this Score engage in a dangerous War; the Plea of Necessity will fairly justify us to our Neighbour (f).

Ziegler in his Observations on Grotius asserts, that in this Case, no one can Naturally have a Right of passing through the Lands of another, but all such Right must be obtain'd by Compact; just as no Man has the Liberty of going through the Fields of a private Person, unless such a Service is imposed on the Fields, by Virtue of their particular Tenure. He says this will especially hold good, when we have just reason to apprehend Danger from such a Concession. And this Point too he illustrates by a Parallel Case between private Persons. You may have a Right of making a Thorough-fare of Titius's Yard; but if you appear there often with Fire and Torches, so as to endanger the Buildings, Titius's Fear cannot indeed, in this Case, absolutely take away your Right; but he may hinder you from going in so dangerous a manner, and consequently may abridge your Privilege, tho' he cannot annul it. But as to this way of arguing we must observe, that in the Question now before us, we do not by the Liberty of Passage understand any settled and constant Service, but only an Occasional and as it were a Momentary, use of another's Territories or Possessions, to which we are driven, either by Necessity, or by the Prospect of some extraordinary Advantage, when it would be Inhumanity in the other Party, not to comply with our Wants, and with our Request.

(a) Pro Lege Manil. (b) Cæsar Comment. de B. G. l. 1. (c) Florus, l. 3. c. 18. (d) And therefore 'twas unreasonable for the Romans in Livy, B. 21. c. 20. to desire the Gauls, that they would not grant the Carthaginians a free Passage into Italy, and they should rather turn the War upon themselves, and expose their own Country to be wasted for the Security of another, to which they had no Obligation. (e) See the League of the Romans with the Carthaginians in Livy, B. 38. c. 38. and with the Ætoliens, Polyb. Excerpt. Legat. 28. (f) 'Tis remarkable what Plutarch reports in his Life of Lysander, that when the City of Athens was oppress'd by the Thirty Tyrants, the Thebans pass'd a Law, that whoever should carry Arms through Bœotia, against the Athenian Tyrants, should be free from the Notice of the Theban Eyes or Ears.

Examples, which are of so great weight in determining other Questions, have little Force as to the Decision of this. For generally as People have been stronger or weaker, they have required Passage with Modesty, or with Confidence, and have in like manner granted, or refused it to others. 'Agessilaus in Plutarch, when the Trallians (a) demanded an hundred Talents, and as many Women for the Price of his Passage thro' their Country, ask'd them pleasantly, Why the Commissioners were not there ready at hand to receive them; and without farther delay march'd forward, encounter'd and routed them. He sent to the King of Macedon, to desire the same Favour, who answering, that he would take time to consider of it; let him consider of it, says Agessilaus, and in the mean while we will go forward. The Macedonian admiring, and fearing such Spirit and Resolution, humbly requested him to pass at his pleasure.

But the chief Example produced on this Point, is that of the Israelites, when desiring to pass through the Edomites Country, they voluntarily offer'd the following Conditions. 'That they would march along the King's High-way, without turning into the private Fields or Vineyards, and would immediately tender Money for every thing of theirs which they should have Occasion to use. The Edomites rejecting these Terms, and endeavouring in a Hostile Manner to hinder their Passage, they did not think it justifiable to obtain it by Force, but took a large Compass round about their Borders; and when at length they were oblig'd just to touch on some part of their Coasts, they did not take occasion from the former most inhuman Treatment, to commit any Violence or Trespas in their March (b). As to the same People, when Sihon King of the Amorites, not only refused them the like Privilege, but came out Arm'd to oppose them, probably before they had reach'd his Coasts, and therefore set upon them without any Reason or Provocation, we find he was overthrown in the Combat; but he seems to have suffer'd this Fate, not so much for denying them Passage, as for rashly encountering them upon so little Colour or Pretence. For otherwise it would have seem'd too hard, to punish the Neglect of a piece of Humanity with the Ruine of a whole Nation; since it appears that these Amorites were seated without the Borders of the Land of Promise, the Inhabitants of which God Almighty had by a special Decree, adjudg'd to utter Extirpation and Destruction. 'Nor will it alter the Case to say with some, that the Amorites here to make their Fear justifiable, ought not to have rejected so fair Conditions, but should have immediately treated about accepting and regulating them; but that now by refusing all peaceable Conference and Commerce, they had rendred themselves liable to be dealt with, as the most unjust and most unfaithful of Men: For by the common Right and Privilege of Mankind, a Breach of the Law of Humanity, does not deserve the utmost Rigour, and Extremity of Proceeding.

VI. Amongst these Matters of harmless Profit, which Nature engages us to allow freely to all Men, Grotius reckons the permitting Goods and Merchandise, to be carried thro' our Dominions. Ziegler accuses Grotius of a Contradiction on this Point, whilst in one place he says, That no one can have a Right of hindering any Nation from maintaining Traffick and Commerce with any other Nation that is Remote from them; and yet in another place of the same Chapter he grants, That it is lawful for one Nation to contract with another, for all the Goods of one kind not to be found elsewhere; so that no other People shall have the Liberty of buying them. But now by this Contract of Ingrossment, it is plain other Nations are thus far hindered from trading in the same Country. Yet it is easy to bring off Grotius, by saying, that in the former Passage by hindering, he understands not hindering them by Virtue of some precedent Bargain or Covenant, but hindering them by open Methods of Violence. Yet on the whole it must be confess'd, that he has not brought the present Question to a full and clear Decision. For truly speaking, the Law of Humanity does not seem to oblige us to grant Passage to any other Goods, except such as are absolutely Necessary for the support of their Life, to whom they are thus convey'd. But as for those who import such Commodities, as improve and encourage Luxury; or from which those who deal in them do not seek any Supply of real Wants, but rather an Excessive Gain, and an Indulgence to covetous Desires, I do not see what Right they have to demand Passage through our Coasts for this kind of Traffick, or on what Pretensions they can claim such a Privilege as their Due. I confess, there scarce appears any probable Colour on which we should deny unarmed Vessels the Liberty of an open Sea, which we are Masters of, whilst they are bound to a third People, with whom we are at Peace. And to this Point, chiefly relate all those Authorities and Testimonies of Authors usually produced in the main Dispute. But thus much we may reasonably do, we may stop the Vessel in such a Case, and force them to leave their Cargo in our Territories, that we may have the Benefit of the first Purchase. For besides that the frequent Passage of Strangers may, some time, create Danger, or at least may give Suspicions to our State; what should hinder us from deriving that Profit on our own People, which would otherwise be made by Foreigners; since in matters of Favour, we ought constantly to prefer the former to the latter. And though in Strictness it be indeed no Damage to us, if we permit the free Transportation of these Commodities, and tho' the third Party who receives them, does not properly injure us by making a Gain, which 'twas in our Power to have secured before him; yet since he has no Right of excluding us from such a Gain, why ought we not to love our selves best, and to be before-hand with him in the Advantage? which we shall be, if whilst we lye thus in the midst between two People, we take Care not to let such Goods pass from one to the other, without going first through our own Hands. And unless this be admitted for fair and equitable Dealing, I see not on what Grounds we can defend those Staples, and other Rights which we find in some Countries, by Virtue of which Foreign Commodities are stoppt and carried to the publick Place of Sale; and Strangers are permitted to Traffick, not immediately betwixt themselves, but at second-hand with the Natural Subjects.

VII. From what has been said, there may well arise this farther Question, whether the Law of Humanity will permit us to require Toll, or Custom for Goods transported through any Land, River, or narrow Sea, subject to our Dominion. For at first sight it seems Inhuman, not to grant such a Privilege without Price, which the Law before-mention'd, allows freely to all Mankind.

Now why Custom should be imposed on Goods carried over Land, there is this manifest Reason, because such heavy Conveyance sometimes trespasses on the Fields, adjoining to the Common Roads, and because the Sovereign of the Country is put to Charge, both in repairing the Ways, and in securing the Passengers. And farther, if it be necessary to erect Bridges for this purpose, it is plain in Equity that the Sovereign may set up a Toll to reimburse himself for those Expences; and at the same time, he who does require such Toll, is oblig'd not only to let the Bridges stand, but likewise to keep them in constant Repair. Grotius on the 1 Kings X. 19. observes, that a great Toll was paid to Solomon for the Horses brought thro' Judea from Egypt, to the Syrians, or to the Hittites; and thus too no Frankincense was transported without Custom. The like Impositions are reasonable in those Places, where by the Industry of the Natives, the Roads are rendred more short or more easy; as by the filling up of Pits and Ditches, or by other useful Labours, for the Convenience of Passengers and of Goods. Thus of old, had any one cut through the Isthmus, and join'd the Ionian and Agean Seas, he might fairly have required some moderate Toll of the Merchants and Sailors; which they would not have been unwilling to give, the Voyage being now perform'd with more Expedition and more Security. And though this Project was never set on foot, Strabo informs us, 'That the Merchants of Asia and Italy, rather than pass out of one of these Seas into the other, by the tedious and dangerous Coast of Malca, were extremely well satisfy'd to put in at Corinth, and so carry their Effects over Land; notwithstanding the Duties to be paid there for all Imported or Exported Goods. Another Reason which some bring to assert the Equity of Impositions on Land-Carriage, is this, that by so perpetual Confluence of Strangers, the price of Provisions is exceedingly rais'd. To which we may add in Conclusion, that a Sovereign, on this Account, requires some Acknowledgment from the Goods of Foreigners, because he suffers them by passing through his Territories, to receive such Goods immediately from a third People; whereas should he erect a Staple, the Gain and Benefit would be fairly intercepted by his own Subjects.

As to River Tolls, this amongst other Arguments, may be offer'd to justify them, that since the Water by continually preying on the adjoining Lands, and sometimes by overflowing them, is the Cause of no inconsiderable Damage, for the Prevention of which it is often necessary to secure them with Banks and other Works of great Charge and Labour, it seems by no means unreasonable, that towards the making up of these Losses, some moderate Consideration should be allowed by those who gain Advantage by the River, without being concern'd in its ordinary Mischiefs. It is true in the Capitularies of Charles the Great (a), one Order forbids to take Toll in those Rivers,

Ubi nullum adjutorium præstatur itinerantibus, where no Assistance is given to the Passengers; but this Constitution seems to have been made in Favour of the Natural Subjects, and there is no necessity of extending it to Foreigners.

It is a more difficult Point, to state the Equity of Tolls demanded in Seas. This indeed is beyond Dispute, that the Sovereign of a Sea may impose Duties answerable to the Charge, which he bestows about it; as for the setting up of Marks near Rocks and Quick-sands, for the keeping of Fires to direct Vessels in the Night, or for scowring the Coasts of Pirates. But whatever is demanded farther, than upon these Accounts, will not admit of so good Defence; in as much as the Passage of unarmed Ships is plainly one of those harmless Benefits which Humanity lays in Common. Yet where such Pretensions are made, the Pleas which support them do not seem altogether absurd; as that no one ought to be blamed for making the Best of his Dominions, and for raising such Profits from his Waters as others do from their Land. That, since he who enters the Territories of another, is for that time his Subject, we may compel the Ships of Foreigners, whilst they pass through our Sea, to let our Subjects have the first Purchase of their Goods; and that if we give up this Claim, we may require some reasonable Consideration in Lieu of it. That although we cannot perhaps set up a Staple in such a Sea, because the third Nation whither those Ships are bound, may not have the use of Sailing, and therefore cannot fetch the Goods from us, neither have we, it may be, the Liberty of carrying them thither; yet it ought not to be thought hard if we put in for some little Share in the Gain, since we permit Strangers to sail through our Water, with so much Expedition and Convenience. But upon the whole, it must be confessed, that since this Toll by Sea is, for I know not what Reason, accounted more Odious than what is demanded by Land, it ought to be exercised with great Prudence and Moderation, and without the least Appearance of Extortion or Avarice. And after all, there may, 'tis very likely, be a Sovereign (or Two) who shall claim an Exemption from the common Duty, and build his Pretensions on good Reason; as that his Dominions bordering on the same Sea, enclose it so at both ends, as to give him a fair Title to its use; or that on such a use of it, his Commerce with Foreign Nations, and consequently the Good and Safety of his own People almost entirely depends. For in these Cases it would be unreasonable, that to obtain the Liberty of a harmless Passage by Sea, he should be reduc'd to a kind of Tributary Condition; nor will any one be much inclin'd to censure him, if upon so odious a Provocation he endeavour by any possible Means, to free himself from such Exaction and Oppression. Nor will it render his Resentments less justifiable, to alledge on the other side, that other Nations have agreed to pay the Imposition: because their Support and Safety is not so immediately concern'd in the use of such a Sea, and therefore they may afford to allow the Sovereign of the Sea a share in their Gains, without Grudging or Repining. As the Case is very different, whether a Man desires a Way through my Grounds, because without this Privilege, he would be as it were excluded from the World, and confined to Solitude, or because he could not otherwise carry off the Fruit of his own Land; and whether he makes the same Demand, purely to shorten his Passage, and imposes a Burthen on my Estate, not to relieve his own Necessity, but to promote his Convenience and Ease.

They tell us, that the King of Abyssinia, or Ethiopia pretended of old to a certain Tribute from Egypt; upon account that the River Nile, to which that Country owes its fruitfulness, took its rise in his Dominions; and that afterwards when the Turks had seiz'd on Egypt, and used great Severities towards the Christians, the Abyssinian Prince made an attempt to have turn'd the Channel of the Nile into the Red-Sea, but without effect. These Pretensions and these Proceedings, which bear some Relation to the Case before us, we cannot but look upon as unjust.

Some would determine this whole Business by the means of Compact and Covenant, which Method we think not to be altogether accurate and decisive. For it remains still in Question, what was the original reason of these Covenants; and whether the Master of the Sea may deny passage to others, until such time as they shall enter into the same Articles of Agreement. Though indeed when such a Covenant has once pass'd without any Natural Flaw or Weakness, which might render it invalid, both Parties are oblig'd strictly to observe it; so that the People who use the Passage desired, ought on no account to deny the settled Imposition, and the Master of the Sea shall not raise the Duty higher, than what has been thus establish'd by joint Consent (a). Nicephorus (*) reports, that the Caliph of Egypt obtain'd by Covenant of the Emperour of Constantinople, Licence for the Merchants of his Country to pass through the Thracian Bosphorus. Which Privilege was therefore so easily granted at first, because it seem'd a matter of little Importance. But when in course of time it appear'd to be a Point of very considerable Consequence, it was found impossible to revoke the Grant, after it had been by long Custom enforced and establish'd.

But in Case the opposite Shore is possess'd by another People, so that the Sea is either held in common by both, or else as a middle Point divides the Confines of the two Dominions, he cannot at present hire Lodgings for his Money. And therefore in Ancient Times, when Publick Inns either were not in use, or else were accounted Scandalous, and unworthy to receive a good and vertuous Guest, the Necessity of this Duty was greater and more strictly binding than it is now in most parts of Europe, where we meet with so many of these Houses, exactly fitted and furnisht, not only for all Use and Convenience, but even for Ornament and Splendor.

Now although Inhospitality be commonly, and for the most part justly censured, as the true mark of a Savage and Inhumane Temper, yet the Point will now and then bear a Dispute, especially as to the Case of those who wander into Foreign Countries, purely on the account of Curiosity; whether or no such Persons may claim free Admission by any Natural Right. The Spartans to justify themselves in driving all Strangers from their Coasts, thought this one Reason sufficient, lest the Converse of Strangers should introduce a Corruption, or a Contempt of their receiv'd Manners and Customs (a). In answer to which it is well urged by some, that what we practice at home is not always the best, nor what others do abroad the worst; if then a Foreign Custom be really better, it is absurd to despise, and to reject it on the score of its being Foreign. That this is the Temper and Property of Curs to fawn on Dome-stick Slaves, and to bark at the most noble and excellent of Strangers. That those Men usually contract a Roughness and Clownishness of Behaviour, who never breath out of their native Air, and see no more of the World than what passes under their Nose (b). As to the Question before us then, thus much is certain, that if our People are kindly receiv'd by any Nation abroad, we ought to entertain the Men of that Nation with an equal return of Civility. As on the other hand, those who drive us from their Coasts, cannot without the most stupid impudence, petition us for a more courteous Treatment. But supposing that any one Nation contented with what it finds at home, utterly refrains from all Foreign Travel, it does not appear what Obligation such a State can have to admit those who would visit it, without necessary or weighty Cause. The Case is somewhat like that of a private Man, who in his House or Gardens, possesses some rare Curiosity, or other valuable Sight; such an one does not apprehend himself, tied freely to let in all Spectators; but whoever is thus gratified either rewards, or at least acknowledges, it as an extraordinary Favour. And this seems the more reasonable, because the Grounds of prudent Caution and Suspicion are so numerous, that we may easily make use of one or other of them, to justify us in keeping such Persons at a distance, as would too curiously examine and pry into our Affairs.

Therefore the Spanish Casuist (c) has not made many Converts by the Reasons he lays down to justify his Countrymen in their Proceedings against the Indians. The first Right on which he founds their Title, is that of Natural Society and Communication, which he draws up into this Assertion, the Spaniards had a Right of travelling and of living in those Countries, provided they did the Natives no Harm, and from this Privilege none could restrain them. In reply to which it is well urged, that this Natural Communication does not hinder a just Proprietor from communicating his Goods by such Methods, and upon such Considerations as he finds necessary. And farther, that it seems very Gross and Absurd, to allow others an Indefinite or unlimited Right of travelling and of living amongst us, without reflecting either on their Number, or on the design of their coming; whether supposing them to pass harmlessly, they intend only to take a short view of our Country, or whether they claim a Right of fixing themselves with us for ever. And that he who will stretch the Duty of Hospitality to this extravagant Extent, ought to be rejected as a most unreasonable, and most improper Judge of the Case. The Second Principle he lays down is, that it was lawful for the Spaniards to traffick with those People, and the Sovereigns on either side could not hinder their Subjects from such Intercourse. But here Men of more sober and moderate Judgments, confess themselves unable to find out any such liberty of Trading, as Princes may not abridge their Subjects of, for the good of the Commonwealth; much less such as shall force and obtrude Strangers upon us, whether we will or no. His third Reason is this. If the Indians had amongst them any Rights and Privileges allow'd in Common to Natives and Foreigners, in these they ought not to hinder the Spaniards from their Share; for Example, if other Strangers were permitted to dig Gold, the Spaniards might fairly claim the same Liberty.

amongst the Crimes which brought Deucalion's Flood upon the World we find these which follow. They practis'd all kinds of Injustice; for they neither kept their Oaths nor receiv'd Strangers, nor gave a patient Hearing to the request of the Miserable. Of the Humanity which the Indians shew to Strangers, See Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 42. Add. Plato de L. L. l. 12. Ælian (V. H. l. 4. c. 1.) recites this Law of the Lucanians, if at Sun-set, a Stranger arrives, and desires Reception in a House; in case the Master refuse to admit him, let him be punish'd as an Offender against the Laws of Hospitality. Add. Lex Burgund. Tit. 30. f. 1. Helmoldus (in Cron. Slav. l. 1. c. 82.) reports of the ancient Slavi, If a Man be discover'd to have denied lodging to a Stranger, (a Rudeness which seldom happens amongst them) the People joyn in a Body to pull down his House, and to ruin his Estate; which way of proceeding is permitted by the Laws. Philo. Jud. in his Life of Moses, says, that Strangers have the same Rights as Suppliants. (a) The Chinese have much the same Constitutions in reference to Strangers. Vid. Neuhof. Gen. Descript. Chin. c. 1. (b) In Livy (l. 41. c. 24.) The Decree of the Achaans, by which they forbid the Macedonians to enter their Territories, is call'd exsecrabilis velut desertio juris Humani, as it were a detestable Desertion of the Law of Human Nature. 'Tis a saying of Periander in Plutarch (Sympos) I commend those States and those Magistrates, which first give Audience to Strangers, and then to their own Subjects. (c) Franciscus a Victoris Reliq. 5. f. 3.

On which Point some have judged it worth considering, first, whether those Privileges were granted to others, by way of Debt, or by way of free Gift and Favour. For of those things which Men cannot claim from me as strictly their Due, I may be more liberal to one than to another. And in the next place, whether these new Comers will behave themselves with the same Justice and Modesty as the former, who made use of our Goods without our Prejudice or Inconvenience; and whether these late Guests propose no other End of their Visit. Suppose I give one or two of my Neighbours leave to come into my Garden, as often as they please, and to gratifie themselves with tasting my Fruit; it may be, there breaks in afterwards a rude He&tor, who is for tearing up my Trees, and would kick me out, to plant his own Body in my proper Land; my Case is bad if I may not be allow'd to shut the Gate against such an Intruding Villain (a). But let others settle this Controversy. As to our main Question, it is look'd on by most as the safest way of resolving it, to say, that it is left in the power of all States, to take such Measures about the Admission of Strangers, as they think convenient; those being ever excepted, who are driven on the Coasts by Necessity, or by any Cause that deserves Pity and Compassion. Not but that it is barbarous to treat in the same cruel manner, those who visit us as Friends, and those who assault us as Enemies (b). The free Admission of Ambassadors, is deduced from another Head (c).

But having once admitted Strangers and Foreign Guests, to turn them out again, unless upon good Reason, is usually censured as some Degree at least of Inhumanity (d). From the number of these good Reasons, St. Ambrose and with him Grotius (e) excludes the Case of Grievous Scarcity and Dearth afflicting a People. To whose Judgment we subscribe with this Supposition, that there are still Means left, though perhaps very hard and pressing, to save both Natives and Strangers, and if the latter have been formerly, or may be hereafter useful and serviceable to us; and of such only St. Ambrose speaks. But in case we are not obliged to the Foreigners amongst us, and there be no Necessity of their perishing, should we send them off, there seems to be no reason why the Subject on their Account, should be content to struggle with a Famine (f).

X. In the same Class of Duties, Grotius (g) places the allowing of a perpetual Habitation to Strangers, who being driven by Violence out of their own Country, are forced to seek out a new Seat, provided still, that they submit to the establish'd Government, and behave themselves with such Prudence and Decency, as to administer no Occasion to Factions and Seditious (h).

Humanity, it is true, engages us to receive a small number of Men expell'd their Home; not for their own Demerit and Crime; especially if they are eminent for Wealth or Industry, and not likely to disturb our Religion, or our Constitution. And thus we see many States to have risen to a great and flourishing Height, chiefly by granting Licence to Foreigners to come and settle amongst them; whereas others have been reduced to a low Condition, by refusing this Method of Improvement.

But no one will be fond of asserting, that we ought in the same manner to receive and incorporate a great Multitude, especially if now in Arms; or naturally addicted to War; since it is scarce possible, but that their Admission should highly endanger the Natives. Therefore every State may be more free or more cautious in granting these Indulgences, as it shall judge proper for its Interest and Safety. In order to which Judgment, it will be Prudent to consider, whether a great increase in the Number of Inhabitants will turn to Advantage; whether the Country be fertile enough to feed so many Mouths; whether upon Admission of this new Body, we shall be straitned for room; whether the Men be industrious or idle; whether they may be so conveniently placed and disposed, as to render them incapable of giving any Jealousy to the Government. If on the whole, it appears that the Persons deserve our Favour and Pity, and that no restraint lies on us from good Reasons of State, it will be an Act of Humanity to confer such a Benefit on them, as we shall neither feel very Burthen-some at present, nor are likely to repent of hereafter. If the Case be otherwise, we ought so to temper our Pity with Prudence, as not to put our selves in the ready way of becoming Objects of Pity unto others. Farther, since whatever we bestow on such Petitioners, we may justly reckon as a matter of free Bounty in us, hence it follows, that they are not presently to lay hands on what they please, nor to fix themselves as it were by some Right, in any spot of Waste-Ground they find among us; but that they ought to rest satisfied with the Station and the Privileges we assign them (i).

————— A Stranger should conform
In Manners to the State that entertains him.

So amongst the Articles of Peace proposed by Aeneas
in Virgil, we find this for one:

(i) What hath been said may be illustrated by these Historical Examples. Latinus, in Virgil Æn. 11. offers the Trojans this Condition:

————— Sorer arma Latinus,
Imperium solenne socer., Æn. 12.

Latinus shall the Regal Scepter bear,
Latinus first in Peace, and chief in War.

XI. The next Office of Humanity mention'd by Grotius, is that we allow every Man the Privilege of procuring for himself, by Money, Work, exchange of Goods, or any other lawful Contract, such things as contribute to the convenience of Life; and that we do not abridge him of this Liberty, either by any Civil Ordinance, or by any unlawful Combination, or Monopoly. For that as Trade and Commerce highly promote the Interest of all Nations, by supplying the unkindness of the Soil, which is not every where alike Fertile, and by making those Fruits seem to be born in all places of the World, which are to be found in any one (a): So it cannot be less than Inhumanity to deny any Son of the Earth the use of those good Things, which our common Mother affords for our support; provided our peculiar Right and Propriety be not injured by such a Favour. And therefore the Megarensians (in Plutarch) when the Athenians had forbidden them entrance to all their Ports and Mart-Towns complain'd that this was done παρὰ τὴν νόμῳ δίκαια, contrary to the Law of Nations.

But this Assertion will admit of many Restrictions. For we do not seem in Duty oblig'd to communicate to others such Goods, as belong not to the Necessities, but to the Pleasure and the Superfluity of Life. And then, if Scarcity lies upon us, we may justly keep what we have to our selves. Could Joseph have discover'd that the Corn of Egypt was not sufficient to support the Natives, under the seven Years Famine, he might with good reason have forbid the Exportation of it to Foreigners (b). So the Athenians once decreed it to be Capital for any Subject of that State, to carry Corn for Sale, any where but to Athens (c). Besides, we may fairly exclude others from Trafficking with us for things not absolutely needful for the support of Life, when by such a Permission, our own Country would

Mr. Dryden.

Servius on this Passage observes, from Cato's Origines, that the Land here mention'd, contain'd 100 Acres. He tells us likewise, for fear we should think that the King was liberal of what did not belong to him, that to those words Aurunci Rutulique; ferunt, we must joyn the michi in the preceding Verse; the Auruncans and Rutilians having that Country allow'd them in a way of free Stipend, or else being placed there by the King as his Husbandmen, to manage the Crown Lands. The Story is told more at large by Dionys. Halicarnass. L. 1.

The Cimbrians in Florus (1. 3. c. 3.) Petition the Roman Senate, that so Brave and Warlike a People would give them a little Portion of Land as a kind of Pay, promising in return, that their Hands and their Weapons should be ever employ'd in the Cause of Rome. But (as the Historian there reflects) what Land could the Romans give them without quarrelling amongst themselves, on the point of such Arbitrary Distributions? And how could the Senate without manifest Injustice, dispose of the Property of private Men? Besides, possessing so many things as were likely to raise the Appetite of needy Strangers, they judg'd it unsafe to admit so strong and so fierce a Nation into their Limits.

In Cæsar (de B. G. 1. 4.) the Teneteri and Uspites petition'd in this boasting manner; that they did not voluntarily leave their own Country to seek a foreign Seat; that if the Romans would accept of their Service, they were able to shew themselves no unprofitable Friends; only they desire some Lands to be assign'd them, or to have the Privilege of keeping what they had already gotten by their Arms. The Answer which Cæsar sent them was to this purpose, that 'twas unreasonable in those Men to invade another Country, who could not defend their own. That there were no vacant Lands in Gallia; especially not to hold so vast a Multitude, without prejudice or danger. Though indeed he had still another more secret Reason, why he would not have those new Neighbours.

In Tacitus (A. XIII. c. 55.) the Antibarri being at a loss for a Dwelling, having therefore seated themselves in some Lands beyond the Rhine, belonging to the Romans; excused themselves, not altogether unreasonably, in these words; that the main part of the Land was useless; being only employ'd now and then by chance in feeding Beasts for the Army. That the Romans ought to resign a place which was fill'd only with Beasts, when they might relieve the distress of Men; and prefer Friends and Subjects to Desarts and Solitudes. That as Heaven was possess'd by the Gods, so Earth was given to Mankind; and what Parts were void of Inhabitants, lay in Common to all the World. (Which Principle Sir Thomas More establisheth amongst his Utopians. 1. 2.) This Message deserv'd a more favourable Answer than those most haughty Words of Avitus, that they ought to submit to the pleasure of their Betters. That the Gods whose Assistance they now implore, had chosen the Romans to be Commanders of the World, and to dispose of it as they should think convenient, without suffering any other Judges but themselves.

The Emperour Probus settled an hundred Thousand of the Bastarna in the Roman Territories; who all proved fruitful and quiet. But He using the same Liberty of Transplanting vast numbers from other Nations, as from the Gepidi, the Gæturanni, the Vandals, &c. all these broke their Promise, and whilst the Emperour was engaged in the War against the Tyrants, wandred by Sea and Land, almost thro' the whole World, and spread no small Cloud on the Glory of Rome. Flav. Vopisc.

So likewise in Ammianus Marcellinus, the Goths deserting their Seat for fear of the Huns, begg'd leave of Valens to fix themselves in Thrace, promising to live quietly, and to lend him their Service when he should have Occasion. Soon after other barbarous People put up the same Request, to whom Valens granted the like Favour, hoping that from these Numbers he might draw Men for his Troops, without any great charge. Yet this Indulgence proved afterwards his Ruin; as the Historian demonstrates at large. Add. Socrat. Hist. Eccles. Chap. 4. Chap. 28.

(a) Liban. Orat. 3. God hath not enriched every place with all his Blessings; but hath divided his Gifts according to the difference of Countries, that he might incline Men to Society, by the want of mutual Assistance; and he discover'd to Men the way of Trading, that what was the product of any particular Soil, might by this means be enjoy'd in Common, by the Whole World. (b) Quintil. Declam. 12. whilst we were selling to the Neighbouring Nations, and urged on by the hopes of ready Gain, we neglected a due Regard to the Publick Safety; and having emptied our Stores abroad, brought a Famine upon our selves at home. (c) Lycurg. Orat. contra Leontar.

lose a considerable Advantage, or sustain (tho' by indirect Consequence,) some notable Evil. For Example, one Kingdom suppose produces admirable Horses; what should hinder the Government there from passing an Act to prohibit the carrying into Foreign Parts, any that are fit for breed? For should the fine Strain grow Common, the Country would lose its greatest Profit, and its greatest Ornament. And this Beautiful Race is affected abroad, not for necessary use, but for Pomp and Pride, for Elegance and Ease (a). In one of the old Roman Constitutions, it is made Capital to carry Wine, Oyl, or Arms to the barbarous Nations. They thought the Prohibition about the Wine and Oyl, no less necessary than the other about the Weapons, fearing lest the Barbarians by tasting such generous Productions of the Empire, should endeavour to make themselves Masters of so rich a Soil. And we find in Livy (b), that when Arms of Clusium invited the Gauls into Italy, he made them a Present of Italian Wines, as the Encouragement and the Reward of their Expedition (c).

Lastly, there lies no Restraint on a State why, in Reference to the Exportation of Goods, it should not favour its own Subjects more than Strangers; as by demanding less Custom of the former, than of the latter, or by giving them the Right of first Purchase.

XII. Though, as has been shown, we are oblig'd in many Cases to sell, yet as Grotius (d) observes, no Law ties us to a Necessity of buying. In as much as every Man is naturally free to accept, or to refuse what Purchase he pleases; and no one has just Reason to complain, because another is content to want somewhat which he could supply him with. And therefore we find it forbidden in many Places, as well Ancient as Modern, to import some particular Commodities: either lest any Damage should by this means arise to the State; or to excite the Industry of our own Subjects; or to hinder our Money from passing into foreign Hands.

Therefore the Spanish Casuist lately mention'd, is widely mistaken when he asserts, that by the Law of Nations every one has a Right of Trading in foreign Parts, of importing what the People there want, and of exporting Gold, Silver, and other Goods in which they abound. For supposing I declare my self well satisfied with what I possess of my own, with what Face can another force his Things upon me, whether I will or no?

When the contrary is enacted, for Example, when in some Places, every Householder is obliged to buy yearly such a Quantity of Salt, this arises from the Power of Princes over their Subjects, and that Necessity of buying, is a kind of Tax or Tribute. Thus too a Ruler may enjoyn his People, that if they want such a particular Commodity, they shall buy it only of such a Person. Which kind of Laws are very just, when they promote the Interest of the Commonwealth. In the same manner we find it often commanded by Authority, that the Subject do immediately buy up Corn and other Necessaries, even in remote Parts, when there is danger of a Scarcity, (especially upon Apprehension of a Siege;) or to bring down Provisions to a more reasonable Price amongst us. But that I should go about to compel a Man, over whom I have no Power to the purchase of my Commodities, this is what no Reason will justify or excuse. For upon what Pretence can I assume such Authority over the Purse of another, who is not my Subject, as to prescribe the Matter, and the Measure of his Expences, and to teach him how he should provide for his Necessities, or for his Pleasures? And though my Gain be in the mean time hinder'd or lessen'd, yet this Consideration can by no means abridge the other Party of his Natural Liberty. Or, if I would have him thus contribute to my Advantage, I ought to encourage him by mutual good Offices, and render my self worthy of the Favour. But if a Man being stock'd with such particular Commodities, offers to vend his Abundance, where-ever he can find Chapmen, it would, in this Case, be most Inhuman, and Unjust to hinder him from thus furnishing himself with other things, which he wants for the necessary Occasions of Life (e).

XIII. Another Duty of the same Rank, is the giving Licence to Men of other Nations, especially if seated in our Neighbourhood, to sollicite, and contract Matrimony with our Subjects, when they are at a loss for Women amongst themselves. As for Instance, if a People compos'd only of Men, either being expell'd their own Country, or upon some other necessary Account, are fix'd near us, and design to form a new State. For to live without the Assistance of the other Sex, is what the Frame and Temper of few Men can bear. Celibacy in a Healthy Constitution, is the Gift only of excellent Souls; and to seek other Satisfaction in this Case that Nature

G. l. 2.* reports of the Neruii, that they allow no Entrance to Merchants, suffer no Wine or any other Incitement to Luxury to be imported; imagining that the Use of these Delicacies must needs weaken Men's Minds, and unbend the Stiffness of their Courage. The same Author tells us of the Suevi, that if Beasts are brought from other Parts for their Assistance, they refuse to make use of them; and as for Wines they absolutely forbid the Importation of them, being of Opinion, that those Liquors soften and effeminate the Spirits of Men, and render them unfit for laborious Employments. advise or allows, would be foul and brutal. Besides, as Florus observes, Res tantum unius ætatis est populus virorum, A State made up of one Sex, can last but one Age. Upon this Principle, many are willing to defend, or at least to excuse the famous Exploit of Romulus, the Rape of the Sabine Women. Authors indeed are divided about the Reason and the manner of this Proceeding. Dionysius Halicarnassæus reports, that the main design of Romulus was to obtain the Friendship, and Alliance of the Neighbouring Nations, by joining with them in Marriage; and that, though he began this Project in an injurious way, yet he imagin'd that in time this ill Beginning would produce a good Conclusion, and that a fair Correspondence and Familiarity, would be establish'd so soon as they should have clear'd themselves to the new Brides, by the Plea of Love, and to the Fathers and Relations by urging that the Stratagem was set on Foot, not out of Affront and Abuse, but as a necessary Relief to a desperate Condition. Yet it must be confess'd, this seems a very preposterous way of gaining Friendship (a).

Others pretend, that Romulus by this Attempt, only sought an Occasion of quarrelling with his Neighbours, which seems very improbable. The common Defence of the Fact, is to alledge the want of Women, and so to have Recourse to Necessity: but then Authors take care to tell us, that Commissioners were first sent about to treat with the People on the Affair, and to beg that they would not think it hard to let Men like themselves mix with them in Race and Blood: And that when these Agents were dismiss'd after a Reproachful manner, it was then at last thought proper to gain Relief, by the joint Application of Cunning and of Force. And what makes the thing still carry a better Force is, that this way of catching Wives was in those Times, not only a Common, but a laudable Practice; Dionysius calls it, An Ancient and a Grecian Custom, and the most renowned Method of obtaining Maids in Marriage (b). It is true, Violence can seldom be necessary in this Case, since it's never difficult to find Women enough, who shall be ready of their own accords, to accept of any Husbands that are not abominably Vile and Scandalous.

To reject those who seek our Alliance by such Proposals, would be very hard Dealing. And though the denying of a Woman for a Wife, be not in it self, a just Cause of commencing a War, yet is it, if the Refusal were accompanied with Reproach. As the Inhabitants of Rhegium, when Dionysius of Sicily sent to desire a Wife amongst them, returned in Answer, that they would grant him none but the Daughter of their Common Executioner (c). On the other hand, should a Prince by Vertue of his Sovereign Authority, compel the Women of his Country to accept of such Husbands as have nothing in them to deserve Affection, this would look like Inhumanity; especially in Case the Fortunes and Conditions of the Parties were unequal (d). As for those Civil Laws which forbid Marriage with Foreigners, or between Subjects of Different Ranks, they always presuppose, that every one is able to find out a Match suitable to his Condition, and they are generally founded on such Reasons as these, that the Splendour of great Families may be preserv'd; that our Women may more easily get Husbands at home, whilst our Men are not allow'd to get Wives abroad; or that the Riches and the Affections of our People, may not by the means of Inter-Marriages be estrang'd from us, and settled on a Foreign State.

XIV. Lastly, Grotius adds, that any Right Common to all, and consequently any Obligation to a Duty to be perform'd towards all, arises from this Supposition, that we grant such an Indulgence promiscuously to every Stranger; because then, if any one be excluded from the Privilege, he is manifestly injur'd. For it is an Affront and Reproach to debar a Man, without particular Reason, from a Common Advantage; this being to make him unequal and inferiour to others. Hence Grotius concludes, that if it be in any place permitted to Strangers, to Hunt, to Fish, to Hawk, to gather Pearls, to receive Legacies, to sell Goods, to contract Marriages, (even without being compell'd to it by Scarcity of Women;) no Nation can be denied the same Liberties, except they have forfeited them by their own Default. But this Assertion will scarce hold. For the Concessions here spoken of, must be made either expressly or tacitely. When we grant a thing expressly to another, we do it either Pre-cariously, or in the manner of a Pact or perfect Promise. Now that any one should give a perfect Right over a thing of his, (not due by the Law of Nature) to all Nations known and unknown, without Limit or Restraint, is a Case which I believe never did, and never will happen. For every one is desirous to know at least, on whom he bestows his Benefit, and in what measure. But when a Man

The Names of Son-in-Law, and Father-in-Law, which when there is a mutual Consent of Parties used to be a Band of Love and Endearment, prove now the Seed of Hatred, and the Incitement to mortal Discord. (b) Add Judges XXI. 22. (c) See Diodor. Sic. l. 14. c. 108. & Strab. l. 6. like Instance is to be met with in Paulus Venetus, l. i. c. 52. (d) The Speech of Cornelius in Livy, where in the Name of the Populacy, he intreats the Senate, that they would allow them the Privilege of Marriage, a Favour granted to Foreigners, and to Neighbour Nations; and that they would not exclude them from the number of Mankind, does not belong to the Question before us, although produced as an Instance by Grotius. For the Plebeians did not then feel a Scarcity of Women, but the Aim and Design of this Petition, was to raise themselves to an equal Pitch with the Nobility, and means of Marrying into Patrician Families. Otherwise, when Women are plenty, there is no Occasion of winning a Bride by main Force of Arms: Invenies aliam si te hæc fastidit.

either by Part or free Favour, has granted such a particular Privilege to all that come under his Friendship or Acquaintance, for a meer Stranger to pretend a Right to the same Indulgence, would be very Impudent and very Wicked. As for those things which we permit Tacitely, or as it were overlook, they are reckon'd of Course to be of the same Nature with Precarious Favours; and such may be fairly revoked, either upon the Change of our Affairs and Circumstances, or because the Persons who enjoy'd them did not make so prudent and modest a use of them as they ought (a).

XV. What we have hitherto touch'd on, are but Vulgar Degrees of Humanity, the Omission of which implies a most base and abject Temper of Mind. A much higher, and more illustrious Strain of the same Duty, is when a Man out of pure Benevolence and Inclination, arising either from a Native Generousness of Soul, or from Pity and Compassion to a Person in Distress, is at some Pains or Charge in bestowing freely on another, what may relieve his Necessity, or procure his Advantage. Kindnesses of this Noble Rank, are by way of Eminence stiled Benefits; the manner and measure of Dispensing which are commonly to be adjust'd with regard to the Condition of the Giver, and of the Receiver. And these are the things which open to Mankind the largest Field of doing Good, and of acquiring Glory, if they are temper'd and regulated by true Prudence and Greatness of Mind. For to throw about Favours without Reason and Judgment, ought, as Pliny (b) observes, to be call'd Ambition or Ostentation, or any thing rather than Liberality. Wise Men have made it their chief Business to prescribe Rules for the guiding and perfecting of these Obligations: And the ancient Books of Morality, are not on any Subject more copious, or more clear.

XVI. The Vertue answering to Benevolence in the Giver, is Gratitude in the Receiver, by which he demonstrates, that the Kindness was acceptable to him, and upon this Score entertains a hearty Respect for the Author of it, seeking all Occasions of making a Requit, as far as his Abilities will give him leave. For it is by no means absolutely Necessary, that our Return should be precisely, as much in Value as the Courtesie amounts to, but good Will and earnest Endeavour, are frequently allow'd to satisfy an Obligation (c).

The Reason of this Duty ceases, when ever we have a just Exception against the Donour, and are fully assur'd, that his Bounty was more in Pretence than in good Will. But here wise Men give us an Excellent Caution, that we should not be too curious in enquiring upon what Grounds and Motives a Man has been our Benefactor; because this Niceness of Examination will ever afford a Plea, and a Colour to Ingratitude.

The more apt in their own Nature Benefits are to unite and to engage the Minds of Men, the more strictly does Reason enjoin us to apply our selves with Vigour and Industry, to a just Requit. When a Man has express'd so much Dependence upon me, as to confer the prior Obligation, I am bound at least not to suffer him to be the worse for his Kindness; and I ought never to receive a good Turn, but with Resolution to hinder the Author; if possible, from repenting of what he has

(a) Add. Bœcler ad Grot. Panegy. (b) Tull. Off. 1. Beneficentia, qua nihil est natura humane accommodatius, multas habet cautiones, &c. The Duties of Liberality or Bounty, than which there is nothing more agreeable to the Nature of Man, fall under many Limitations. For in the first place it should be our Care to see that our Bounty prove not a Prejudice, either to the Person we would oblige, or to any other Body; and then that we do not give above our own Ability, nor above the Merit of the Receiver. As to this last Point, we are Principally to regard those; to whom we our selves already stand Obliged, and then others as they have more or less Need of our Assistance. We are likewise to consider the several Degrees, by which we stand related in the World. Of these the First and most Extensive, is the Universal Society of Mankind. Nearer than this is the Alliance between Persons of the same Nation, of the same Province, of the same Language, of the same City. There is yet a nearer Tye of Kindred. And here the First Society is in Wedlock, the next in Children; the Relation of Brothers comes afterwards, and then of Brothers and Sisters, Children and Men, the Marches and Alliances between different Families. But the most Excellent and Strongest of all Alliances is, when Good and Vertuous Men join in Familiarity, upon account of the Agreement of their Manners.

Idem de Finib. l. 5. In omni bono, &c. In all the Compass of Honesty, there is nothing so illustrious or of so great a Latitudo, as the Conjunction and Society of Men with Men, including a mutual Communication of Conveniencies, and general Love for Mankind. This Dearness begins immediately upon ones Birth, when the Child is most Affectionately beloved by the Parent, from the Family, it by degrees steals abroad into Affinities, Friendships, Neighbourhoods; then amongst Members of the same State, and amongst States themselves, united in Interests and Confederacies; and at length stretcheth it self to the whole Extent of Human Race. In the Exercise of all these Duties, we are farther to observe what every Man hath most need of, and what with our Help he may, what without our Help he cannot attain; so that in some Cases the Tye of Relation, must yield to the point of Time; and some Offices there are which we would rather pay to one Relation than to another. Thus you ought sooner to help a Neighbour in with his Harvest, than either a Brother, or a familiar Acquaintance; but on the other side, in a Suit at Law, you ought to defend your Brother, or your Friend before your Neighbour. See Seneca's Treatise of Benefits, which it would be tedious here to abridge. Plutarch (in Sympos.) tells us, 'twas a Rule amongst the Pythagoreans, not to take a Burthen from their Fellow, but to help him bear it; and this they did to exclude all to Idleness and Ease. Though St. Paul could have taught them a better Reason, 2 Corinth. VIII. 13. Not that other Men be eased, and you burthen'd, but by an Equality, &c.

done. If upon some particular Reason we are unwilling to be obliged to a certain Person, in this Case it is lawful for us to refuse the Benefit he offers. But then great Care must be taken to do this without giving the least Suspicion of Contempt; since otherwise, to reject a voluntary Favour, carries in it a manifest Affront.

Take away the Necessity of returning Kindnesses, and no Man will ever begin them; for then it would plainly be acting against Reason, to part with our Bounty, whilst we know it would be thrown away. And thus all Beneficence, all mutual Trust and good Will must be banish'd out of the World; there must be no such thing as free Help, or antecedent Merit, no way of endearing and engaging one Man to another (a). Tully is admirable on this Point of Gratitude: It is, says he, of all Duties, the most indispensably Necessary. If Hesiod bids us restore what we borrow, if we can, in a larger Measure; what ought we to do when we are as it were challeng'd by a Prior Obligation? Are we not in this Case to imitate fruitful Fields, that still return more than they receiv'd. For if we make no Scruple to oblige those whom we hope to be the better for hereafter; How then should we behave our selves towards such as we are the better for already? Since there are two sorts of Liberality, the one of bestowing a Benefit, the other of returning it; it is at our Choice whether we will give or no; but an honest Man is not at Liberty in the Point of returning, provided it can be done without Injury.

It is observable, that Cicero here makes Gratitude a part of Liberality, and consequently, hints, that it is not tied up to Laws, altogether so strict as those of Justice, which commands us to repay what we owe upon Contract, most punctually and precisely (b). It may be remark'd farther, That when he says the former kind of Liberality, the bestowing of Benefits is in our Choice, he ought not to be understood in an absolute Sense, for it is plain we are under some Obligation, even to Antecedent Beneficence, but the Point is, that this Obligation does not carry so much Strictness in it, as that which binds a Man to Gratitude; or to endeavour the approving himself by all good Will, and good Service to his Benefactors.

It happens, 'tis true, very frequently that in the doing a Kindness, there is more true Love on the part of the Giver, than of the Receiver (c). There being too much Ground in Fact, for that Politick Remark of Tacitus, Beneficia eo usque laeta sunt dum videntur exolveri posse: ubi multum antevenerit, pro gratia odium redditur (d). 'Good Turns do so far yield 'an agreeable Satisfaction as we fancy our selves able to repay them: when they much exceed this Measure, the Debt grows desperate, and so produces a fullen and a secret Hatred, instead of a real Kindness and Affection.

XVII. But though the bare Notion of Ingratitude does not imply a real Injury, in as much as it is not the Violation of any full and perfect Right, yet it passes in common Censure, for a Vice more foul, more odious and detestable, than Injustice it self (1). For it is look'd on as an Argument of a most Abject and Degenerate Soul, for a Man to declare himself unworthy of the fair Opinion which another entertain'd of his Honesty, to be Proof against Benefits, and consequently part all Sense of Humanity (e).

The account which Des Cartes gives of Ingratitude, is very Rational and very Elegant. 'It is the Vice, says he, of Men, who are either madly Proud and Vain, and so imagine every thing to be due to their Merit; or else senselessly Stupid, and so unable to reflect on the Benefits they receive; or lastly, pitifully Weak and Abject, who when they feel their own Infirmary and Want, sue with the meanest Submission for the Assistance of others; which if they chance to obtain, they immediately hate the Persons to whom they have been obliged, because either wanting Will to make Requital, or despairing of Ability, and at the same time fancying all the World to be Mercenary, and that no good Turn is done without Hopes of Retribution; they apprehend themselves to have exceedingly baulk'd and disappointed their Benefactors (f).

Learned Men have disputed, whether or no there ought to lie an Action against this Vice, in Courts of Civil Judicature. Seneca (g) takes

It will hold good for the most part, that we are rather to return a Benefit, than to serve a Friend in the way of Gratuity; as we ought likewise rather to pay a Debt, than give away our Money to our dearest Confident. In General, what we owe of any kind is first to be made good; yet if a free Gift to another Person, would at the same time plead more Honesty, and more Necessity, it is then to have the Preference in our Disposal. the Negative side of the Question, and the Reasons he proceeds upon are chiefly these; 'That if a Benefit be strictly to be repaid like a Sum of Money, or as if it were let out to hire, it then loses the Name of a Kindness, and becomes a Loan or Debt; that whereas the requiting of a good Turn is esteem'd an Act highly Vertuous, it must cease to be Vertuous, were it once made Necessary. Lastly, that there must needs arise more Causes on this Head, than all the Courts in the World would be sufficient to try (a). Our Design leads us no farther, than to observe, that from every Transgression of the Law of Nature, it does not presently follow, that there must lie an Action, (or the Resemblance of an Action) against a Man in Natures Court. This is certain, that the Divine Justice hath reserv'd severe Punishments to be inflicted on ungrateful Persons in another Life: And in this present World they ought to suffer the Hatred and Detestation of all Mankind, and to be adjudg'd unworthy of the least Benefit or Favour. But why a Man cannot be sued in an Action, at the Civil Bar, for simple Ingratitude, that is, forgetting a good Turn, or for neglecting to requite it, when he had Opportunity, there seems to be this plain Reason; that the very Cause of my conferring the Kindness (that is, of my giving somewhat without taking Security for its return) was to afford the Party an Opportunity of shewing himself Grateful out of pure Honesty, not out of fear of Compulsion; and on my own part to demonstrate that what I bestow'd was not done out of a sordid Desire of Gain, but out of Humanity and good Nature, since I required no Caution, or Ensurance of being repaid. Antoninus will teach us better Philosophy. When thou accusest a Man (says he) of Falseness or Unthankfulness; turn the Censure upon thy self. For the Fault is without doubt thine; that thou didst not confer the Favour freely and undesignedly, without looking for any farther Fruit, than the Action it self. It is not sufficient Satisfaction to have relieved and assisted one that is a Man as thou art? Dost thou demand a Reward for doing what thy Nature obliges thee to do?

But when a Man is guilty of mixt Ingratitude, or when he not only neglects to requite a Courtesy, but answers it with Injuries and Abuses; the Injury thus offer'd, founds an Action in Natures Court, or a Cause of War; and its being accompanied with an ungrateful Mind, as it highly aggravates the Fact, and renders it more Vile and Odious, so it engages the Sufferer more speedily to seek Redress; and to punish the Villain the more severely, in Regard, that Benefits themselves could not reclaim him (b).

C H A P. IV.

Of the Duty of keeping Faith; and the Division of Obligations.

THE Duties hitherto explain'd, are mutually owing upon account of that Common Relation, which Nature has establish'd amongst Men; although we suppose no Antecedent Act to have pass'd between them. But it would be unreasonable to confine within these narrow Limits, all the Offices that Men are to exercise towards each other. For in the first place, all are not of so good and honest Dispositions, as to perform every thing, whereby they can benefit their Neighbours, out of pure Humanity and Charity; without being secure of Retribution. And then, many things which we should be glad to receive from others, are of such Value and Consequence, that we cannot in Modesty desire them gratis. Or perhaps it does not become our Fortune or Station to be beholden to another, for such a Benefit. Therefore unless an Equivalent be paid, commonly the other Party is unwilling to give, and frequently we are unwilling to receive. Again, others are many times Ignorant, how they might serve and oblige us. Lastly, in as much as the Power of Man being Finite, cannot in the same manner extend it self to all Persons, it is agreeable to Reason, that such Acts as are not already bespoken by an Antecedent Obligation lying on us, should be made sure to those, who by entering into Covenant with us, first obtain a Right to receive them. Therefore, that the true Fruits of a social Nature, the mutual Offices of Mankind might be practis'd with more Frequency, and more Regularity, it was necessary for Men to bargain, and agree amongst themselves, that they would perform to each other, such and such Services, as they could not be absolutely secure of, by the bare Law of Humanity. So that their Business must be to settle before-hand, what every Man ow'd to another, and what he should by Virtue of his Right, accept and challenge in return.

Hence it is easie to apprehend how the Offices of Humanity or Charity, differ from those which are requir'd by full and proper Right, and which are the Objects of strict Justice. The former are not owing upon any Covenant, either Express or Implicite, but purely by force of

of that Common Obligation which Nature has laid upon Mankind. But what I owe another upon Pact or Agreement, I therefore owe him because he has obtain'd a new Right, holding good against me, by virtue of my free Promise or Consent. Farther, whatever I transact with another by way of Covenant, is design'd not for his Profit, but for my own. Whereas in Duties of Humanity, the Case is quite otherwise. For, although the Performance of these be in general Necessary, for the rendring the Life of Man Comfortable and Commodious, and consequently be an Advantage to the Performer, by giving him good Grounds to expect fair Treatment; yet with regard to particular Acts of Kindness, a Man does them not for his own sake, but for the sake of the Party who receives them. For a Benefit, if confer'd upon a Principle of private Interest, loses its Nature and its Name.

Thus then the Duties of Humanity or Charity, and those arising from Covenant, do afford a mutual Assistance, and supply to each other; whilst those things which Charity either cannot, or does not ordinarily procure, are obtain'd by Pact; and in Matters about which no Pacts have pass'd, Charity comes in, and serves our turn as well. And although to fix the Subject, and the Conditions of Covenants be left to the Pleasure of particular Persons; yet that there shall be some such Agreements, the Law of Nature does (indefinitely and in general) command; in as much as without these Transactions, there would be no possible means of preserving Peace and Society in the World (a).

II. When Men have once engaged themselves by Pacts, their Nature obliges them as sociable Creatures, most religiously to observe and perform them. For were this Assurance wanting, Mankind would lose a great part of that Common Advantage, which continually arises from the mutual Intercourse of good Turns (b). Farther, were not Men most strictly and necessarily tied to keeping their Promises, we could not with any certainty build on the Assistance of others, in the ordinary Affairs of Life. And then breach of Faith is the aptest thing in the World to found an endless Succession of Quarrels and Complaints. For in Case I have actually perform'd my part of the Contract, and the other Person fails, whatever I have done or given is absolutely lost. And if I have not as yet proceeded to any actual Performance, it is, however, a Trouble, and it may be a prejudice to me, to have the Course of my Designs and Business overturn'd; since I could have settled things by other Ways and Measures, had not this Man offer'd to transact with me. And 'tis most Unreasonable, that I should be expos'd to Scorn and Censure, for entertaining a kind Opinion of a Person's Goodness and Honesty. We are therefore to esteem it a most Sacred Command of the Law of Nature, and what guides and governs, not only the whole Method and Order, but the whole Grace and Ornament of Human Life, that every Man keep his Faith, or which amounts to the same, that he fulfil his Contracts, and discharge his Promises (c) (1).

III. But in as much as Pacts or Covenants, those especially which are Express, do impose an Obligation on us, which Nature did not before enjoin, at least not in so precise and determinate a Manner; it may not be here Inconvenient to run over the Principal Kinds, and Divisions of Obligations. Obligations then in the first place, are distinguish'd into Connate and Adventitious (d) (2). The former are such as all Men fall under by Vertue of their being Creatures, endued with Reason, or such as necessarily attend, and accompany the Rational Nature, consider'd in that simple and general Notion. Although, in Regard that all Men are born Infants, and as yet incapable of the exercise of Reason, these Obligations do for some time lie without Act or Force; and do then at length exert their Power, and render Men capable of contracting Guilt, when the Understanding improving by Age and Use, makes us sensible of them. And from this Period they date their Influence, and produce their Penal Effects, should a Man be never so Negligent in weighing and considering their Authority. Therefore Ignorance of the Law of Nature, is an insufficient Plea, to excuse a Person of mature Years; though he should urge that it never came into his Head to reflect whether this Law had settled such a Point or not. Adventitious Obligations, are such as fall upon Men, by the Intervention of some Human Deed; not without the Consent of the Parties, either Express, or at least Presumptive.

IV. Amongst Connate Obligations, such as are planted, as it were in our Being, the most Eminent is that which lies on all Men with respect to Almighty God, the supream Governour of the World; by Vertue of which we are bound to adore his Majesty; and to obey his Commandments and his Laws. Whoever wholly violates, and breaks through this Obligation, stands guilty of the most heinous Charge of Atheism; because he must at the same time, deny either the Existence of God, or his Care of Human Affairs. Which two Sins with regard to their Moral Consequences and Effects, are Equivalent to each other; and either of them overthrows all Religion, representing it as a frightful Mockery, introduced to Awe the Ignorant Vulgar into some Decency and Duty (a). Therefore we ought in Justice to Discard and Explode, as most foul and scandalous, that Notion of Hobbes (b), in which he would rank Atheism amongst the Faults of Imprudence or Ignorance; as if it were not properly a Sim, but a Mistake or Folly, more worthy of Pardon than of Punishment. The Argument he makes use of runs thus, the Atheist never submitted his Will to the Will of God, in as much he never believ'd there was such a Being. But now it is impossible any one should have a Sovereign Power over us, unless he obtain'd it by our Consent. Therefore since the Atheist was never under the Kingdom of God, it follows that he is not obliged by the Laws of that Kingdom. But here it is most grossly false, that all Sovereignty is constituted by the Consent of the Subject; for this will hold only with regard to Human Dominion; where unless by our own Contract and Consent, we cannot lose the Power of resisting another, who is by Nature our Equal. But who will pretend to assert that GOD has not a Power of Commanding his Creatures, unless they voluntarily agree to invest him with such Authority? Nay, Hobbes (c) has sufficiently confuted himself by deducing the Right, which God has of ruling and of punishing in his Kingdom of Nature from his Irresistible Power: but did any one ever imagine that an Atheist was able to resist the Power of God? And therefore Atheists are not, strictly speaking, God's Enemies (as Hobbes defines Enemies, who are neither under a Common Sovereign, nor under each other) but his Rebellious Subjects, and consequently guilty of Treason against the Divine Majesty, as Hobbes himself, has elsewhere (d), expressly acknowledged. And agreeably to this he defines Treason against Human Power to be, 'When one either by Word or Deed, does in 'General manifest and declare, that he will no 'longer submit to that Man or Council of Men, 'in whom is lodg'd the supream Administration 'of the State; or when a Man wholly throws 'off the Bond of Civil Obedience. It is no such obscure matter, therefore to assign the particular Species of Sim, to which Atheism belongs. Nor is the following Assertion built on better Grounds, that Atheists cannot be punish'd any otherwise, than by the Right of War; as the Poets represent the Gods, routing by force of Arms the old Giants that affaulted Heaven. On the contrary, that Evils inflicted in Martial Encounters are not properly Punishments, we shall hereafter have Opportunity to shew. A Sovereign must not presently be said to make use of the Right of War, when he reclaims his Refractory Subjects. For the bare Right of Sovereignty includes thus much, that the Person invest'd with it, shall have the Power of reducing those to Obedience by force, who refuse a voluntary Submission. Much less are those Rebellious Opposers of lawful Authority, to be accounted just Enemies, or such as have a Right of making Resistance.

It does not excuse Hobbes to alledge that Passage of the Psalmist, the Fool hath said in his Heart there is no God. As if there was any such Nicety in the Scripture Language, to call those only Fools who sin out of Mistake, and not those who offend Wilfully. Or, as if this too were not the highest Folly, by a wilful Sin to incur the most intolerable Torments, for the sake of a very slender Pleasure, or perhaps no Pleasure at all. Again, it is by no means a Matter of such Difficulty, to discover the Being of a GOD by Natural Reason, as to find out the Proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder; the Instance which Hobbes makes use of. It may not be indeed in the power of every unlearned Person to form, or to apprehend an Artificial and Philosophical Demonstration of God's Existence; but he cannot thence claim a Privilege of securely doubting or denying it. For in as much as the whole Race of Men in all Ages have constantly held this Persuasion; whoever would attempt to assert the contrary, must of Necessity, not only solidly confute all the Arguments produced on the other side, but also alledge better and more plausible Reasons for his own particular Opinion. And farther, since the Safety and Happiness of Mankind have been hitherto thought to depend chiefly on this Belief, it is requisite, that he likewise prove Atheism to contribute more to the Interest, and the good of all Men, than the Acknowledgement of a Deity. Which being a Task manifestly Impossible, the Atheists are to be judg'd Offenders, not only against the Divine Majesty, but against all Mankind. And they deserve the less Favour on this Account, because these very Men who would reverse the Judgment of all People, and of all Ages, do arrogantly assume to themselves a deeper Sagacity, a clearer Light of Understanding, than the World was ever acquainted with before. And consequently, though their Unbelief be indeed an Error, and a most fatal and destructive one, yet it is such as they did not fall into through Imprudence or Simplicity, but by a vain and impudent Pretence of more than ordinary Degrees of Wisdom (e).

(a) *Ambros. It will be a very easie Labour to refute those Arguments, which Spinoza (a) has alledged in defence of this Notion of Hobbes. The Thesis he lays down to work upon is this, every one who cannot govern himself by Reason, may by the highest Right of Nature, live according to the Laws of his Appetite. And foreseeing it might be here objected, that the Assertion was contrary to the reveal'd Law of God, he answers, that a Natural State is both in Nature and Time Antecedent to Religion; which with Regard to Natural Religion is as absolutely false, as what he subjoyns, that no Man knows by Nature, any Obligation lying on him to obey God; and that no Reason can obtain this Knowledge, but such as is confirm'd by the Signs of Revelation. Therefore the Consequence he draws is most Absurd, that before Revelation, no Man was bound by any such Divine Law, as it was impossible for him to be ignorant of; and that a Natural State is to be conceiv'd without Religion or Law; and for that Reason without Sin or Injury. In all this he only ridiculously confounds the Natural with the Positive Divine Law. He proceeds to assert, that Man consider'd in a State of Nature, is free from all Religion, not only upon account of Ignorance, but by virtue of that Common Liberty, in which all are born. For, says he, if Men were by Nature bound to the Divine Law, or if the Divine Law were a Law by Nature, it would be superfluous that God should afterwards enter into a Contract with Men, and oblige them by Oath and Covenant. Now it is clear that these Paets or Covenants pass between God and Men in reveal'd Religion, not in Natural, to which a Man immediately stands obliged upon account of his being created by God a reasonable Creature. So that Spinoza's Conclusion is most Vain and Senseless, that Divine Law began from that time, when Men by express Compact, promised to obey God in all things, by which deed they receded, as it were, from their Natural Liberty, and transfer'd their Right upon God, just as Sovereignty is confer'd in Civil States. For the support of which Doctrine it is necessary to suppose, that Men in a State of Nature, had not their Existence from God Almighty.

From this Obligation, by which Men are bound to pay Obedience unto God, springs the Obligation of all Men towards all Men, as such; by Virtue of which they are engaged to lead a social Life. How this is to be discover'd, it has been formerly our Business to shew.

V. There is another famous Division of Obligation, into Natural and Civil; but such as is by different Authors, differently stated (b). Grotius observes, that the Lawyers sometimes call a thing of Natural Obligation, the doing of which Nature shews to be good and honest, although it be not strictly a Debt: As for an Executor to pay the entire Legacies, without reserving to himself, what the Falcidian Law allows him; to requite a Courtesie receiv'd; to pay Debts which the Creditor has in Law forfeited; as those contracted by a Minor (c), without the Consent of his Guardians or Friends. When any thing of this kind is voluntarily paid, a Man cannot recover it again, on Pretence that it was not due, tho' he might at first have refus'd to pay it.

Sometimes we call that a Natural Obligation which truly binds us; whether it cause in the other Party a Perfect, or whether only an Imperfect Right. In like manner by a Civil Obligation we sometimes mean such, as is void by the Law of Nature, but depends purely on a Civil Law, of which the Obligatio literarum, (when a Man confesses a Debt in writing, which he really never contracted;) is commonly brought as an Instance; at other times it signifies such as is grounded on both Laws, Natural and Civil; or such as will bear a good Action in Courts of Civil Judicature.

Others with more Clearness, assign Three Species of Obligation, purely Natural, purely Civil, and Mixt. The first depends entirely on Natural Equity; and in such a manner, as not to found an Action in Civil Courts. The second arises merely from the force of Civil Law, in the Strictness and Rigour of which it will bear an Action; though such an Action will always in Point of Equity be invalidated by the Judge; as the Obligatio literarum before mention'd. The third is such as is at the same time supported by Natural Equity, and confirm'd by the Authority of Civil Constitutions. This is the Distinction commonly made by the Interpreters of the Roman Laws.

VI. This Division of Obligations into Natural and Civil, is a Subject which we ought to insist farther on in our present Enquiry; yet not so much to derive thence the Original of such Ties, but the Efficacy, or Force which they bear in Common Life. So that by Natural Obligation we mean such as binds us only by Virtue of the Law of Nature; and by Civil Obligation, such as is supported and assisted by Civil Laws, and Civil Power. The Efficacy of both is consider'd with Regard either to the Subject, the Person in whom the Obligation inheres; or the Object, the Person in whom it terminates, or to whom it is directed. In the first Respect, the Efficacy or Vertue of Natural Obligation, chiefly consists in this, that it binds a Man's Conscience; or that every Person at the same time when he fails of performing it, is sensible that he has displeas'd Almighty God; to whose Mercy as he owes his being, so he knows he ought to pay all possible Obedience to his Laws. And although we cannot indeed, in the Law of Nature, discover any precise and determinate Penal Sanctions, yet we ought on all Accounts to acknowledge, that it is enforced by some such due Fruits and Consequences; and that the Author of Nature will infallibly inflict great Evils on those who violate this Obligation, which the just Performers of it shall as infallibly escape. For the Truth of which Belief, amongst many Arguments, one very considerable Presumption is that remorse of Conscience, which attends the Actors of Wickedness, even whilst they are in fair hopes of escaping Human Discovery, and Human Punishment. A Disquiet, which no good and wise Man can imagine to proceed from bare Simplicity, from Custom, or from Fear of secular Justice; but from a much higher Principle, a Sense of God's Sovereignty, and a Dread of his Vengeance (a). Nor can I believe that any Man by flying to the impious Refuge of Atheism, ever found there so good Security against these Terrors, but that his wicked Mind would frequently recoil, and shake him with more Violence than before. And we have scarce had an Instance of any such bold Desier of Heaven, who has not at length been driven into a Consternation by his own Crimes, and turn'd a Penitent in Horror (1).

Although to bind the Consciences of Men, be principally the Effect of Natural Obligation, yet the same Power is communicated to Civil Obligation, provided the Object of the latter, be not repugnant to the former. And therefore, Civil Laws do also bind the Conscience, so far as they are consistent with the Law of Nature. Both Obligations do farther agree in this Respect, that the Duties they enjoyn, a Man ought to perform Voluntarily, and as it were upon his own internal Motion.

And 'tis this which makes the chief Difference between Obligation and Compulsion; by the latter, the Mind is, by external Violence, driven upon a thing contrary to its inward Inclinations: but whatever we perform on the former Account, is suppos'd to be done upon the Approbation of our own Judgment, and the Hearty Disposition of our Will.

If we consider these Obligations again, as they regard the Object, or as they produce some Effect in the Person, to whom by Virtue of them, something is due, they have this Force Common to both, that what being thus due, is paid or perform'd, may be fairly accepted and possess'd. But when the other Party neglects, or refuses to make good his Obligation, there is then a Difference in the manner of compelling him, between the Natural and the Civil Obligation, or between those who live in a state of Nature, and those who are settled under a Polity, or Government. To those who live in their Natural Liberty, the Precepts of the Law of Nature being of two kinds, do cause the same Distinction in the Obligation to perform them. Those things which Nature enjoyns one Man to pay to another, without any Antecedent Pact, as are the Offices of Charity and Humanity, we cannot challenge any otherwise, than by gentle and easie Methods; as by perswading, admonishing, desiring, or intreating. But we must not apply Force to the most obstinate Refuser; unless in Case of extrem Necessity. The Reason of which Proceeding seems to be this, that Human Society cannot be preserv'd, in a very easy or peaceful Condition, without the conferring of those mutual good Offices; and therefore Nature seems to have set them aside, as constant Subjects of exercising Men's particular Benevolence, by means of which they might win on the good Opinions, and the Affections of each other. And now it is clear, that those things which may be recover'd by Force, are not so apt to procure the Favour, or to unite the Minds of Men, as those which we give only upon our own free Motion, and which we might deny without Fear or Danger. But what is due to us, upon an Intervening Pact, if not voluntarily tender'd, we may procure by forcible Means. As we may likewise defend by Force, our just Possessions and Goods, when an Attempt is made upon them, by any injurious Assailant. Civil Obligations, or such as have been confirm'd by the Authority of Civil Laws, create an Action in Courts of Justice, by vertue of which I am to carry the Defailant before the Magistrate, who has a Power of compelling him to the Performance of his Duty. But even in States, Obligations purely Natural, or such as have not been enforc'd by the Sanction of Civil Laws, are left wholly to the common Modesty, and Conscience of Men, and to their just Dread of a Divine Sovereign and Judge; and the Subject ought not by a Course of Violence, to be brought to the Observance of them.

What Obligations ought to be confirm'd by Civil Ordinances, it is the Business of Legislators to determine; and they are to measure their Expediency and Use according as they seem likely to contribute to the inward Happiness, and Tranquillity of the State (a).

VII. Obligation may again be divided into Perpetual and Temporary. The former is that which cannot be taken off so long as the Person exists, in whom it inheres. Such is our Connate Obligation towards God; which, even with respect to the Exercise, can at no time be suspended or diminish'd. Such likewise is the Connate Obligation of all Men, towards all, as Partners of the same Nature, which no Person can throw off, so long as he makes a Part of Mankind; yet the Exercise of it may sometimes, with regard to some particular Persons, be suspended. And this happens, when I devolve into a State of War with another. For the Obligation being Reciprocal, in case one Party break it, and return Hostilities for the good Offices of Humanity, the other Party is no longer bound to deal with him in a friendly manner, but may maintain his own Safety, and his own Rights, although with the hurt of the unjust Opposer. Yet the same Obligation may still be said to remain perpetual in this Respect, that so soon as our own Safety is provided for, and ensured, we ought to be ready to renew the Peace, and to return to the exercise of all Courtesy and Humanity, towards the Party who began the Contention. Amongst Adventitious Obligations, we commonly reckon Perpetual, the Obligation of Children towards their Parents, and that which passes between Husband and Wife; which shall elsewhere be explain'd at large.

Temporal Obligations are such as may cease and be cancell'd, whilst the Persons in whom they inhere, do yet exist in the World.

VIII. Farther, since it generally happens, that Obligations answer one another, it may be useful to divide them into Mutual, and not Mutual. An Obligation not Mutual is, when one Party stands bound to perform somewhat towards another; yet so that the other Party shall lie under no Corresponding Obligation, nor be tied to make Equivalent Requital. Such is the Obligation of Men towards God, by which they are engaged to pay him absolute Obedience; but He on His Part is not constrain'd by Virtue of any such external Obligation, to make any Return for their Obedience. Amongst those Obligations where both Parties are Men, (if we except a few Contracts, binding only one side,) there are none to be met with of this sort. And the Reason is, because it seems Repugnant to the Natural Equality of Men, that one Person should be bound to another, and the other Person lie under no Engagement towards him. For we cannot apprehend them to be sociable Creatures, who are not united by a common Tie, who have not a mutual Communication of Services; but of whom one seems to be made as it were for the sake of the other, and the other is not bound in Return to contribute any thing towards his Interest or Happiness. Nor, when Men by Political Institutions introduced a State of Inequality, was it in their Power, to invest any Person with such an Extraordinary and Transcendent Right, as should Disengage him from all Obligation and Duty towards other Mortals.

IX. Mutual Obligations are such as answer to one another; so that the Party who on the one hand receives a Due, on the other hand is bound to repay it. These again are subdivided into imperfectly Mutual, and perfectly Mutual. The former are such as answer unequally, one of them being oppos'd to another, which is either different in kind, or in Vertue and Efficacy. This seems to happen chiefly on account of one of these two Reasons, either that the Persons are unequal, one having a Right of Commanding, the other a Necessity of Obeying; or because Persons in other Respects equal, as to some particular Business, refuse to receive an Obligation of the same Strictness, on both sides. For it is clear that Obligations do thus differ in Force or Efficacy, some producing a perfect Right in the Person, towards whom they are directed; so as to found an Action in Human Cognisance, to be prosecuted either by War, or before the Judge, according as the Parties live, either in a State of Nature, or under a Form of Civil Government, whereas others produce only an imperfect Right, so that the Performance of them ought not to be extorted by Violence. From the former of these Causes, arise the Obligations imperfectly Mutual, betwixt Princes and Subjects, betwixt States and particular Members, betwixt Masters and Servants, Parents and Children; all which will be examined in their proper Places. The latter Cause of making Obligations imperfectly Mutual, chiefly happen in Cases of Gratuitous Promises, and the Performances of them. For whilst I promise any thing to another out of free Favour, I perfectly oblige my self to give it; and the other Party has a Right of requiring it from me. But because I did not engage him to pay me an Equivalent, he is bound to me only by the Law of Gratitude, which ties him much more loosely than if he were my Debtor upon Pact. For we cannot on such unlimited Obligation, build our Hopes or our Affairs, and therefore should the Party prove ungrateful in the highest degree, we do not reckon our selves properly to have receiv'd any Loss or Prejudice.

(a) As it would be ridiculously Troublesome, to disturb the Judge on every petit Account, so it would be an Error on the other hand, to imitate the Custom of the Seres, (in Strabo l. 15.) who, he tells us, had no Hearings in Court, but upon Murder or Scandal; these being such Mischiefs as the Sufferer could not prevent; whereas it is in every Man's power not to be cheated in a Bargain, only by considering well whom he trusts. Much to the same purpose, is what he reports of the Indians, that they have no Action at Law, upon matters of Faith and Trust, nor do they make use of Witnesses or Seals, but believe each other on their bare Words. Comp. Ælian V. H. l. 4. c. 1. Add. Senec. de Benef. l. 3. c. 15.

For 'tis a Mistake in some Authors to assert, 'That Nature gives us a perfect Right to claim 'a Return of our Benefit, from an ungrateful 'Person; though in most Common-wealths, 'the Courts of Law refuse to admit an Action 'on that Score. Nor is this a good Consequence, the Necessity of returning a Kindness, is greater than that of giving one; therefore the latter is founded upon an Imperfect Right, the other upon a Perfect.

For, however the Case may stand before, yet when I once promis'd to do a Favour, there lies greater Necessity on me to perform it, than on the other Party to return it. For there may be different Degrees in Obligations of the same kind; especially when we are to compare such Duties, as concur in point of time (a).

CHAP. V.

Of the Nature of Promises, and Pacts in General.

IT now follows in Course, that we enquire 'How such Obligations as are not born with Men, should by virtue of some Act of theirs, be laid upon them; by which means there arises, at the same time, in other Persons a Right which before they wanted. For these two Moral Qualities have such a mutual Relation and Dependance, that whenever there is produced an Obligation in one Man, there immediately springs up a Correspondent Right in another; for 'tis impossible to apprehend that I am bound to any Performance, unless there be some Person in the World, who can either fairly require it, or at least fairly receive it of me. Tho' the Remark will not hold vice versa, that where-ever there is a Right in one, there must presently be an Obligation in another. For Example, the Magistrate has a Right of requiring Punishment for Crimes; but such a Right as is attended with no Obligation in the Criminal (1). Unless we solve the Doubt by this Distinction, that if we take Right in a strict and close Sense, for a Power or Aptitude, to have any thing, then there is always in some other Person an Obligation answering to it; but not if the word be taken for a Power of doing any thing. This then, in the first place is clear, that all Adventitious Obligations proceed, either from a Simple, or from a mutual Act; of which the former is properly call'd a free Grant or Promise, the latter a Pact or Covenant.

II. But in as much as all acknowledge that Promises and Pacts do transfer a Right to others, before we proceed, it may not be improper to examine Hobbes's Opinion (a), about the transferring of Right. He then, from his Project of a State of Nature, having inferr'd, that every Man hath naturally a Right to every thing, and having farther shown, that from the Exercise of this Right, there must needs arise a War of every Man against every Man, a State very unfit for the Preservation of Mankind; he concludes, 'That whilst

'Reason commands Men to pass out of this State of War, into a Condition of Peace, 'which Peace is consistent with a Right of 'Every Man to every thing, it at the same 'time prescribes that Men should lay down 'some part of this universal Right. A Man, 'he says, may lay down, or divest himself, of 'his Right two ways, either by simply renouncing it, or by transferring it to another. 'The former is done if he declares by sufficient Signs, that he is content it shall hereafter be unlawful for him to do a certain 'thing, which before he might have lawfully 'done. The latter, if he declare by sufficient 'Signs to another Person, who is willing to 'receive such a Right from him, that he consents it shall be for the future, as unlawful 'for himself to resist him in the doing of a certain thing, as he might before have justly resisted him. Hence he infers, that the transferring of Right consists purely in Non-resistance; or that, he who in a State of Nature, transfers Right to another, does not give the other Party a new Right which before he wanted, but only abandons his own Right, of resisting such a Person in the exercise of his. Which Assertion, according to his Hypothesis, he thus makes out; 'Before any such Act of transferring Right, the Person to whom it is said to 'be transferr'd, had a Right to all things, and 'therefore it was impossible to give him a new 'one; but the Person transferring, loses his 'Liberty of just Resistance, which before 'hindred the other, from exercising his Right 'in its full Extent. Therefore, whosoever 'in a State of Nature acquires a Right, only 'gains this Privilege, to enjoy his Primitive 'Right securely, and without just Disturbance; for Example, if a Man in a State of Nature by Sale or Gift, makes over his Field 'to another, he only takes away his own Right 'to that piece of Ground, not the Right which 'all other Men have to it; or which comes to 'the same, he declares that he will not resist,

(1) 'Tis true, Punishments are not due to Criminals by Virtue of any Compact, but since the Right of Life and Death, or the Right of the Sword is conferr'd upon Sovereigns, we are oblig'd not to resist 'em when They make use of that Right, tho' it be upon our own Persons. See Mr. Barbeyrac's French Translation of this Book. B. 3. c. 3. f. 4. Note 8. and f. 5th. (a) De Civ. c. 2. f. 3. &c. & Leviath. Engl. Book. I. Chap. XIV.

‘ or hinder such a particular Person, who has ‘ a mind to make use of the Field; but he does ‘ not by this Act prejudice the rest of Mankind,
 ‘ who still keep their Primitive Right, as well
 ‘ to this Spot of Earth, as to every thing else
 ‘ which Nature affords.

III. But as we have formerly made out (1), that this Hobbesian State is by no means Natural to Man, a Creature design’d for a Social Life; so neither can we admit of what the same Author thus establishes; as the Consequence and Result of it, such a Right of each Man to all things, as shall produce any Effect in reference to other Men. For the clearer Illustration of this Point, it is necessary to observe, that not every Natural Licence, or Power of doing a thing is properly a Right, but such only as includes some Moral Effect, with regard to others, who are Partners with me in the same Nature. Thus, for Instance, in the old Fable, the Horse and the Stag had both of them a Natural Power or Privilege of feeding in the Meadow; but neither of them had a Right, which might restrain or take off the Natural Power in the other. So Man, when he employs in his Designs and Services, Insensible or Irrational Beings, barely exercises his Natural Power, if without regard to other Men, we here precisely consider it in reference to the Things or Animals, which he thus uses. But then at length, it turns into a proper Right, when it creates this Moral Effect in other Persons, that they shall not hinder him in the free use of these Conveniencies, and shall themselves forbear to use them without his Consent. For ’tis ridiculous Trifling to call that Power a Right, which should we attempt to exercise, all other Men have an equal Right to obstruct or prevent us. Thus much then we allow, that every Man has naturally a Power or Licence of applying to his Use, any thing that is destitute of Sense or of Reason. But we deny that this Power can be call’d a Right, both because there is not inherent in those Creatures, any Obligation to yield themselves unto Man’s Service; and likewise, because all Men being naturally equal, one cannot fairly exclude the rest from possessing any such Advantage, unless by their Consent, either Express or Presumptive, he has obtain’d the peculiar and sole Disposal or Enjoyment of it. And when this is once done, he may then truly say he has a Right to such a Thing. Or to decide the Business more briefly, we may make use of this Distinction, that a Right to all things Antecedent to any Human Deed, is not to be understood Exclusively, but Indefinitely only; that is, we must not imagine one may engross all to himself, and exclude the rest of Mankind; but only that Nature has not defined or determined, what Portion of things shall belong to one, what to another, till they shall agree to share her Stores amongst them, by such Allotments and Divisions. Much less will the same Equality amongst Men admit, that one should naturally claim a Right over another. It is rather true, that no Person will have a Right to govern any other Person, unless he acquire it in peculiar manner, either by his Consent, or by some other Antecedent Deed; as shall be made out more at large in its proper place.

IV. The proper Notion then, of transferring and of acquiring Right, will appear with more Exactness, if we premise, that some Rights bear a regard to Persons, others to Things; and that the latter kind of Rights is again divided into Original and Derivative. I acquire a Right over a Person, if he either expressly, or tacitely consents, that I shall prescribe to him what he ought to do, to suffer, or to forbear; by Virtue of which Agreement he both obliges himself, voluntarily to study Obedience to my Pleasure, and at the same time grants me a Right of compelling him, in case of default, to his Duty, by proposing some considerable Evil; which I shall otherwise bring upon him. A Man then acquires an Original Right over Things, when all others either expressly or tacitely, renounce their Liberty of using such a thing, which before they enjoy’d in Common with him. This Original Right being once establish’d, by virtue of which the Primitive Community of things was taken off, the transferring of Right is nothing else but the passing it away from me to another, who before was not Master of it. Hence appears the Absurdity of saying, that the transferring of Right consists barely in Non-resistance. In as much as that negative Term cannot express the force of the Obligation, arising from such an Act; which properly implies an inward Inclination to make good the Contract: Though Non-resistance be indeed one Consequence of the Obligation, and without which it cannot be fulfilled. The Instance about the Field proposed by Hobbes, does not come up to the Point in Hand; for besides, that it is very absurd to call that an Act of Selling, when I only quit my Pretensions to a thing, whilst all other Men still keep theirs; even according to his own Doctrine, Propriety of things had its rise from Civil Government, after the State of Nature was supposed to be pass’d and gone. Therefore during the State of Nature, no Man could call the Field his own, and consequently not Sell it. ‘He ought indeed, to have express’d himself thus; since in a State of meer Nature, Things belong’d no more to one than to another, therefore if a particular Person desired the sole use of any thing, to make him Master of his wish, it was necessary, that all other Men should renounce the use of the same thing. If they did this gratis, the Act had somewhat in it like a Gift; if with some Burthen or under some Condition, it was then a kind of a Contract (2), for which we have no Name. But

(1) Book II. Chapter II. Sect. 7. &c. (2) We shall Explain this Term in B. V. c. 2. f. 7.

‘ should one Man have renounced his Power ‘ over such a thing, this could have been no pre‘ judice to others; and consequently, he only
‘ would have been debarr’d from the use of it,
‘ who had thus freely quitted all Title to it.

V. Let us now carry on our Enquiries, and examine how a Man may contract an Obligation, and confer a Right on another, by means of his own free Promise. To understand the Nature and Effects of this kind of Tie, we must in the first place observe, that there are two ways, of speaking about giving, or doing a thing to another, which now is, or which we imagine, will hereafter be in our Power. The first way is, when we barely express our present Mind about a future Act; yet so as to lay no Necessity on our selves, of persevering always in the same Resolution. An Instance we have in what Tiberius in Tacitus (1), writes to his Favourite Sejanus, Ipse quid intra animum volutaverim, quibus adhuc necessitudinibus immiscere te mihi parem, omittam ad præsens referre. I forbear to tell you at present, by what Fortunes, and by what Alliances I am considering to unite you to my self. Such a bare Assertion, neither founds an Obligation in me, nor a Right in the other Party (a). And to render it Vertuous and Unblamable, there is only this Condition requisite, that we speak as at present, we really think, and do not impose upon a Man by Falsehood and Dissimulation. But we are by no means obliged to continue always in this Design; since the mind of Man has not only a Natural Power of changing Opinion, but likewise a Right; so as to do it without fault, when there is no particular Obligation, imposing a Necessity of holding firmly to a Resolution, already taken and declared. Yet these Changes of Purpose are liable to just Censure, if either the former Judgment from which we receded, was better than this last; or if by altering our Measures so unexpectedly, we expose a Person to Disappointment and Derision, who did not deserve so unkind Treatment at our Hands (b). Though it be often a just Punishment to base Flatterers and Designers, to balk them of their greedy Hopes; and to cheat the gaping Crows, when they have prepared their Mouths for the Morfel (c).

VI. We may call it an Imperfect Promise, when a Man determines his Will to the doing a Favour hereafter, with a sufficient Sign to make it firm and lasting; or so as fully to declare his Willingness to lie under an Obligation, but not so as to give the other Party any proper Right of compelling him, to stand to his word. The like to which happens in the Duty of returning Kindnesses, where the Receiver is obliged to make a grateful Acknowledgment, though the Giver has not a full Right to require it. Some are of Opinion, that it is hardly possible to produce an Instance of this kind of Promise, in the Law of Nature, barely consider’d. It is usual to alledge for Examples, the Promise of an absolute Prince made to his Subject, of a Master to his Servant, of a Father to his Son, whilst yet under his Power; by all which the Parties promising, stand obliged to make good their Engagement; but the others seem to want a Right of demanding it from them, because they are allow’d in no Court to bring an Action against them upon Default. But now the Lameness, or Defect, of these Promises does not arise from any intrinsic Weakness or Invalidity; but from that Superior Quality, or Station in the Promisers, which hinders the Obligation from taking its full outward Effect. Others instance in an imperfect Stipulation; when the Civil Laws enjoin, that Promises shall be made under such a particular form of Stipulating Words; and will not permit a Man to sue another upon his Promise, if it did not run precisely in those Terms. Here they observe, that in case the Parties concern’d, fully intended to contract a perfect Obligation, and omitted the set Form of Law, only through Error or Imprudence, the Promiser is by Natural Equity engag’d to perform his word, though the other Person cannot force him to it by an Action in Courts of Civil Judicature. But neither have we in this Example a Promise, which is Imperfect upon account of the Law of Nature, but by Virtue of a Positive Law, which ties up its Effect to such a punctual Form of Speech; a Restraint, which naturally it did not lie under. A true Instance then, of an imperfect Promise is, when I express my self in this manner, I really design to do this, or that for you; and I desire you’d think I am in Earnest, and speak Truth. In which case I am bound to perform my Word, rather by the Law of Veracity than of Justice; I lay an Obligation on my self, but I give the other Party no Right of forcing me to perform it. Men have naturally somewhat of Greatness and Generosity in their Temper, upon account of which they had much rather seem to do a good Office, purely on the free Motion of their own Virtue, than for the sake of any Right which another has to challenge it from them. To this Head we may refer the Promises of Men in Favour and Authority, when not by fair Words and general Complements, but in a serious and particular manner, they engage to assist us by their Recommendation, Intercession, Promotion, or Suffrage; which yet they would not have a Man challenge from them by virtue of any Right, but desire they should be imputed wholly to their Generosity and Honour. Even the Law of Nature does not seem to allow, that a Man should be compell’d to the Performance of these Promises; since in the very Act of Engaging himself, he made a Tacite Reserve against such Proceeding; that his Benefit might carry the more Grace and Beauty in it, by being remov'd as far as possible, from Necessity and Constraint.

VII. A perfect Promise is, when a Man not only determines his Will to the Performance of such or such a thing for another hereafter, but likewise shews that he gives the other a full Right of challenging or requiring it from him. When we engage to give away a particular thing, or to perform a particular Service, the former is a kind of Alienation of our Goods, or at least somewhat in order to it; the latter is an Alienation of some part of our Natural Liberty; in as much as we are now to stick to the Restraint and Confinement of our Promise, about a matter, which before we might have used, or done, or omitted at our Pleasure. It must be well observ'd, that what we here deliver, concerns only such Promises as are made betwixt Men. For tho' it be impossible, that the Divine Promises should fail, yet it would be highly Arrogant and Indecent to say, that these seeming Engagements on God's Part do give a Right to Man, which shall hold valid against his Maker (a).

VIII. It is a nice Remark of Mr. Hobbs (b), and worthy our Notice, that in relinquishing or transferring Right, if we make use of no Signs except Words, those Words ought to be of the time Present or Past. For he for instance, who shall say in the Future, to Morrow I will give, plainly shews he has not given already; and therefore the Right he has over the thing promised continues firm and entire all this day, and all the next day too, and so on, unless in the mean time he actually give it, or pass away the Right of it by a new Promise. Yet in Case, besides his Words, he made use of other Signs sufficiently arguing, that it was his Will to transfer the Right at present; then the Words, though Grammatically Future, shall not hinder the Engagement from taking full Effect. But where these other Signs are wanting, we ought to be very tender of putting so wide and forced an Interpretation on Verbs of the future Tense, as to make them imply a present Act of Alienation. For since we are not wont to make over our Goods to others, without the Prospect of some Advantage to our selves, which Advantage does not, in these Acts of Grace or free Gift, visibly appear; therefore, in construing such an Act, to which Men are commonly averse, we ought not to presume on any thing farther, than what is by express Tokens of the Will declar'd. Especially since it is usual by these Terms to signify only a Simple Mark of Good Will (1), and such as shall, at present at least, have no Effect. So that whilst a Man speaks in the Future, he is suppos'd to be yet under Deliberation; and before the time prefix'd, perhaps his Affection and the Merits of the Person may alter; or some Misfortune may intervene, rendering it Incommodious for him to part with what he intended. In the same manner as he that makes his Will, does not transfer his Right immediately on the Heir; but he is suppos'd ever to have this Clause or Condition in his Mind, such a Person shall be my Heir, unless I alter my Will before my Decease. Though indeed, it be look'd upon as an Argument of Levity and Inconstancy, for a Man to cheat and delude another, with false Hopes and Expectations.

The Case is very different, if I express myself thus, I have given, or do give to be deliver'd to Morrow: For this is plainly, giving a Man to day the Right of having a thing to morrow; or transferring to him to day the Right over a thing, which ought to morrow to be actually deliver'd to him. Nor is it any Objection against what we have been asserting, that according to the ordinary form and manner of Speech, most Promises are express'd in Terms of Futurity. For in the most solemn Engagements by formal Stipulation, or by Oath, we use the same way of speaking, you shall have such a thing of me, I will give such a thing, &c. The reason of which Custom is, that the delivering of a thing promis'd, generally follows at some Distance. And indeed, we can scarce call it a Promise, when at the same time the Intention of giving is declared, and the thing actually tendred; in as much as there seems here, either to have been no Obligation, or such as expired in the very minute that it was contracted. However, it is plain the Generality of Men never think they properly have a thing, till they get firm hold and full possession of it. If then these Terms of Futurity occur in a perfect Promise, as for Instance, to morrow I will give you an hundred Pounds, the sense of them amounts to this, I now give you a Right to have and to require of me the said Sum; and I likewise oblige my self on the day appointed, to deliver it to you accordingly. We may settle the whole Point with more Brevity, by only saying, that Verbs of the future Tense, made use of in Promises, and especially the Term of Giving, do either imply an Obligation hereafter to be contracted, and then they neither transfer the Thing nor the Right to another; or else they import the delivering of a thing hereafter, the Right to which either is now, or has been formerly transferr'd; and then they do not hinder the Promise from being most Perfect and Compleat.

IX. It is Requisite, that whilst we are engaged on this Point, we endeavour to settle a famous Question, which has been much canvass'd by Authors, Whether there can be a force of obliging in bare Promises, or in bare Pacts, whilst they are no more than Verbal Agreements, and are not strengthen'd by any actual Performance betwixt the Parties (2)? Commanus (c) the Civilian has been the Principal

Affertor of the Negative Side; whom Grotius (a), and others have laboured to confute. And indeed, it has been the fixt Opinion of Wise and Learned Men in all Ages, that Faith ought to be kept inviolably, though given only in Words; or that a Man by speaking only, without the Intervention of any Deed, may lay on himself a Necessity of some future Performance (b). Whether Commanus has with any Colour opposed this universal Judgment, will appear, if we bestow a little time on taking his chief Arguments under Consideration. In the first place then, he says, that he who rashly believes a Promise made without Cause is no less to blame, than the vain Person who made it. Now here all the Difficulty lies in explaining what he means by a Promise made without Cause. If he would be understood of such Promises as if not perform'd, bring no Loss or Prejudice to the Party, to whom they were directed, and if fulfill'd, must needs create Trouble or Damage to the Performer, we are willing to allow, that Engagements of this kind produce no Obligation. For how can a Man have any Right of requiring me to put my self to any Charges or any Toil, in doing a thing which shall profit him nothing (1)? And it is indeed against Reason, to undertake an Action which can produce no Good, and may produce Evil. Thus for Instance, suppose you had got me to promise you that I would forbear eating four Days together; upon what account should I stand to such a rash Engagement, if so long a Fast would Prejudice my Health, and yet would contribute nothing to your Interest or Advantage? Therefore in this Case, it is alike Vain and Foolish in one Man to make the Promise, and in the other seriously to challenge the Performance of it. Besides, since Promises are matters of Grace, or free Favour, they ought to be interpreted under this Condition or Limitation, provided I can compass the thing I speak of, without any considerable Damage to my self. Nor can the Person to whom I make the Promise be so impudent and unreasonable, as to desire that my Kindness should be an Injury to me, and that I should enrich him by my own Losses (c).

But if by a Promise made without Cause, Commanus understands only a Gratuitous, or free Promise without prospect of Gain; then his Assertion will overthrow the whole Business of Beneficence and Liberality, and make all the Offices of Humanity base and mercenary Performances. For why should not I credit a Man who knowing his own Abilities, has bid me expect some free Gift from him, purely that I may have occasion to love and to esteem him? And since if he had pleas'd, he might safely have forborn the Promise, why did he order me to depend upon his word, if he design'd not fully to oblige himself to the making it good? For the denying of a Benefit is then only void of Injury, when a Man is bound to confer it only by the Law of Humanity; not when by express Promise he has given another a Right to receive it.

X. Commanus urgeth farther, 'That since Promises of this kind commonly arise from Ostentation, rather than good Will, or at least from Rashness and Inconsiderancy, supposing the Design to be real; the Fortunes of Men would be in great Danger, were they bound to perform every thing they said. It was perhaps on some such Principle, that the Ancients imagined the Oaths and Proteftations of Lovers were invalid, and that the Gods excused the breach of them, as proceeding from Minds blinded with Passion (d). But indeed the Danger here mention'd is chiefly in Imagination. For we do not attribute a Power of obliging to any Promises, but to such as are made upon serious and deliberate purpose; and he that mistakes jest for earnest, ought to pay for his want of Apprehension. On the other hand to promise really more than one can conveniently perform, as it must be acknowledg'd a Fault, so it would be a much greater, and indeed a piece of Barbarity, strictly to challenge and require it (e). And besides, we should take care to distinguish between such Terms of Honour and Esteem as Persons made

(a) L. 2. c. 4. f. 1. & 4. (b) Tull. Off. 1. c. 7. The Foundation of Justice is Faith, that is to say, a Firmness and Truth in our Words, Promises and Contracts. (1) Vid. D. L. 2. T. 14. Leg. 61.

(c) It often falls out, that even not to keep ones Promise shall be just. For all must be refer'd to the Fundamental Rules of Justice; as first, that no Man be wrong'd, and secondly, that the Publick good be as far as possible promoted. It may likewise happen, that the Performance of a Promise or Contract, would prove highly prejudicial, either to one of the Parties, or to the other. For if Neptune (as it is in the Story) had not made good his Promise to Theseus, Theseus had not been so unfortunately deprived of his Son Hippolitus. Therefore neither are we to keep those Promises which are unprofitable to the Person to whom they are made; nor those which are more hurtful to our selves than advantagious to him. It is a breach of Duty to prefer a greater Damage to a less. If you promise to plead another Man's Cause, and in the Interim your Son falls dangerous ill, it will be no Violation of your Duty to recede from the prior Engagement; and the Fault will be much greater in the other Party, if he complain of such a Disappointment. *Tull. use of to express in an indefinite manner, their good Affection towards us; and such particular Engagements as they bind themselves by, to perform somewhat on our behalf: For Men of good Nature and good Breeding often express their Kindness and Civility in very ample Terms; they declare themselves to be entirely ours, and offer all they have to our Service, and Disposal (a). Old Aeolus in Virgil had this piece of Gallantry:

—Tuus, O Regina, quid optas
Explorare labor: mihi jussa capessere fas est.
Æn. I. v. 80, 81.

—Great Queen, be pleas'd to say
The thing you wish: my Duty's to obey.

Here the Goddess had been uncivil, should she have taken advantage of his general Compliment. Words of this Nature then, however seriously deliver'd, oblige a Man to no certain Performance; but only serve to testify his hearty Respect and kind Inclination towards another (b). But those Promises by which we empower another to expect some particular and determinate Service from us, ought most strictly to be fulfill'd, because the other Party building on our word has adjusted his Affairs accordingly. So, though there now and then happens an Instance of a vain Prodigal, (who should have been put under Government for a Fool or a Madman,) that ruins himself by profuse and inconsiderate Engagements, this ought to be no Reason why we should affirm all Verbal Obligations to be Invalid, and banish them from the use of Human Life: As we don't condemn Suretyship in General, though many have suffer'd so severely by it. Upon the whole since an express Promise passes into a Debt, Men ought to be very Cautious of engaging for more than they are able to compass. And 'tis not Modesty, but a vicious Weakness in any Person to be so easie and tender, that he dares not deny the most Impudent and unreasonable Petitioner (1).

XI. What Connanus alleges more in defence of his Opinion, may be solv'd with little Difficulty. 'He says, 'tis fit that some things should be left to every Man's Honesty and free Bounty, and that should not be reduced to the Rigour and Necessity of strict Obligation. That the study of Integrity and Constancy would improve amongst Mankind, were there but a Field left for those Vertues to exert and exercise themselves in; which is hardly possible, if Men are compell'd to observe all the Promises they make. But that otherwise, it was a great and glorious thing to perform, what by words or other Signs you shew'd your Intention of doing; and so 'much the more glorious, the less it seem'd constrain'd. But indeed, there is still left scope enough for Liberality, though you give a Man a Right of demanding somewhat from you, which at first you might have securely denied him.

And since there must needs pass such a mighty number of Promises amongst Men, whilst they continually want the Assistance of each other, it is more for the Interest of Human Affairs, that there should be less Glory in the Act of keeping Faith, than that so many Persons should be deluded by other Mens Inconstancy and Irresolution. The Law of Nature commands us to lend to another, so far as we can do it without any considerable Prejudice to our selves. But the Obligation is rendred more strict and binding, if by our own free offer we reduce this general and unlimited Injunction of Nature, to a particular Engagement, and assure the Party that he may expect, for certain, it shall be fulfill'd. So that this Argument is plainly false, if I had not promis'd, it had been never the less the Duty of a just and good Man, to relieve the Indigence of others; therefore it is laudable to stand to Promises, not because we have bound our selves by giving our word, but because the Party is in real want of our Succour.

He is willing to grant thus much, that if a Man by breaking his Promise, has caus'd the other Party to suffer Damage; (who for Instance, might depend perhaps on his word, and so neglect to provide for his own Necessities;) that in this Case he should be bound to make good the Loss sustain'd. And from this Concession we may as fairly infer, that Promises may be challeng'd, and that we stand obliged to perform them, least we prejudice the Persons to whom they were directed. But it is very dangerous to draw thence such Consequences as these; That when you would not be in a worse Condition should I break my Promise, then you was before I made it, I may then have liberty of revoking it; supposing that nothing has yet been done towards the Performance. And it is more against Nature for you to require me to make good this Engagement against my Will for your Gain and Benefit; than it would be for me to recal it without your Detriment. For the Duty of Humanity is not fulfill'd by your not hurting another; but you ought as far as you are able positively to advance his Good. Therefore when you have peculiarly engaged your self to such a kind Performance on his behalf, to repent of your Design only with this Consideration, that it is not like to be the worse for your Inconstancy, looks as if it were a thing not worth a Man's Regard to improve the Condition of his Neighbour. The Case then is the same with these Verbal Promises as

(a) See 1 Kings XX. 3, &c. Though Josephus in his Antiquities otherwise interprets the place. Grotius saith, Ahab understood the Words in this Sense, I give up my self, and all I have in way of Homage and Fealty; but Benbadad took them in a stricter Meaning, for the very Propriety and Possession. Add. *Polyb. excerpt. with those Pacts which have receiv'd the farther Confirmation of some Deed between the Parties; and no one will pretend that we may run from those, when we see that our change of mind will not render the other Persons Condition worse, but only negatively, not better. Besides, as Grotius well observes from this Opinion of Commanus, taken in so gross and general a manner as he expresses it, 'twill follow, that Articles of Agreement made between the Princes and the People of different Nations, so long as nothing has yet been perform'd on either side, are Invalid (1); and especially in such Places where no particular forms of Leagues or Covenants have been receiv'd into use. And were this true, a general Diffidence and Jealousie, must reign amongst Mankind, and no one must believe another any farther than he can see him. Which close and immediate way of transacting, the Condition and Circumstances of many Men will not admit of; who may never the less have occasion to settle Business with each other.

The last Argument of Commanus taken from the Practice of the Roman Courts of Law, which granted an Action only upon such Promises as were confirm'd by Stipulation; is easily answer'd by observing, that the Reason of this Caution in the Civil Law was not because serious Promises do not bind by the meer Law of Nature; but that the Ceremony of these solemn Forms might put Men on considering throughly, whether it was Expedient for them to enter into a Promise which it would be impossible afterwards to revoke. As likewise, that the things promis'd might by this means be express'd more punctually and plainly, least any Obscurity in that respect might give Occasion to future Cavils and Disputes (a).

CHAP. VI.

Of the Consent required in the making of Promises and Pacts.

I. SINCE the regular Effect of Pacts and Promises is to abridge and restrain our Liberty, and to lay on us the Burthen of necessarily doing such or such a thing, which before we might have perform'd or omitted at our Pleasure; there can be no better Argument to hinder a Man from complaining of this Burthen, than to alledge, that he took it upon him by his own free Will and Consent, when he had full Power to refuse it (1).

II. This Consent is usually declared by express Signs, as by Speaking, Writing, Nodding, &c. Yet sometimes without the Help of any such Tokens it is sufficiently gather'd from the Nature and Circumstance of the Business (2). And it is well known that Silence it self in many Cases, is interpreted for Consent (a). But in all these Exceptions it is strictly required, that the State and Condition of Affairs be such as shall on every side conspire to ground the Presumption; and that not so much as one probable Conjecture appear to the contrary. For otherwise it would be very hard Measure to put a Man under Obligation, upon any little Hint or Symptom of Agreement. And thus we see wherein the proper Nature of a Tacite Pact consists; that it happens, when we express not our Consent by the Signs generally made use of in Human Commerce and Transactions; but leave it to be suppos'd from the Business it self, and from the Circumstances that attend it. What we most commonly meet with of this kind is, that when some principal and leading Contract has been entred upon by express Agreement, some other Tacite Pact is included in it, or flows from it, as we cannot but apprehend upon considering the Nature of the Affair. In the same manner, most Covenants leave some Slight Exceptions and Conditions to be understood. But we must have a care of stretching these Indulgences any farther than is well consistent with the carrying on of Trade and Business in the World; least they should prove of ill Consequence to the Validity of Contracts, by rendering them too slippery and uncertain.

Of Tacite Pacts, it may not be amiss to offer these few Instances. A Stranger comes into a State where Foreigners are treated with great Civility, and he comes in a friendly manner here; though he does not expressly swear Fealty to the Government, yet he is suppos'd by the very Act of his coming, tacitely to have engaged, that according to his Rank and Condition, he will conform to every Law of the place; so soon as he shall understand that such a Law was design'd to reach all manner of Persons who should abide in those Territories. And on the other side, the Government tacitely engages, to grant him Security and Protection, and the Benefits of publick Justice.

A Man is abroad at a distance from his Family and his Concerns, in the mean time a Neighbour without particular Orders, trans-

(1) This is very lively express'd in Prov. VI. 1, 2. and Promises are call'd a Bond in Numb. XXX. 5.

(2) Labeo ait convenire posse vel re, vel per Epistolam, vel per nuncium; inter absentes quos; [poss.]: sed etiam tacite consensu convenire intelligitur. D. l. 2, tit. 14. de Pactis.

(a) Thus to be Silent is to own your Crime, Euripid. Iphigen. in Aulid. v. 1142. vid. D. l. 50. tit. 17.

acts some Business for him; here again we must suppose a Tacite Pact, by Virtue of which the one having lent his free Assistance and Service, the other is bound to requite the Pains and to refund the Charge. In as much as it may be fairly presum'd, that had the absent Party known how Affairs stood, he would readily have consented to the whole Management.

A Guest sits down to a Table at a publick House; and though he has not exchange'd a word with the Host about the Price of his Dinner, yet by the bare Act of sitting down to eat, he is suppos'd to consent to the Payment of his Scot; since all know that this is not a Place where Men are treated for nothing.

As for those Tacite Pacts which we observ'd to flow from Principal Contracts, and which we may call Accessory, these Examples will shew the Nature and the Manner of them. A Man that bargains with another to have free Ingress to a Place, is suppos'd at the same time to obtain Liberty of Regress from it, though this be not expressly mentioned, because otherwise the former Agreement would be to no purpose. A Prince or Magistrate, who by Covenant gives leave to Strangers to frequent his Markets; is suppos'd to consent likewise, that they shall carry home the Goods they purchase there. As on the contrary, it would be most ridiculous Madness for me; supposing I have sold a Field to another, to deny him the Liberty of possessing it here, and to desire he would translate it to another place. In the same manner, he who lets out a Chamber to hire, is suppos'd to consent withal, that the Lodger shall make use of such other parts of the House, as he cannot be without; as of the Doors, Entries and the like; at least so far as to have free Access to his Apartment, and free Passage from it.

Instances of Tacite Exceptions and Conditions are so frequent, that 'tis not necessary to set down any in particular. But we must observe this of them in general, that they were ever to be interpreted with the greatest Strictness and Severity of Judgment; and that they will hold good no farther than it appears from very sure Grounds and Presumptions, that they were consented to by the Parties whom they concern (b). For otherwise, it would be easy to thrust a troublesome Obligation upon a Man against his Will. And were too great a Licence given to these secret and implied Reserves, there is scarce any Covenant, which might not be either annull'd or evaded (c).

III. To make a Man capable of giving a serious and firm Consent, 'tis above all things necessary, that he be master of his Reason; so far as to understand the business in hand, to know whether it be convenient for him, and whether he have Strength and Ability to perform it; and when he has well consider'd these Points, to be able to express his Agreement by sufficient Indications. Hence it follows, that the Promises of Infants, of Mad-men, and of Ideots, are utterly invalid (1). But as to the Case of Madness, it is particularly to be observ'd, that this does not render a Man's Actions null and void in moral Esteem, any longer than during the actual Continuance of it. But so long as he enjoys lucid Intervals of Sense, there's nothing hinders why he should not be able effectually to oblige himself for such time as the Distemper allows him the use of his Reason. Yet the Fit returning suspends his Power of contracting or of performing any Business, till he again recover the Government of himself and of his Actions. Therefore the Common Maxim in Civil Law, that Madness coming upon a Man destroys not any Business which he had before duly perform'd, is to be understood of such Affairs or Concerns as can be compleated and dispatch'd at once. Of this kind is a Will or Testament (2), which being once rightly made stands good; unless it be revoked by a sufficient Declaration to the contrary; such as a distracted Person cannot give. But in case a Man lies under such an Obligation as is to be fulfill'd by distant Acts, all requiring the use of Reason, it is plain that if he fall into Distraction, the Duty is thereby suspended. Thus if a Person bargain with me to work at my Affairs for a certain time; if he happen to be seiz'd with a Phrenzy, the Obligation expires, in as much as he is now incapable of making it good. Although indeed, in hopes that a Person in this Condition may recover his Health, we usually suppose him still to have inherent in him all his former Obligations, Powers and Rights, the Charge of exercising which is for a time committed to others.

(a) Add. Grot. l. 3. c. 24. See what we shall say hereafter in B. 4. c. 4. f. 15. (b) Add. l. 22. D. de Probation. & Præsumptionib. leg. 24. (c) The Roman Lawyers give this Instance of a Tacite Pact, in L. 2. T. 14. D. de Pactis, leg. 2. If I restore to my Debtor his Bond or Caution, it should seem there is a tacite Agreement between us, that I demand not the Loan. Yet here according to the Simplicity of Natural Law, there appears to be no Occasion of introducing a Tacite Pact, since it is much plainer to say, that by the returning back the Caution the Debt is suppos'd to be forgiven, and consequently no Room left for an Action upon it. But that the Civil Law chose this round-about way of proceeding, was the Effect of Caution, least an Obligation really contracted should seem to be Cancell'd by bare Consent.

And thus too in the Case propos'd, l. 51. Princ. D. locati, it was hardly Necessary to assert that it was silently agreed, the Owner should not be at the trouble of Tilling the Field, tho' he let it at a greater Rent. Since without any such feign'd Agreement, it is more Natural to affirm, that the Conditions on which this kind of Contract was founded, cannot be extended so far as to benefit the Hirer who is indeed worthy of no manner of Favour, in as much as he hath neglected to Cultivate his Land, according to Bargain. Vid. D. l. 17. tit. 1. Mandati, vel contra, leg. 6. l. 2. l. 19. tit. 2. Locati, condukti, leg. 13. in fine, & 14. Cod. l. 2. tit. 3. De Pactis, leg. 2. (1) *Vid. Institut. l. 3. tit. 20. De inutilib. But if the Madness be judg'd Incurable, the Person is in all Legal and Moral Consideration to be accounted Dead (a).

IV. Farther, since the use of Reason is exceedingly hindred, and sometimes entirely oppress'd by Drunkeness, it is a usual Question, whether a Person under that Disorder, can bind himself by any Covenant or Promise. Which we think ought to be decided in the Negative, in case the Intemperance were so great, as entirely to drown and overwhelm the Understanding. For it can by no means be esteem'd a real and deliberate Consent, if a Man should with never so much Eagerness of Inclination, run into an Engagement, and express his Agreement by Signs which would at other times be Valid, whilst his Mind lies as it were under a stupifying Charm, and he is bewitch'd out of his Reason. It would indeed be highly Impudent for a Person to challenge the Observance of such a Promise, especially if it could not be perform'd without considerable Burthen or Trouble. And if it farther appear, that he purposely took advantage of the other Man's Weakness, and cunningly drew him into an Engagement under that Distemper of his Brain, he stands liable to be punish'd as an arrant Cheat. But when a Man after the drunken Fit is over, shall upon being put in mind of his Promise acknowledge and confirm it; it shall then be Obligatory, yet not by Virtue of what pass'd when he was drunk, but of what he since did when he was sober. Yet the Merriment of a chearful Cup, which rather revives the Spirits, than stupifies the Reason, is no hindrance to the contracting of just Obligations; especially if they be afterwards renew'd at more sober Seasons. To this purpose, the account which Tacitus gives us of the old Germans is very remarkable. 'Tis at their Entertainments, says he, that they commonly make up Differences, contract Alliances, chuse Princes, and in fine dispatch most affairs of Peace and War. They think no time so proper as this, because the generous heat of the Liquour, as it opens their Hearts, and takes off all Disguise from their Thoughts, so it inspires them with brave Resolutions and hardy Attempts. They are Strangers to Craft and Dissimulation, and the Liberty of the Table gets out all they know, and all they design. But the settling and finishing of Business is left to the next Day, when their Minds are closed and their Judgments grown cool. Thus they make the right use of each Time; they consult whilst they cannot

It is true indeed, that Faults committed in Drunkeness, are not on that account excusable (c). Because, though a Person whilst the fit is on him knows not, perhaps, what he does, yet in as much as he voluntarily applied himself to the use of such things as he knew would cast a Cloud on his Understanding, he is supposed to have yielded Consent to all the Effects of that Disorder. Yet it will not follow from this Consideration, that the Promises of Drunken Men are Obligatory; because there is great difference, between committing a Crime, and contracting an Obligation. For since there lies an absolute Prohibition against all Sin, therefore Men are to avoid all Occasions that may probably draw them into a Violation of their Duty. And how many Enormities Drunkeness betrays a Man to, is obvious to the meanest Apprehension. An Action then in it self sinful, can by no means lose that Character by proceeding from another Sin which led and disposed a Man to it. But on the other hand, since it is left to our free Pleasure, whether we will contract new Obligations or no; we are not (as in the other Case) bound to avoid all Occasions which may render our Consent imperfect and invalid. As we are not bound to decline Sleeping, out of a fear that others should interpret our Nodding or Winking for a token of Agreement to somewhat which they proposed (d). Therefore if Drunkeness had no other ill Effect, but that it made a Man seem to give some Indications, which at another time would imply Consent; it would not on this bare Account be esteem'd unlawful. And since a Man cannot contract an Obligation by Promise or Pact, without agreeing to it, and at the same time understanding the Business; we cannot infer his Consent to such an Engagement from his first consenting to make use of a thing, which would probably hinder the Exercise of his Reason. Especially if we consider, that Men seldom drink merely for the sake of stupifying their Brain, but their general design is to comfort and chear up their Spirits; and the former effect steals upon them almost insensibly, whilst they unwarily prosecute the latter. To make the difference appear more manifestly, we may add, that since the property of a Crime or Offence is to bring some Evil upon some Man, and of a Promise to bring him some Good, which before was not his due,

(a) Vid. l. 1. T. 6. D. de his qui sui vel. al. jur. sunt. l. 8. t. 18. D. de Offic. Praesid. l. 2. D. de Procuratoribus, l. 5. f. 2. D. ad. l. Aquil. (c) Legislators have then thought fit to punish even Ignorance, when the Person is the cause of his own Ignorance. And therefore a double Penalty is usually enacted against drunken Offenders. For here the Excess, and consequently the Ignorance, was of the Man's own procuring, it being in his power to avoid them. Aristot. Ethic. l. 1. c. 5. f. 10. It was one of Solon's Laws, that a Governour taken in Drunkeness, should be put to death; and Pittacus decreed, that a Fault committed under this Disorder should have a twofold Punishment. Laert. l. 1. in Pittac.

(d) To this purpose, Sueton tells us a jesting piece of Knavery in Caligula. He made an Auction of his superfluous Gladiators; and as the Cryer was performing the Sale, a Gentleman of the Prætorian Dignity, happening to sleep upon one of the Benches, the Emperour commanded the Cryer to take notice of the worthy Chapman that Nodded to the Price proposed. And the Business was so managed, that the poor Gentleman had laid out Ninety Thousand Sesterces before he knew a Word of his Bargain.

and since to be positively hurt or injured, is more odious in the eyes of common Justice, than barely not to acquire some Benefit, there is much more reason why Drunkenness should invalidate a Promise, than why it should cancel a Transgression. As for a Man's being bound to pay for that useless load of Wine which he pours down after his Stomack is already overcharg'd, and which he would refuse were he in his Senses; this Obligation arises from the Contract, made at the first sitting down, by which he engaged himself to give the Price of whatever he should drink, though he drank it to no purpose. If during this Fit of sottish Extravagance, he be guilty of any mischievous Frolicks, as throwing away the Liquor, destroying the Vessels or the Windows and the like; he stands bound to make Satisfaction by the general Law of Reparation for Damages.

V. How long Children continue under such a Weakness of Reason as renders them incapable of contracting Obligations, we cannot universally determine; in as much as some arrive at a Maturity of Judgment sooner than others. Therefore in settling this Point, Regard is to be had to the daily Actions and Proceedings of the Persons, from whence the best Conjectures are to be made about their understanding; or commonly we have recourse to the positive Laws of the Country; all States almost having fix'd this Period by their particular Constitutions, and sooner or later, according as they found their People to be naturally more brisk and apprehensive, or more sluggish and heavy. Amongst the Jews, a young Man might oblige himself by Promise after thirteen years of Age, and a young Woman after twelve. But because Persons of tender Age, though they may sometimes tolerably understand Business, yet for the most part act with too much Vehemence and Rashness, are too free and easie in their Promises, eager and over-confident in their Hopes, proud of being thought Generous and Liberal, Ambitious and hasty in contracting Friendships, and not furnish'd with prudent Caution and Diffidence; it has been wisely order'd in most Commonwealths, that in contracting all Obligations, they shall be sway'd by the Authority of graver Heads; till such time as their Rashness and Heat of Youth shall appear to be in a good measure abated. Hence in some Places, whatever they do in their own Names, during their Minority, is declar'd Null and Void; in others, if they have been cozen'd or overreach'd, they are allow'd to recover full Satisfaction (a). The Law of Nature it self plainly directs, that these Provisions should be made by positive Constitutions. Especially since he would justly forfeit the Character of his Honesty, who should make his Advantage upon this easy Age, and enrich himself at the Cost of those, who for want of Judgment and Experience, either could not foresee, or do not rightly apprehend the Loss (b). The same Law of Nature enjoins, that when any Statutes or Customs of this kind have been establish'd in a Commonwealth, they shall be strictly observ'd; not only by the Subjects amongst themselves, but in all their Transactions with Foreigners. Not so much (as Grotius says in B. 2. c. 11. §. 5.) because he who enters into Contract in any Place, is during that Affair, bound by the Laws of the Country as a kind of Temporary Subject; as because no State will admit of an Action in its Courts of Justice, upon a Business not conformable to its Constitutions, unless it has particularly declared, that in judging the Causes of Strangers, the bare Law of Nature shall be followed. The same is to be said of Contracts made by Letter, between the Subjects of different States, when upon default, either of them sues the other in the Courts of his own Country. For though here the injured Party may not have made himself, so much as for a time, a Subject of the other Commonwealth; yet if he desires Redress by its Assistance, he must submit his Case to the standing Laws. Or supposing two Subjects of the same Nation should enter into a Pact or Promise, in some place which acknowledges no Sovereign, as on the wide Ocean, or in some Desert Island, they must never the less have recourse to the Laws of their Country, if they would obtain a full and perfect Right to what they bargain'd for; or an Action to hold good in Court upon Failure on either side. How the Case stands with Reference to the Acts of those Persons who are placed above the Power of Civil Laws, it will be our Business elsewhere to enquire.

VI. Another thing which invalidates Consent, and by Consequence the Promises or Pacts that are built upon it, is Error or Mistake (1); through which it comes to pass, that the Understanding is cheated in its Object, and the Will in its Choice and Approbation. We ought here carefully to distinguish, whether the Case relate to a Promise or to a Pact. As for Promises we may lay down this for a certain Rule, that if a Promise be grounded upon Belief and Presumption of some Fact (2) which really never was, or when in making an Engagement, of this kind I supposed such an Action, or such a Quality, without regard to which I should never have given my Consent; in this Case my Promise is naturally Null and Void; provided it appear evident from the Nature and Circumstances of the Business, that I agreed to the Proposal purely on account of that Fact, or of that Quality, which Orat. 75. Isæus. Orat. 9.* (1) *Demens est, qui fidem præst. See Daumot. of Civil Laws, 1 Part. B. 1. c. 18. f. 1.

I took for granted. Because, here I did not promise absolutely, but upon Presumption of a necessary Condition; which Condition failing, whatever was built upon it, must consequently come to nothing (a). Thus, for Instance, suppose I have been inform'd that you have done me a Kindness in promoting and well-ordering my Affairs, and upon this score I have promis'd you a Gratification; you will not say I am bound to stand to my Word, when I find the Intelligence was absolutely false. By the same Rule we may decide the Case proposed by Cicero in his first Book De Oratore, c. 38. 'A false report was brought home of the Death of a certain Souldier, abroad in the Wars. His Father believing the Story, alter'd his Will in favour of another Heir, and afterwards died. The Souldier at last returning safe, sues the Possessor of his Inheritance (b). It was here urged for the Plaintiff, that the Civil Law declares such Wills of a Father to be Null (1), in which the Son is neither made Heir, nor yet particularly, and by Name, disinherited; neither of which was done in the Will now under Consideration. But to this the Defendant might have return'd, that the Law cited on the other side, plainly suppos'd that the Father knew his Son to be living, which here he knew not, but imagin'd the quite contrary. Therefore it might perhaps have been a more clear and easie way of asserting the Souldier's Title, to proceed only upon the Law of Nature, and to alledge, that the Father's Will was ground'd upon Supposition of his Son's Death, which proving false, the Will became Void and Ineffectual; since it appears that his belief of that Report was the sole Reason of his altering his Measures. And hence too it is easie to answer that over nice Question of Sir Thomas Browne in his Religio Medici; whether it was lawful for the Person whom Lazarus had made his Heir to possess the Goods; or whether the Owner upon his being restored to Life, had not a Right to challenge them again. Where the latter must without doubt be affirm'd. For the reason why the Goods of the Deceas'd pass away to others is, because they themselves are taken out of the World, and consequently have no farther need of these Possessions. Hence in many places, some part of the Goods are set aside to be given to the Poor, or to the Church for the Benefit of the Soul of the Deceas'd. And in the Pagan Superstition, it is usual to bury or burn some of the Goods with the dead Body, for the service of another Life.

But in case the Promiser was negligent in searching into, and examining the Condition, upon which he built his Consent; he shall be bound to repair any Damage, that is sustain'd by the other Party, upon account of his idle Engagement.

If the Promise was not ground'd upon the presence or absence of such a Quality, as a necessary Condition, then though the Promiser was mistaken in that Point, yet his Obligation shall stand good. If the Promise were but in part occasion'd by an Error, it may as to the rest of it remain valid; unless one part were included by way of Condition in another; or unless the Parts cannot separately be perform'd; for then an Error in part destroys the whole.

VII. As for Mistakes in Parts, it seems necessary to distinguish whether the Person was through Error, drawn into the Bargain, or whether there proves to be an Error, as to the Thing or Subject for which he bargain'd. In the former Case we should again enquire, whether any Step is made towards Performance or not. If I am prevail'd with to enter into a Paet or Contract upon Mistake, and I find this Mistake out, before any thing is done in order to the fulfilling of the Agreement, it is but Equitable, that I should have liberty to retract (2); especially if upon making the Engagement, I plainly declared the Reason of my Proceedings. But if the Error be not discover'd till the Paet is either wholly or in part perform'd, then the Person who lay under the Mistake, cannot demand a Releasement any farther than the other shall, upon a Principle of Humanity, be content to allow him. For Instance, A Man being at a distance from home, receives false Intelligence, that he has lost all his Horses. Upon this Information he enters into Contract for the purchase of new ones; but before the Money or the Horses are deliver'd, he finds himself to have been deceiv'd in the former News. Here we judge he is not bound to fulfil the Bargain, in as much the Seller very well knows, that the false account of his Misfortune at home, was the Reason of his Purchase. Yet he is in Equity oblig'd to make some Consideration to the Seller; at least to repay the Damage which he sustains by losing the Bargain. But in Case the Money and Horses were on both sides deliver'd, though the Buyer should now find that he has no occasion for his Purchase, yet he cannot force the Seller to refund the Price, and to take back his Horses, unless this Condition was expressly mention'd in the Agreement.

But when there happens to be a mistake about the Thing which is the Subject of the Contract, then the Business is Null; not so much upon account of the Mistake, as because the Laws and Terms of the Agreement are not really fulfill'd. In as much as in all Bargains the matter, about which they are concern'd, and all the Qualities of it, good or bad, ought to be clearly understood, and without such a distinct Knowledge the Parties cannot be suppos'd to yield a full Consent. And therefore upon discovery of any Defect, the Person who was likely to suffer may either draw back from the Engagement, or may compel the other to supply what is wanting; and likewise to make Satisfaction for Damage, if occasion'd by his Deceit or Default. And this, not only if the Defect be immediately found out, but if it appear at some distance of Time. Which Period or Interval, when it is not fix'd by the Civil Laws, is to be determin'd by the Arbitration of some honest Referee; that no Indulgence may be given, either to Fraud of the one Party in concealing, or to the supine Negligence of the other in examining the Business. And the larger space of time is to be allow'd, if the Defect were such as did not appear to external view, or could not be discover'd but by Men of extraordinary Sagacity and Skill.

As to that Common Maxim with the Civilians, that an Error in the Essentials of a Pact, disannuls the Agreement (a), but not an Error in the Accidentals or Circumstances; we are so to interpret it, as by the Essentials to understand, not only what makes up the Physical Essence of the thing bargain'd for, but likewise those Qualities of it, to which the Contracter had an especial Eye and Regard. For it frequently happens, that in a Bargain some Quality of the thing shall be chiefly esteem'd and valued, and the Substance or natural Constitution be only look'd on as a necessary Adjunct or Vehicle (b). Thus my Contract will not only be void if I buy such a particular Slave of a Merchant, and he sends me a different Person; but likewise if I bargain'd with him for one skilful in the Art of Cookery, and the Man whom I receive proves utterly Ignorant of the Business, and incapable of serving me in that Condition (c).

VIII. Much more ought a Mistake to render a Promise or Pact Invalid, if it were occasion'd by the Fraud of one of the Parties, who by that means drew the other into the Engagement. What force or effect, the practice of Deceit in these Matters will bear, may be clearly stated by making these Enquiries; first, as to the Author of the Knavery, whether he with whom we bargain'd, or a third Person. And in the next place, whether the Deceit was really the Cause of our Engagement, without which we had not ventur'd upon it, or whether it was only accidental to the Business, which we had nevertheless undertaken, but were now cheated in the Thing and its Qualities, or the true price and value of them. If the Trick was put upon us by a third Man, the Party with whom we transact, not having been accessory to it, and the Thing for which we bargain'd proves without fault; in this Case the Agreement shall stand good; but we may recover of the Knave whatever we lose by his contrivance. If the Party himself with whom I contract, by some Deceit draws me into the Business, I am then free from all Obligation to performance (d). If the Deceit were not Antecedent to the Contract, but happen'd in it, with reference to the thing bargain'd for, its Qualities &c. the Agreement shall be so far void, as that it shall be at the pleasure of the suffering Party, either to reverse the whole Business, or to require Satisfaction for his Damage. A Matter not essential to the Agreement, nor expressly consider'd in it, shall not prejudice its Validity; though perhaps one of the Parties might have a secret and sly Respect to some such thing in the very Act of driving the Bargain. Upon what Right a Man may proceed, in Case he be egregiously cheated, as to the Price of any thing contracted for, we shall hereafter examine and declare.

IX. It comes now in Course, that we consider the Point of FEAR, what Power it has in rendering Human Acts incapable of producing an Obligation. There are two Species of Fear, which especially fall under this Enquiry. The former arises from some Vice of ill Disposition in the Person with whom we transact, or else from his ill Will to us in particular; whence we entertain a probable Suspicion, that he will deceive us. The other denotes a vehement terrour of the Mind, caus'd by the threatening of some grievous Mischiefe, unless we engage in the Promise or Pact desired. As to the first sort of Fear, this is evident beyond dispute, that if I see a Man who makes it his common practice to cheat all the World, and reckons every piece of Knavery a piece of Wit; or if as to the present Business I find he has a manifest Design upon me; I shall be a ridiculous Fool, if by trusting to his Faith, I expose my self to his Fraud, and to his Scorn. For he that runs into a Snare with his Eyes open, falls not only without help, but without pity (e). But whether this Fear or Suspicion of being deceiv'd, can render invalid a Pact already made, and can absolve the suspecting Party from a necessity of Performance, will appear when we shall have consider'd the Opinion of Mr. Hobbes, on this Point. He then lays it down for a Rule, that a Covenant wherein neither of the Parties perform presently, but trust one another, in a State of Nature, becomes void, if on either either side there arise a just Fear (a). Which Assertion we cannot admit of, but under this Construction; that one Party after the Covenant is made has just reason to fear, that when he has perform'd the Engagement on his side, the other Person will fly off. And by a just Reason to fear, we mean such as is grounded on plain Indications and Proofs. For it is highly Injurious to question a Man's Fidelity without good Evidence, when we have experienc'd it in former Instances. And indeed Mr. Hobbes himself by a subjoyn'd Note, brings his words to this qualified Sense; unless (says he) there arise some new cause of Fear from some Fact, or other sign of the Will, in one Party, tending to Non-performance, the Fear cannot be esteem'd just. For that which could not hinder a Man from promising, ought not to be admitted as an hindrance of performing. That is, though before the entering into the Covenant, one of the Parties might entertain some Suspicion, that the other would impose upon him; yet by the very Act of Covenanting with such a Person, he as it were renounces this fear, and declares it insufficient to hinder his believing and trusting him. And otherwise, no Engagement could pass between them. But at first this seems to have been Hobbs's Judgment, that a Pact thus made would be void, though there should no such fear arise after the Conclusion of it. As appears both from his Work of a Body Politick, written in the French Tongue (1), where we do not meet with this Restriction; and from the reason assigned by him in the Latin Treatise, for that Rule of his at present under our Examination. And the reason he gives for it is this, because he that performs first, betrays himself to the covetous Designs of the other Party, upon account of the ill Disposition of most Men, inciting them to study and advance their own Interest by right or wrong. But it is against Reason, that one should perform now, whilst it is improbable that the other will perform hereafter. Whence it is plain*, that he derives the Cause of this Suspicion, and Diffidence from the general Pravity of Mankind. And by this means must the greatest number of Mortals, be branded as Persons unfit to deal with; and in general, all Faith and Trust be banish'd from amongst those who are not subject to a common Ruler or Judge. For since we cannot be infallibly certain of any Man's Honesty, and since the World is for the most part inclin'd to Wickedness; and farther, since in a State of Nature, every Man orders his Business according to his own Opinion, and is Judge of the Justness of his own Fears, it will follow that a Suspicion, though Vain and Groundless, shall render a Contract Invalid; and therefore that Pacts are of no manner of use except under Civil Governments. And it is an exceeding hard Censure, to think the Greatest part of Men so grossly vile and wicked, as that (setting aside the Civil Power) the Fear of God, the Regard to Faith and Trust, and the Force of sound Reason shall have so little Influence on their Minds. Whereas, on the contrary there seems to be stamp'd on the Souls of all Men, in indelible Characters, a just Sense of the Duty of keeping their Faith Sacred and Inviolable; an Argument for which Truth, we may draw this easy and natural Reflection, That we can find no Man who will openly profess Perfidiousness, but every one who recedes from his Word or Bargain, pretends to have done it on very just and weighty Reasons. A Commonwealth which breaks its Faith with one of its Neighbouring States, immediately engages its Faith again, to procure the Alliance and Confederacy of another; and thus endeavours to avert the Danger it lay under from that Baseness and Treachery, by the Help of the same Duty which before it violated. We ought therefore to presume, that every Man will do what is just and honest, till his contrary Practice forces us to change our Opinion (b). From all which we may venture to conclude, that this Distrust of Men's Faith arising from the general Pravity of Human Nature, is not sufficient to justify the Non-performance of Contracts (c).

Nay, should we discover some particular Vices in a Person, this is not always a good Reason for us to recede from an Engagement made with him. For there are many Vices which have no ill Influence on the Duty of keeping Faith. Thus suppose a Man to be inclin'd to Lust, Drunkenness, or Cruelty, those ill Habits consider'd barely in themselves, do not hinder but that he may be a strict Observer of his Word, and a constant

What a stir's here? don't you owe it? did not you swear Payment?

Pimp. Yes, I swore and I'll swear again, whenever it pleaseth my fancy. Oaths were invented to preserve Mens Goods and Estates, not to ruin them.

The Character which Polybius in B. 6. p. 498. A. Ed. Wech. Casaub. gives of the Grecians is not much better. The publick Bankers of Greece (says he) if you lend them only a single Talent with ten Bonds, as many Seals, and twice as many Witnesses, yet will never be prevail'd upon to be honest.

(a) De Civæ, c. 2. s. 11. (1) This is a mistake of our Author, for 'tis only a Translation into French, as Mr. Barbeyrac observes. (*) And much more plain from his express Words in the English Leviathan, where the same Doctrine is thus deliver'd. If a Covenant be made, &c. p. c. 68. (b) To distrust every Body, says Lucian, is a most ridiculous Folly. (c) And therefore the Excuse of the Mitylenians for deserting the Confederacy of the Athenians, was Vain and Groundless, as it is given by their Ambassadors in Thucydides, B. 3. C. 12. Edit. Oxon. Pag. 154. When they had War, they for Fear courted us; and when they had Peace, we for Fear courted them. Thus our Faith on both sides was not preserv'd as is usual by mutual good Will, but by mutual Distrust; and they who could be first encouraged by Security were likely to be the first that should break the Union.

Performer of his Covenants. And farther still, should we find a Person addicted to such Vices as do commonly prejudice Fidelity and Trust; as if we observe in him a desultory Lightness and Inconstancy of Mind, an insatiable Desire of Riches, or a violent Strain of Ambition; yet even these Qualities do not give us an absolute Liberty of refusing to make good our word, when we have pass'd it on his Account. For in the first place, it may often happen that a Man out of a particular Inclination may practice Dishonesty towards others, and yet may live fairly and justly with me. And then, (as has been lately observ'd) by my very Act of bargaining with a Person whose Disposition I am acquainted with, I declare those Vices which I know him Guilty of, to be insufficient to hinder me from trusting him, and to renounce all my Privilege of making Exception against his present Morals, after the Business is concluded between us. For otherwise nothing would have been firmly transacted, supposing one Party at first to have made such a Reserve as should when he pleas'd overthrow the whole Proceedings. Though indeed when I have been once deceiv'd by a Man, I shall act very imprudently if I engage in any Contract with him again, without requiring Particular Security. And the very Proverb will tell me, that if such a Knave cheats me once 'tis his fault, but if he cheats me a second time 'tis my own (a). Or even after the Pact is concluded: Suppose I find by evident Tokens, that he is contriving to play me a Trick, I shall be an egregious Fool if I betray my self Voluntarily to his Designs (b).

Thus much we willingly allow, that in case a Man openly disclaims all Religion, or if he entertain such Opinions as amount to the same; we ought to place no farther Trust in his Pacts or Promises, than as either his manifest Advantage, and Interest obliges him to stand to them; or as we can by force reduce him if he fly off. Such Persons are those profess'd Atheists, who either deny the Being or the Providence of God; and nearly related to them, are the Maintainers of the Mortality and Impunity of Human Souls. For 'tis impossible, but that Men of these Principles should measure all Right, and all Justice by their own Profit and Convenience. Into the same Herd we may pack all those who practice some Villany or Vice for their set Trade and Employment; as Pirates, Thieves, Murderers, Pimps, Courtesans and other profligate Wretches who take Perjury for a Trifle, and make a Jest of sacred Obligations (c).

And this we are farther ready to acknowledge, that altho' the Argument of Mr. Hobbes, which we have here endeavour'd to refute, does not perform the Service he intends it for; that is, does not take off the Validity of Pacts in a Natural State; yet is in some measure capable of good use, in as much as we may draw from it the following Rules of Prudence. Never to depend much on a Covenant, but when we know that the Interest of the other Party is concern'd in the Performance of it, as well as our own; and that upon Default he is likely to suffer some greater Evil or Inconvenience, than he can incur by standing to the Agreement.

That he who enters into a Contract with his Superior should so order Matters, as that his Superior shall be oblig'd to be the first Performer. For if the weaker Person discharge his Part first, the Effect will probably be, either that he shall be disappointed and deluded; or that he must depend entirely on the Favour and good Grace of the other, for what he expects in return (d).

And lastly, that he exposes his Safety to manifest Danger, who by performing a Covenant weakens himself, and strengthens the other Party; upon hopes that in Requital, and according to the Agreement, he shall afterwards receive the like Assistance and Succour. For 'tis a piece of Folly to give a real and substantial Good, in Exchange for Words, Writings, or Seals, when we have nothing to oppose to the Charms of Ambition and Covetousness, but the ill-grounded hopes of Honesty and Fidelity (e).

X. We are now to proceed to that other Species of Fear, arising from the Approach

(e) Mauvozen. Hist. Venet. l. 5. p. 193. Ed. Ven. I dare not venture to place the Security of our Affairs in a League. For such is the Nature of Confederacies, that they are frequently hindred, and interrupted by the various Events of things; different Ends propos'd, draw the Strength and Minds of the Allies different ways; and whilst each State pursues its own private Interest, the common Good is disregarded or betray'd. Reinforcements and Supplies are neither sent in equal Proportion, nor at the time agreed upon; hence arise Suspicions, and Estrangement of Affections, from this open Quarrels, and from Quarrels utter Desertions, and Violations of the main Contract; and thus at length, those of the Confederates who are least able to make Resistance, become a Prey not only to their Enemies but to their Allies.

or the Apprehension of some grievous Mischief. And in stating this Point it is necessary, that we go back to furnish our selves with some clear and fundamental Principles. And such is this undoubted and original Truth, that our Will naturally inclines to what it looks upon as good. Now it appears no less Good, and Desirable to the Will, to avoid an imminent Evil, than to acquire an absent Benefit; and towards the attaining of both these Ends, we employ the most likely Means, although they be such as we should not barely on their Account chuse or embrace. For we commonly make use of Methods in themselves ungrateful and troublesome for the escaping of a Danger, as for the acquiring of a Pleasure. Tho' indeed, the Hopes of compassing a Good does more sweeten the Grievousness of these Means or Methods, than the Care of preventing an Evil. For which Reason Aristotle (a) calls those only mixt (that is, partly voluntary, partly involuntary) Actions, which are undertaken for the sake of declining some Mischief which we are like to suffer; as in that trite Instance, of throwing Goods over-board in a Storm. Though as great Hardships as any of this kind, are undergone by the Wrestlers, and other Engagers in the publick Games, to prepare their Body for those Exercises (b). What we would observe then is this, That although Actions perform'd upon Fear of a greater Evil, ought to be accounted Spontaneous, and tho' the lesser Evil, which in those Cases we chuse, is as Things then stand, the real Object of our Desire; yet all this is not sufficient to found an Obligation in us towards another. For since every Obligation is directed towards some other Party, to whom it is to be made good, and who thereby obtains a Correspondent Right of compelling us to Performance; to produce such an Engagement, 'tis not enough that one Person has in him the due Grounds or Principles of an Obligation, but it is requisite, that there be in some other Person Principles fit to create a Right. For we can have no Notion of an Obligation, unless a Right answer to it, or be consequent upon it. As I can owe nothing, if there be no Person who can rightly demand any thing from me. Therefore such Fear alone invalidates and destroys an Obligation, as is caus'd by some Vice or Imperfection in the other Party, rendering him incapable of acquiring a Right (1). And such a Defect is every injurious Action; which cannot be said to produce a Right without a manifest Contradiction. For to pay what another has a Right to demand, is a Precept of the Law of Nature; and should an Injury (that is, a Deed or Fact directly contrary to that Law) be able to cause any such Effect, the Law of Nature would lend Strength and Assistance to its Enemy, and manifestly contribute to its own Destruction. We may as well say, that a Law which forbids Thieves, may at the same time reckon their Trade and Practice amongst the honest ways of Gain.

XI. But, before we apply these Remarks more closely to the Point, it is necessary that we make farther Enquiry, whether the Author of the Fear was the Party with whom we are engaged in Business, or some other Person. And then again, whether he had a just Power and Authority of presenting such a Fear to our Mind or not. For this is true beyond Dispute, that in case I have taken an Obligation upon me through Fear of Mischief, threatened by a third Person, neither at the Instigation, nor with the Confederacy of the Party, to whom the Engagement was made, I stand firmly bound to perform what I promis'd him. For there appears no Fault in him, which might render him incapable of acquiring a Right upon me; and on the contrary, he may justly challenge a Requitall, in that he lent me his Assistance, in warding off the Danger I apprehended from another Quarter (2). Thus, if I hire a Guard of Souldiers to defend me against Robbers, I am no doubt oblig'd, strictly to pay them the Price of their Service. And a Man who being reduc'd to a low Condition, procures by large Promises, the Help of others, and having by their Means escap'd the Danger, is afterwards backward in performing, contracts the double Guilt of Perfidiousness, and of Ingratitude.

A Promise is likewise Valid, if made to a third Person, through our Awe and Dread of a lawful Superior; who had a just Right of Commanding us, and of denouncing a Penalty upon Default (3). For here the Party to whom I make the Engagement is in no fault; and I can only blame my self for being driven to a thing through Fear of Punishment, which I ought Voluntarily to have undertaken. Thus should a King lend a Body of his Souldiers for Guards to a Foreign Prince; and for the greater Security, command them to swear Obedience to the Stranger; they shall not afterwards fly from their new Obligation, upon pretence that they were brought to it by Fear; since the Fear proceeded from him, who had a Sovereign Right of laying this Injunction on them, and of forcing them by any Methods to their Duty. In the same manner, should we suppose that a Father might betroth his Daughter to a Man, quite against her Inclination; in this Case, when she, out of fear of her Father's Authority, has given her Faith to the less agreeable Spouse, she cannot afterwards disappoint him. For there is no Fault in him, to prejudice his Right, accruing from that Promise; and the Daughter ought freely to have obey'd her Father's Pleasure; and so cannot plead Compulsion, when she had no Right to resist. Thus far then it is a Point of Moment to consider, who was the Author of the Fear. But in other Cases, the Rule of the Roman Lawyers holds good, that it makes no difference from what Person the Fear proceeds; that is, when no one has a Right of putting us into such a Fear; and when the Fear is actually the Cause, not the bare Occasion only, of the Promise or Pact, consequent upon it (a).

Those Promises then, or Pacts we take to be Invalid, which a Man is compell'd to engage in, by the unjust force of the Party, to whom they are made. For since he who extorts any thing from another, by using unjust Terrours, is by the Law of Nature bound to restore it; and must consequently make good what the other Person loses by such a forced Bargain (1); the Necessity of Reparation in the Party who offer'd the Violence, takes off all Obligation to payment in the Party who suffer'd it; because should he offer to do, or to give what in the Agreement he promis'd, he ought in common Justice, immediately to receive full Recompense, or full Restitution (2). And 'twould be a foolish and idle way of acting, when we are once got clear of the Danger, to pay voluntarily what we promis'd upon force, and then to require Reparation of the Damage (b). Especially since the other Party, when he demands or accepts our Promise, does by that very Act declare manifestly, that 'tis far from his Thoughts and Designs to make us any Satisfaction. Besides, how ridiculous would it be in you to reckon it a piece of Merit, when you forbear a Mischief which the Laws forbid you to commit, to pretend that you do a Man a Kindness, by refraining from some notorious Villainy. And therefore Cicero (c) utterly denies himself to have been obliged to Antony, for not killing him at Brundisium: What Benefit, what Favour is it (says he) that you withheld your Hands from the foulest Wickedness? What Kindness can Thieves boast of but that they spared a Man's Life, when it was in their power to have murder'd him (d)?

No more is a Man bound to perform his Promise, who in a Case of this Nature, gives Security for the Person in Distress; although his own Fear is not the Cause of his entering into the Engagement. For since Suretyship is a kind of Inferior Contract, admitted to confirm and strengthen the main Business; it would be absurd (at least with regard to Natural Law) to attribute more Efficacy to the former than to the latter; to make the Principal Debtor less strictly obliged, than he who comes into the Business purely for his Assistance (3). The Case is otherwise, if this third Party for the relief of the Sufferer, contract an Obligation, in which he himself is the Principal, not the Surety, or the Accessory. For Instance, if a Man out of Kindness and Pity, should promise some Reward to a Villain, upon Condition he will set a poor Wretch at Liberty, whom he has got under his Power. For here the Contracter himself is not properly put under Fear, nor can he use those Exceptions, which might be made by the Person he delivers; in as much as he engages upon his own Score, not in the name of the Other; and cannot be said to build his Bargain on a primary Obligation; since indeed, none pass'd but what he freely set on Foot, and of which he took the whole Burthen on himself. And he ought to esteem it a thing well worth his Pains or Cost, to have saved the Life of an innocent Man, and to have acquired the Glory of Beneficence, in so extraordinary a Degree.

But if a Person in this Captive Condition, upon making Terms for his Liberty, shall leave Hostages to continue under the power of the Villains, till such time as he shall have perform'd what he promis'd; he is then indeed bound to make good his Word; yet not Controv. 26.* The Question is whether Force and Necessity render a Business Invalid, when they did not proceed from the Party contracting? What Influence, (will he say) 'Can your Compulsion have on me when it was not I that compell'd you? The Punishment cannot be mine, unless the Fault were mine. But the other denies this way of arguing. The Laws, says he, as to the present Case, doth not prosecute him that offers the Violence, but assists and relieves him that suffers it; it seeming unreasonable, that a Man should be bound by an Engagement thrust upon him against his Will. Whence the Necessity proceeded, is a Point of no Weight in the Dispute. That which renders the Contract unjust, is the hard Fortune of the Sufferer, not the Person of the Doer. Idem. Controvers. l. 4. c. 8. If it be said it was not I that applied the Force but another; the Answer is, that Man who makes his Advantage by Violence, offer'd by some other Hand, is no less Guilty, than if he had been himself the actual Performer.

by Virtue of his Contract with the Rogues, but of that whereby he stands engaged to the Friends whom he has left in his room. In Morocco, and other parts of Africk, the whole Body of Christian Slaves pass their Faith for each particular Man of their Number, that he shall not go off; and by means of this Security, they are allow'd to walk the City without their Chains; and in case one of them make their escape, the rest are obliged to pay the Price he was valued at. Whether an Oath added to Promises of this kind, does more confirm and establish their Force, we shall hereafter examine.

It is a noted Saying of Tully in his third Book of Offices, c. 30. If you have agreed with Thieves to give them such a Sum to save your Life, it is no Deceit to recede from your Promise, though you have given your Oath too for the Performance. For Robbers or Pirates are not in the number of any particular and lawful Enemies, but should be look'd on as the common Adversaries of Mankind; and therefore no true Faith or Oath can properly pass between us and them. Which Assertion we thus far allow holds good, that a Promise made to such Men through the Compulsion of Fear shall not be binding. But the reason on which Tully proceeds, is not satisfactory to many Persons; especially, if extended to such Pacts or Promises, as we commence with the same Villains, without being brought to it by Violence. For though by the common Custom of Nations, a Lawful Enemy and a Robber are treated in a different Method (a), yet the latter cannot be said immediately to lose all Rights of Humanity; at least, if he still deal with some Persons in a fair and peaceable Manner. For when he transacts with me, without influencing my Consent by Fear, he bargains not as a Robber, but like any other Man. Now a Robber is call'd a common Adversary, because he does not like other Enemies, offer War peculiarly to any Party, but practises hostile Force upon all, without Distinction, that fall into his hands. Upon which account, in order to quell, and to suppress him, there is no need of the Formalities of denouncing War, and lifting Soldiers against him; but Nature Commissions every Man to prosecute him in a military way. But it may still be affirm'd, that as by Tully's own Confession, a State of Hostility does not hinder us from being bound to observe Faith with an Enemy; so neither is this common Hostility of the Robber an Hindrance to our performing a Covenant made with him; especially if, as we have all along suppos'd, he lays aside the Part of an Enemy, in the Act of Covenanting.

Grotius forms another Objection to this purpose (1); 'Such as are notoriously Wicked, and are no part of any Civil Society, may if 'we regard the Law of Nature, be by any Man punish'd. (This Hypothesis we shall examine in another place.) Now they who may be punish'd, and even with Death, may likewise be dispoil'd of their Goods, and dispossess'd of their Rights. But, amongst their Rights, that which accrues to them from our Promise is one; and therefore that too may by way of Punishment be taken from them. But Grotius answers this Argument with great Ease. For he that Voluntarily bargains with a Thief, knowing him to be such, does by that very Act renounce all Exception against his Person, which might otherwise render the Promise Invalid. Else the Business was Vain and Insignificant, and nothing really pass'd between them. Should I be got out of my Road, and promise a Thief some Reward for setting me right again, there is no doubt to be made, but I ought freely to pay it. And thus too the Roman Lawyers, rightly maintain (2), 'That whatsoever is deposited with us by a Thief, ought to be restored to him, if the true Owner of it does not appear. To which, they should add this farther Condition, that the Man who receives the thing in Trust, does not know the Fraud of the other. For in Case he is satisfy'd, that the Person is a Villain, and that the Goods are stoln, I do not see how he can take them in Charge, without bringing himself in as an Accessory to the Crime.

XII. But many indeed there are, who maintain that Pacts and Promises, though extorted through Fear, have yet the Force and Power of Obliging (3). Some urge the Authority of the Roman Law, which by giving full Restitution, should seem to suppose, that those Engagements are in strict Justice binding, but ought to be reliev'd and corrected in Courts of Equity. But 'tis easy to vindicate the Practice without drawing any such Conclusion from it. For since the Parties are Members of a Civil State, the Court does not presently take it for granted, that one of them offer'd Violence to the other; and since that Point may bear a Dispute, it seems convenient, so long to keep up such a Contract, and to suppose it good, till the Judge shall receive manifest Evidence, that the Allegation of Fear, on which the Action was grounded, was really just and true. But it does not follow hence, that Contracts of this kind, or other Business which may be disannull'd, by a peremptory Exception at Law, are in themselves Firm and Obligatory; since the Formality of that way of Proceeding, though proper for Civil Judicature, yet is not agreeable to the Simplicity of the Law of Nature; at least, when the Case happens between Persons who do not acknowledge a Common Judge.

Grotius asserts (a), 'That a Man who makes a Promise through fear, is therefore Naturally oblig'd to perform it, because he plainly gave his Consent, and such Consent as was full and absolute, according to the present posture of Things (b); though he had never pass'd his Consent, had he been secure from the Danger. But in Answer to this, 'tis sufficient to repeat what we formerly observ'd, that since every Obligation arising from a Contract, supposes a Correspondent Right in the other Party, it is not enough that I have in me the necessary Causes, and Principles of an Obligation; but 'tis Requisite, that the Person with whom I deal, be free from all such Defects as might hinder him from obtaining a Right upon me. And therefore my having the Power to give a thing, does not presently make another have a Power of receiving it. Since then an Obligation without a Right, answering to it, is of no use or purpose; it cannot be imagined, that my bare Consent should bind me to a Performance, which the Law of Nature forbids the other Person to receive at my Hands. And this is manifestly the present Case. For the same Law which prohibits the Application of Violence and Terror, must needs at the same time prohibit the Acquirement of any Right, or any Gain, by such wicked means. What Grotius subjoins appears not altogether agreeable, 'That if he to whom the Promise was made, did obtain it of the other Party, by putting him in a Fear, though never so slight, he is oblig'd to release the Promiser if he desire it; not because the Engagement was Invalid, but by reason of the Damage which he unjustly occasion'd. Now if I can at my Pleasure or Desire be freed from my Obligation, I am already actually quit of it. What need is there then of this round-about way of Application. You ought to release me from my Obligation, if I request it? Is it not more Easy, and more Natural to say, Since you compell'd me by force to make the Promise, I owe you nothing; and 'tis idle in you to demand that of me, which should I pay, you are oblig'd immediately to restore (c).

XIII. The same Opinion is defended by Mr. Hobbes (d), tho' by different Arguments. He says, Covenants entred into by fear, are not therefore Invalid, because they proceed from Fear; for then it would follow, that those Covenants by which Men unite in Civil Life, and make Laws, must be Invalid; for the fear of mutual Slaughter, is the Cause of one Man's submitting himself to the Government of another. It would follow likewise, that a Man acts Irrationally, who believes his Captive, bargaining with him for his Ransom. Now in the first of these Reasons there is a plain Ambiguity in the Term of Fear. For that Fear which engages Men to enter into Civil Societies, is of a quite different kind from that which we are now considering. The former is a Caution against some Evil which may happen Indefinitely; I know not when, nor which way. The latter is a dreadful Apprehension of grievous Evil, just now coming upon me; and which I am not able to resist. Therefore the Covenants which we make for the Procurement of mutual Assistance against a common Enemy, are entirely of another Nature, from those by which we promise some Reward, to free our selves from a Danger, which a Villain unjustly brings upon us. As to the latter Reason, we readily acknowledge, that a Rogue acts very irrationally, when having first extorted a Promise by Force, he afterwards yields Credit to the Person, as if the whole Business had been honestly and fairly transacted. For that Wickedness and Folly should meet together, is no Contradiction (e). On the other side, we may venture to say, that he would not act very rationally, who being got safe from a Mischiefe, with which he was Unjustly threatened, should freely pay the Ruffian the Price of his Villany (f).

He adds, 'tis universally true, that Pacts oblige, whensoever a Good is receiv'd, and when the Act of promising, and the Thing promis'd are both lawful. But it is lawful for me both to make a Promise for the rescuing of my Life, and also to give what I will of my own, even to a Robber. But indeed, what the Robber in this Case performs for the Traveller, in forbearing to take away his Life unjustly, cannot be call'd a Good. The abstaining from an Injury, ought not pass for a Benefit. And we are then only said to have done some Good to a Man, when we have confer'd some Advantage on him which he wanted, or secured and preserved some which he before enjoy'd; or have deliver'd him from some Evil or Danger, which fell upon him without our Fault (g). As to the latter part of the Argument, it is no good Consequence to say, 'It is lawful for me to promise and to pay the Villain; therefore he has a Right of requiring the Performance from me; or therefore I stand bound towards him by some inward Tie upon my Conscience. We may do many things lawfully, which we cannot be engag'd to do by any Obligation. I may lawfully throw away my Goods; but does it therefore follow, that another can oblige me to such an Extravagance. So that the Rule which the same Author lays down on this Subject in his Leviathan (a), is likewise false; Whatsoever I may lawfully do without Obligation, the same I may lawfully Covenant to do through Fear; and what I lawfully Covenant, I cannot lawfully Break. For he ought to have added this Condition, Provided the other Party can honestly demand it of me.

XIV. There is on this Point, still one Question behind, which requires our Examination; Since Promises made through Mistake, or thro' Fear, are void; suppose the Party after he gets rid of his Mistake, or of his Fear, is inclin'd to stand to his Bargain, What must be the way of ratifying such Promises, and of putting them in full Force? For an Obligation that was at first Invalid (1), may afterwards recover its Strength, by the Intervention of some new Cause, fit to create a Right; which in the present Case, must be a clear and voluntary Consent. Some then are of Opinion, that for the Confirmation of such a Promise, no more is Requisite, than an internal Act of the Mind, or a full and free Agreement to the Business, though it be not express'd by any outward Sign. For the outward Sign, they say, has pass'd before; and this being now enforced by the clear and free Determination of the Mind, nothing is wanting to the Production of a firm Engagement. Others dislike this way of deciding the Controversy; because they conceive that the Internal Consent, and the External Sign, ought to exist together; and that therefore an antecedent external Act, cannot be a Token of a subsequent internal Act, which perhaps was not then thought of. And upon this account, they to make such a Promise Valid, require a new Verbal Promise and Acceptance. Grotius (2) offers a middle Judgment, that 'tis indeed absolutely necessary, some Signs should be used to Declare such a subsequent internal Consent; because, the other Party would else have no Assurance of his Right; but there is no Necessity the Signs should be Verbal, since others may serve as well to the purpose; as suppose the Promiser understanding his Error, or being deliver'd from his Fear shall voluntarily give what he engaged for, or if the thing be already given, shall not endeavour to recover it, when he has convenient Means; or shall treat afterwards with the other Party, about the same thing as he would about any thing else, which the said Party lawfully possesses. To which Decision we readily subscribe.

XV. We are farther to observe, that to the rendering of a Promise good and valid, there is required, not only the Consent of the Person who makes it, but likewise of him to whom it is made (b); and this latter Consent too (as well as the former,) must be express'd by sufficient Signs; and for this a bare Nod will serve, if the thing offer'd, either be a matter of free Bounty, or have been before requested. For if the other Party do not Consent, or do absolutely reject the Proposal, the thing promised still remains in the power of the Promiser; though he had sworn to part with it; for even an Oath cannot transfer a Right before Acceptance; and has only this effect, that makes it unlawful for me to revoke my Offer, till I am assured of the other Man's Refusal. For he that proffers any thing of his own to another, does neither intend to force it upon him against his Will, nor quite to give it over, and throw it away at a Venture; and therefore he loses nothing of his Right and Title to it, in case the other Person refuse to take it. If a Request pass'd before hand, it shall continue in Force, unless it be expressly revoked; and in this Case the Acceptance is supposed to have been made in the very Petition; provided still, that what is offer'd, be equal to what was desired. For if a Man ask me to lend him a greater Sum, and I proffer a less to make such an Engagement good, his express Acceptance is necessary; in as much as this lesser Sum may perhaps no ways answer his Occasions, or turn to his Profit; and therefore unless this express Acceptance intervenen, he shall be responsible only for such a Sum as he first ask'd me to supply him with (c).

Since in all Obligations whatsoever, there is required the Consent of the Person to whom they are directed, or who obtains a Right by them; declaring (by himself or Deputy,) that he accepts the Obligation, and the Right which it transfers to him; and this with Signs sufficient, to express the inward purpose of his

That is, because the latter can obtain no Right, but what results from the Consent of the former. If the Promiser shew his Agreement to the Request of the other Party, barely by Nodding, or any other Sign of the like Nature, he shall be suppos'd that the Request was tacitely repeated. *Add. Add. l. 3. D. de pollicitat. Vid. D. l. 50. tit. 12. de pollicitat. Whence some have concluded, that to render a Promise Valid, the bare Act of the Promiser is sufficient. Grotius (l. 2. c. 11. f. 14.) answers, that a Promise once made cannot indeed be revok'd; so as always to lie ready for Acceptance, though before Acceptance, the Obligation is not fully contracted. But those who look more closely on that Passage in the Civil Law may find, that Ulpian teacheth no more than this, a Covenant is the Consent and Agreement of two Persons, but a Promise is only on the part of the Offerer; where it is not-denied, but that Acceptance makes even the latter Firm and Obligatory. And indeed, the State or City, of which Ulpian speaks, had before signified its Acceptance, in case the Promise were made on the account of Honours, already granted or now desired; and only refused it when the Promise was made without Cause, Vid. l. 1. f. 1. d. t. l. 19. D. de donat. And again, l. 3. f. 1. d. t. Things thus deliver'd without Cause, are forbidden to be claim'd; because the Propriety of the things being already transfer'd on the Community, they could not properly be deliver'd without the Publick Acceptance.

Mind; we may hence understand somewhat as to the Firmness of Religious Vows, or Engagements voluntarily undertaken with regard to Almighty God. And it seems impossible to make these with any Force, unless God has by Revelation declared His Acceptance of them; or unless He has constituted some Vice-Gerent upon Earth, to judge of their Validity. For otherwise a Man cannot be certain, whether it is the Will of God he should, or should not bind himself in this manner; whether his Vows are pleasing or displeasing to Heaven. Especially since the Subject of Vows must be such matters as God has not by way of Command, punctually and precisely required at our Hands. For 'tis absurd and contradictory to reckon that an extraordinary Performance which is a matter of strict and necessary Duty; and how can we be assured except by Revelation, that any Act which God has not enjoyn'd will be acceptable to him? And to engage in Vows without knowing whether they will be receiv'd or not, is idle and useless. But may we not in many Cases, reasonably presume on the Divine Consent and Approbation? This we think can only be done in those things which are Indefinitely agreeable to the Law of Nature, and therefore to the Will of God; but in which the Application to Persons, Places and Times, and the Allotment of the particular Quantity are left to the Pleasure, and the Judgment of Men. Thus we take those Vows to be good and justifiable, by which a Man binds himself to bestow such a Sum of Money in Charity to the Poor, or on other pious Uses; provided that such an Act of Bounty be no hindrance or prejudice to any Duty absolutely necessary. Or if he enjoyn himself set Days of Fasting; or resolve to abstain from some particular Meats and Drinks, within a fixt Measure and Quantity; or if he deny himself the use of some superfluous Ornaments; as the wearing of Jewels, Pearls and Gold; or lay any Command, or Prohibition on himself of the like Nature; all which Performances fall under some general Vertue, though the determinate Manner and Proportion of them are not matters of strict Precept. On the contrary, such Vows as only create trouble to the Undertaker, and no Benefit to other Men; we esteem no better than Idle and Superstitious, especially if they prove an hindrance to other Duties.

A Scruple has been sometimes moved, whether the Obligation in the Promiser begin at the very Moment, when the Offer is accepted by the other Party; or whether it is farther necessary, that the Acceptance be formerly made known to the Promiser. And here it is certain, a Promise may be design'd, and be expounded two ways, either thus, I engage myself to do the thing if it shall be accepted; or thus, I engage myself to do the thing if I shall under- stand that it will be accepted. Now which of these two Senses the Promiser intended, is to be gather'd and presumed from the Nature of the Business. If the Promise were a matter of pure Generosity, without Restriction or Limitation, we are to believe it was meant in the former Sense; because here the Promiser hastens as it were to bind himself, without staying for any Formality in the other Party. But those Promises are to be understood in the latter Sense, which express any Clause or Condition essential to the Engagement (a).

XVI. It remains that we add a Remark or two about the Signs of Consent, which are absolutely necessary to the producing of any Obligation, in as much as the bare Acts of the Will can have no effect amongst Men, unless manifested and declared by some external Tokens. Of Signs, the more imperfect are some particular Motions and Gestures, necessary to be used in Commerce, when the Parties transacting are unacquainted with the Language of each other. The more perfect are Words, and such Words as are understood on both sides (b). And to make these declare the Will more clearly and more firmly, it has been a constant Practice, both to make use of Witnesses in Contracts of Weight and Moment, to whose Memory and Conscience Appeal might be made, in Case either of the Parties denied the Engagement, or cavil'd at the Expression; and also (as a higher degree of Confirmation,) to set down the Terms of the Covenant in Writing (c). For the Memory of Witnesses may be treacherous, or their Integrity capable of Corruption; but Writings are a much stronger Security, both against Forgetfulness, and against Unfaithfulness. And as for bare Words, it is a usual way to elude them, by pleading that they were utter'd through Rashness, before the thing had been consider'd. But Writings do exclude all such Prevarication; whilst they are drawing up, they set the Business clearly and leisurely before the Eyes of the Contracter; so that if he once declare his Approbation of them, he must be judg'd to have yielded full consent to the Engagement, and cannot afterwards pretend that he was drawn in by Passion or Precipitancy. Nor are Writings liable to such violent and crafty Interpretations as are often put upon Men's Discourse; in which one Particle artificially inserted, and through the quickness of the Pronunciation passing undiscover'd, shall unravel and overturn the whole Affair. And there it is not without good Reason, that more Credit is given to Authentick and Unquestion'd Instruments, than to the Depositions of Witnesses; since what a Man testifies against himself, is much stronger Evidence than what can be offer'd by others; and since the Charge never lies so heavy upon him, as when his own Authority is produc'd against him. Yet the Force of Unquestionable Witnesses must then be admitted as Superiour, when they make out by sufficient Proofs, that the Instruments produced, are Supposititious or Corrupted.

Farther, although the Strength and Firmness of Covenants does not absolutely depend on such Writings or Deeds, in as much as they may rightly be made without them (a), and may as to the Law of Nature still hold good, though these Tokens should by any Accident be lost (b); yet in Courts of Civil Judicature, where they proceed on full and manifest Evidence, the greatest Regard imaginable is had to Credentials of this kind. And commonly if such are not produc'd, the Party who shews another upon a Debt or Promise, loses his Cause; unless he can make it appear, that they were once actually in his Custody, and that he has been depriv'd of them by some Misfortune. And for this reason it will become a careful Man to secure his Business by good and legal Instruments; and not to rely too much on the bare Words, or Faith of those he deals with (c). It is vulgarly known, that if a Creditor shall restore the Instrument of Obligation, or shall cancel, or destroy it with his own free Consent, and with the Privity of the Debtor, it shall be suppos'd that the Debt is forgiven; but not if the Debtor got the Writings out of his hand by Stealth, or any other unlawful Means. And from all this it appears, that Seneca (d) carries his Philosophy a Strain too high, when he calls Bonds and Papers of Contract, by no better a Name than, Inania habendi simulachra, Vain and idle Images of Title and Possession.

C H A P. VII.

Of the Matter of Promises and of Covenants.

WE are in the next place to enquire into the Matter or Subject of Promises, and of Covenants; or to what things only we can bind our selves by our Word or Bargain. In this respect then, it is indispensibly Requisite, that we have both a Natural and a Moral Power of doing what we engage for; or that the Performance be neither above our Strength, nor forbidden us by any Law. For when a thing is placed within my Reach and Ability, and I have likewise a Liberty to dispose of it, there is no Reason why I should not voluntarily oblige my self to confer it on another, so often as I can by this means contribute to the Use and Advantage of Human Life. On the other hand, it would be Vain and Impertinent to contract an Obligation about such Matters, as either exceed our Strength, or are prohibited by a stronger Obligation lying upon us; in as much as, directly and lawfully, it could produce no Effect.

II. It follows evidently from hence, that no Obligation can lie to Impossibilities; (1) a Sentence commonly in the Mouths of all sorts of Persons, but such as cannot fully be understood without a clear and accurate Examination. In order to which it may be, in the first place, convenient to distinguish between those Obligations which we voluntarily bring on our selves by our own Act, and those which are laid on us by the Command and Authority of our Superiours. He that of his own free Motion, binds himself to perform a thing which he knows to be impossible, cannot be reckon'd well in his Wits. For he resolves and engages to do that, which at the same time he foresees he shall never be able to Compass.

But it does not always follow, that he who by Pact or Promise undertakes an Impossibility, shall be Entirely free from all Necessity of Performance, though the thing it self cannot strictly be accomplish'd. Indeed if I have promis'd a Man somewhat, which I had then good Grounds to think would be in my Power, but which is now above my Power, or will be rendred so before the Day of Performance, by an Accident of which at the time of the Bargain I was Invincibly Ignorant; I seem in this Case, neither obliged to make good my Word, nor to repair the Loss, which the other Party suffers by the Disappointment. Especially if the Possibility of the thing, were either expresly mention'd as a necessary Condition, or tacitely pre-supposed on both sides (a). For Instance, I promise to lend a Horse, which at present is at some distance from me; and the Horse dies before he gets to me; as I cannot here be bound to make the Horse forth coming, so neither am I responsible for any Damage the Man sustains, who was to have used him. For he must conceive me to have built my Promise on this Tacite Condition, provided the Horse arrives safe at my Hands; which Condition failing, without my Default, the Force of the Promise sinks and is Ineffective. If both the Promiser, and the other Party know the thing to be Impossible, and know each others Consciousness as to this Point, the Engagement shall pass for no better than a Jest. But if the Promiser only knew the Impossibility, and not the other Party, he shall pay to him what he loses, by being thus imposed on. If the Promiser was careless, and neglected to examine and weigh his own Strength, so as to promise an Impossibility, which upon due Consideration, he might have found to be such; the main Obligation shall be void; because he supposed the thing to be Possible, as a Tacite Condition of the Agreement. Yet upon account of his Neglect and Default, he shall be bound to answer the Damage which befalls the other Party, through the Disappointment; but then it must be observ'd, that the Hope, and Expectation of Advantage from such an Insignificant Promise, ought not to come under the Notion of Damage. The same Rule holds good in Covenants; so that he who through Negligence has bargain'd to perform what is impossible, shall be free upon paying what the other Party suffers; but then he must likewise release the other Party, from any Obligation made on his side; or if the thing be already given or perform'd, he must either restore it, or offer an Equivalent.

III. But farther, when the thing at the time of making the Promise or Pact appear'd Possible, and afterwards becomes Impossible; we must enquire whether this happen'd by meer Chance, or by Default and Deceit. In the former Case the Pact is disannull'd, if nothing has yet been perform'd on either side. If any thing have been already done towards it by one of the Parties, the other shall give it back, or pay to the value of it (1); if neither of these can be done, he is to use his best Endeavours, that the Man be not a Loser by him. For in Contracts, the first Regard is had to the thing expressly mention'd in the Agreement; when this cannot be obtain'd, it is sufficient to give an Equivalent; but whatever happens, all imaginable Care is to be used, that the other Party suffer no Prejudice. But when a Man shall by Trick and Design render himself incapable of performing his Part; he shall not only be bound to do the best he can, but he ought likewise to have some Punishment inflicted on him, as it were in supply to his Defect.

These Principles well applied, might determine most of the Doubts in the Case of Insolvent Debtors. A Man that falls into such a Condition by Misfortune, and without his own Default, is obliged only to use his utmost Endeavour, to give every one their due. And here Equity and Humanity, engage us to make an allowance of Time, so much as shall be necessary for him to look about him, and to seek out all honest ways and means of Payment (b). For to seize immediately on all he possesses, and to send him and his Family a Begging, would be a most unmerciful Barbarity. The Roman Laws were so favourable to certain Persons, in Cases there specified, as to order that they should be condemn'd in no deeper Sum than they were able to make good (c). Yet unless the Creditor shall have forgiven all that exceeds their present Abilities, they shall be bound to pay the Residue, upon the Improvement of their Fortune and Condition. Those who have turned Bankrupt out of Knavery, or some other way by their own fault, may be justly compell'd to undergo some painful Punishment; that their Body may in some measure pay for the Defect of their Purse (d).

In the Case between the Creditor and the Debtor, there is another Point that ought to be consider'd; through what Cause or what Necessity the Man contracted so deep Scores. And he deserves more or less Commiseration and Favour, as the Cause was more or less grievous and unavoidable. For this reason Merchants and other great Traders, though undone by meer Accident and Misfortune, are reckon'd to be in a Condition less capable of Mercy, than others who have been driven by some particular Urgency, to the like Insolvent State. For the former took up so large Sums on Trust, purely for the sake of making farther Gain and Advantage by them. And in as much as they profess the Art of growing Rich, as their peculiar Calling, they are to be blamed for not foreseeing and preventing even Casualties; such as the losing all they are worth at one sudden Stroke; since they ought not to have ventured their whole Effects in a single Bottom (e).

Yet

IV. It is proper for us on this Subject to examine the Notion of Mr. Hobbes (a), which he seems to lay down in too general a Manner, that Covenants do not oblige to the thing it self, but only to the utmost Endeavour. That is, since we are not obliged to Impossibilities, and since nothing is in our power but our utmost Endeavours, what we cannot by its means obtain, is to us impossible, and consequently is excluded from being the matter of Obligation. But he ought indeed to have inserted this Condition, provided we have not by our own Fault, or Fraud, Incapacitated our selves for such a Performance. For if this be our Case, the Obligation is not satisfied by our utmost Endeavour; but when our power of Payment ceaseth, our Punishment must come in to make up the rest. Therefore the Assertion ought to be limited to those Covenants, in which upon account of some Thing or Action at present reach'd out unto us, we promise some future Labour or Assistance. For here, since such Futurities are uncertain to Human Foresight, so that either our strength may by some Accident be impair'd, or some unaccountable turn of Things may render it extremely difficult, if not utterly impossible for us to meet with an Opportunity of Performance; and farther, since our Sagacity may be mistaken either in rating our own Power, or in weighing the Difficulty of the Undertaking; the Contractors must for these Reasons be suppos'd to have been mindful of their own frail Nature, and consequently not to have agreed on any future Action or Work, but with this Condition and Proviso, that their Abilities and Opportunities remain'd the same, and that they had not over-rated their present Strength. In these Cases then, he who has us'd his utmost Endeavour, may be rightly said to have done his Duty; especially when in the very midst of the Performance, some cross Adventure which we could not possibly have prevented falls in, and either quite intercepts, or wrests aside the Fruit of our Labour.

That the Rule will hold good, only in this kind of Covenants, is farther evident from what Mr. Hobbes discourseth immediately before. We very frequently, says he, contract about such things as then indeed seem possible, but which afterwards we find to be impossible (b), yet this does not free us from all Obligation. And the reason is, because he who promises an Uncertainty hereafter, receives a present Good, on the Condition of returning the like. But now the Will of him who offers the present Good, has for its absolute Object, any return of good equal in Value to the thing expressly promis'd by the other Party; but the thing it self is affected, not strictly and absolutely, but under Condition of its Possibility. Yet on the contrary, I would chuse to say, that whosoever exhibits to another any present Good, does absolutely and directly bend his Desire towards that particular future Good, express'd in the Bargain; and this as well in Contracts of giving, as in Contracts of doing (c). But when he cannot obtain what was peculiarly promis'd, he then to keep himself from suffering Loss, desires something of equal Value. And if this too cannot be paid him, nor the thing restor'd which he first gave on his part, the other Man fully satisfies his Obligation, by offering what his Abilities will admit of.

But, in Contracts of Lending, and others of the same Nature, it will not hold that the Debtor is freed from his Obligation, by using his utmost Ability and Endeavour. For when any thing is taken in way of Loan, (especially if it be not in a case of extream Necessity) the Creditor supposes that the Debtor is both willing and able to pay, and the Debtor himself pretends as much; and on this Supposition, the whole Contract is founded. If then at the time prefix'd for Payment, the Debtor with all his Stock and Effects cannot make up the Sum; though here it be at present impossible to squeeze more out of him; yet he shall stand engaged to make good the rest hereafter (d).

In simple Promises, when he engages to do a thing which is not, as to the Event, fully and absolutely in our power; some such Condition as this ought always to be understood, if Fortune favour me, if no cross Accident intervene, or what better becomes the Piety of a Christian, if it please God (e). But positively to swear or vow that we will accomplish such an uncertain Enterprize, is not only most extravagant Rashness, but most wicked Presumption. Such was the Oath of *Labienu*s and his Party, recorded by Cesar, by which they engaged themselves not to return into their Camp without obtaining the Victory (f).

V. There is another knotty Question proposed by Mr. Hobbes (g), which we ought here to discuss, Whether a Man can by Covenant oblige himself to suffer such Evils, as exceed the ordinary Strength, and Constancy of Human Minds; for Instance, whether he can bind himself not to resist another, who shall

Yet it is plain the Ancient Romans had little regard to these different Circumstances. For thus Seneca argues; (Benef. l. 7. c. 16.) Can you imagine our Forefathers were so imprudent, as not to apprehend how unjust it must be to put a Man who had wasted a Loan in Dice or Lewdness, in the same Case with him, who by Fire, Thieves, or some sadder Misfortune, had lost other Men's Money with his own? They allow'd no Excuse, that Men might learn in all Cases, most strictly to keep their Faith. And it were more safe to reject the just Plea of a few, than to admit all to a Privilege of offering their Apologies. In Muscovy, insolvent Debtors are first soundly whip'd, and then compell'd to be Slaves to their Creditors. (a) De Civ. c. 2. f. 14. (b) It must be supposed, that we have not had Opportunity of making Tryal. (c) For the Law of Nature doth not seem to afford Ground for that Distinction which some make, that in Bargains of Giving, a Man is precisely obliged to give, whereas in Bargains of Doing, he is not precisely obliged to do the Work, but may be releas'd by a Commutation.

(d) See Matth. XVIII. 25. &c. (e) See Ja. IV. 15. (f) Cesar. de Bel. Civ. l. 3. c. 8. n. 6. Add Act. XXIII. 21. & Selden. de J. N. & G. l. 4. c. 7. (g) De Civ. c. 2. f. 18.

go about to kill or to wound him. Now whoever closely and carefully considers this Point, will be able to discover on what account Mr. Hobbes thought good to take the Negative Side; Namely, to shew that bare Pacts, are not a sufficient Guard and Caution, to the Security of Mankind; and that 'tis not enough for a Man to engage by Covenant, that he will freely undergo due Punishment, so often as he shall commit an Injury; but for the Preservation of Peace in the World, it is farther necessary that Civil Governments should be establish'd, which may bring Offenders to Justice, though against their Wills. Which Principle we acknowledge to be most just and true, and shall enlarge upon it in its proper place. At present it may be worth our while to examine more nearly the Arguments which he produces. He says then, no Man is by any Covenant which he shall make, obliged not to resist another, when he offers mortal Violence, or Wounds, or any bodily Mischief. For here is implanted in every one the highest degree of Fearfulness, by which he apprehends the threaten'd Evil, as the greatest Imaginable, and therefore by a Natural Necessity, flies and avoids it as much as possible; and is suppos'd incapable of doing otherwise. When he is arriv'd at such a height of Fear, it cannot be expected but that he will consult his own Safety by Flight or by Combat. Since then no Man can be obliged to an Impossibility, those to whom Death, or Wounds, or other corporal Pains are presented, and who have not Constancy enough to bear them, are not bound to venture the Tryal. Upon this Argument, we may remark, that to suffer Death without Reluctancy, is not a thing absolutely beyond Human Strength. And therefore if God has Commanded us to lay down our Lives, rather than commit some particular Action, no doubt but we are strictly bound to yield a ready Obedience. But thus much we are willing to acknowledge, that since such a Degree of Constancy is beyond the Strength of the Generality of Men, no one shall be presumed to have bound himself by his own free Covenant to such a rigorous Task. For Human Laws and Human Contracts, ought all to be made with an Eye and Regard to Human Infirmary.

Yet this Consideration ought not to be drawn so far as to prejudice the Force of Military Discipline; as if a Souldier under imminent Peril of Death might desert his Post, upon Pretence, that a Man cannot be obliged to undergo Death, as being a thing Impossible. For we deny that it is a thing above the Fortitude of Mankind, especially of the military Sex, to sustain a probable Danger of Death, still joyn'd with a Power of resisting to the last. And there scarce ever happens such a Case in War, that some Persons must be throwt away, and offer'd up as Victims to the Enemy, without a Liberty, and an Opportunity of defending themselves by Courage or by Craft. So that it appears from the Necessity of preserving Commonwealths, and from the use and practice of all Nations, that whenever it is Requisite, a Commander may lawfully enjoin a Souldier, to oppose the Enemy in such an assign'd him Station to his last Breath, though 'tis probable he may die upon the Spot; and may as lawfully inflict Capital Punishment on those who shall quit their Post, after such an express Order to the contrary. For he that lifts himself in the Number of Armed Men, does by that Act lay aside all Claim to the Excuse of Natural Fearfulness, and is bound not only to enter the Field, but likewise, not to leave it, without the Order of his Leader. Neither is there any Absurdity in that Martial Punishment of killing a Man, because he declined being killed. For is it not much worse to suffer ignominiously under the hand of the Executioner, than to fall with Honour under the Sword of the Enemy (a)? We must add, that in Case a Person be of so weak and cowardly a Temper, as to shrink at those Dangers which the Common Hardiness of Men is able to sustain; his peculiar Infirmary of Mind shall by no means absolve him from his Obligation.

Mr. Hobbes proceeds to observe, that since we dare trust him, who is bound to us by Covenant, whilst we lead Criminals to Execution in Chains, and under Guards; it should seem that they are not by Covenant sufficiently obliged to Non-resistance. The Remark in most Cases is true (1), yet sometimes Persons really bound by Covenant to us, are not so absolutely trusted but that we think it expedient to provide against their Perfidioufness, by a Security of armed Men (b). He adds, a Covenant of this kind would be useles, a Man indeed may Covenant thus, unless I do this or that upon the appointed day, kill me; that is, you shall have a Right of proceeding to Capital Punishment against me upon my Default; but to Covenant thus, unless I do so or so, I will not resist you when you come to kill me, is a thing both unpractis'd and insignificant. He proves his Point after this manner. 'Such a Covenant must be made, either between a State and a Subject, or between two Subjects of the same State, or between two Persons living in a Condition of Natural Liberty. In the first Case it would be useles, because 'tis enough to secure to a State the Power of punishing Offenders, if each particular Subject engages by Oath or Fealty, that he will not forcibly defend or rescue any Person, who shall be thus led to suffer Justice. In the second Case it would be alike impertinent; because in Civil Governments private Men have not the Right of killing. In the third and last Case, it would be of no more use or force than in the former; because if the Parties covenanted, that one of them should be kill'd upon Non-performance, a preceding Covenant must be suppos'd to have pass'd, importing that he shall not be kill'd before the Day fix'd for Performance. For according to his Hypothesis, in a State of Nature, before any Pa&ts have been introduced, each Man hath a Right of killing each Man else. Therefore upon default of Performance, on the set Day there returns a Right of War, or a Hostile State, in which it is lawful for any Man to attempt what he pleases against another; and consequently the Right of resisting will return at the same time. I would rather chuse to Establish the Truth of the Assertion another way, by saying, that the Force of Covenants if strain'd to the highest, does reach so far, as not only to lay on the Parties an intrinsecal Necessity of performing the Conditions, but likewise to give each of them a Right of Compelling the other to a Compliance, in case he draw back, by proposing and presenting some Evil. And that therefore every Covenant may be resolv'd into this Sense, I engage to do this, or this for you, if I fail, you shall have a power of compelling me by violent Means. Now to add a second Covenant about Non-resistance, would here be useless and absurd. For then this second Covenant must be enforc'd again by a third, including some Penalty, as if I resist you, when you attempt to compel me to Performance, you shall have a power of offering Violence, or Evil to me. Thus it is plain, the second Covenant adds nothing at all to the first; for the first gave a power of reducing the Defailant by Violence; and 'tis as easy to break this as that. What need is there then of backing one Covenant with another, when ten may as well be broken through as one?

The last Argument urg'd by Mr. Hobbes, runs thus, Could there be such a thing as a Covenant for Non-resistance, we should by it be obliged out of two present Evils, to chuse that which appear'd the greater. For certain Death is a greater Evil than Resistance and Combat. But of two Evils it is impossible for us not to chuse the lesser; therefore by such a Covenant we should be tied to an Impossibility, which contradicts the whole Nature of mutual Engagement. Now here it is necessary, that the Rule about chusing the lesser Evil, be accurately stated and explain'd. And this properly speaking, can take place only in two unprofitable or hurtful Evils, consider'd as such. In which Case it looks like a kind of Gain, to suffer only a Part of an inevitable Loss or Damage. But the same Rule must by no means be extended and applied to the Case of two dishonest Evils, or of two Evils, the one dishonest, the other un*profitable.* For of two Evils of Commission, we are to chuse neither. But it sometimes happens, that we cannot fulfil two Affirmative Precepts, the Omission of which separately consider'd, would be sinful, yet upon their meeting together the Omission of one of them is look'd upon as lawful. And in this Case of the two Evils of Omission, the lesser is to be chosen; or rather the interfering with a more noble Precept, shews the Omission of the less noble Precept to be no Evil or Sin. For in all inferior, and subordinate Laws, this Restriction is ever understood, so far as we can comply with them, and not intrench on Engagements of a higher Nature. Thus not to obey God, and not to obey the Civil Magistrate, if taken asunder, are both notoriously Sins; and yet, supposing both the Obligations cannot at once be answer'd, as when the Magistrate commands any thing contrary to the Divine Law, in this Case, Disobedience to our Earthly Governours ceases to be Evil; because that Law which binds us to conform to the Will of human Sovereigns, is always understood with this Proviso and Condition, that they enjoin nothing repugnant to the Laws of God.

We are in many Cases likewise permitted, rather to chuse the bare Execution of another Man's Sin, or a Concurrence by way of Instrument, than some Evil, very prejudicial, or very grievous to be born, with which we are threatned upon Refusal. Which Point we have elsewhere (†) more largely discuss'd.

Neither is it allowable, as was just now hinted, to make any such Comparison between an Evil, Troublesome, or Damageable, and a Sin, so as to chuse the latter rather than the former; as for Instance, If a Man should rather act contrary to his express Duty, than slip the Opportunity of some Advantage, or sustain some real Loss; how positive soever his corrupt Judgment may be in concluding the Sin to be the Lesser Evil. For, were this admitted, the Force and Efficacy of Obligations would depend upon every Man's Opinion; and consequently would vanish into nothing, if I were not bound to an Action, when the Omission of it upon account of some external Regard, appear'd to me more desirable than its Performance. Thus it would be but a poor Excuse for a Thief to alledge for himself, that he thought it a less Evil to lay Hands on the Goods of his Neighbours, than to get his Livelihood by his own Pains and Labour. Indeed Obligations are so far from losing their Force in these Cases, that they never exert it more vigorously; for 'tis the very Nature of such Engagements to produce in Men an intrinsecal Necessity of such Performances, as they would otherwise be averse to, upon outward Considerations and Respects.

VI. To make a Promise or Pa&t truly Obligatory, it is farther Requisite, that we have a Moral Power of performing the Thing agreed upon. And if the Thing be unlawful, and we consequently want this Power, we cannot tie our selves by any such Engagement (1). For every Promise receives its Force from the Ability of the Promiser, and never reacheth farther; or a Man cannot bind himself with any Effect to a Business which he wants Ability to compass. But now the Law by forbidding any Action, takes from us the Moral Power or Ability of setting about it, and of entering on any Obligation to perform it. For would it not be most Absurd and Contradictory, that an Obligation which derives its Vertue from the Law, should put us under a Necessity of doing somewhat which the Law absolutely prohibits? And when we are once plac'd in Subjection to Laws, the bare Act of our own Will is not sufficient to repeal or to evade them. Therefore he who Promiseth a thing unlawful, sins, but he sins doubly, who performs it (a). Whence this farther Consequence may be drawn, that those Promises are not to be kept (2), which would prove hurtful to the Person, to whom they are made; it being a general Command of the Law of Nature, that we do no Harm to another, knowingly and wilfully, though he out of Folly should desire it.

Moreover, since a good and valid Obligation cannot be contracted about Unlawful Matters, it follows that Acts undertaken against legal Constitutions, are by Vertue of the same Law Null and Void, or the Magistrate is supposed to have already declar'd them so (b). Yet in many Cases, it is a constant Practice in Common-wealths, to impose a Fine on the Performer of some unlawful Act, and not to disannul the Act, because there was perhaps, more Indecency in the Momentary Performance, than in the Effects consequent upon it; and because frequently the Inconveniencies attending a Disannulment would be greater than the Act it self, if permitted to stand Valid, would produce (c).

VII. To proceed distinctly in a closer Examination of this Point, it is first mov'd as a Question, whether an Obligation for the Performance of an Act in it self Vicious, be Good and Valid, whilst things stand as at first, and no Step is made towards the Execution. And here it is certain, that such a vicious Agreement does produce an Obligation on neither side, and that Parties ought in Honesty to recede from their Bargain (d). Thus for Instance, if a Man hire an Assasine to commit a Murder, and the Assasine upon better Thoughts resolves against the Villany, the Hirer cannot compel him to fulfil his Covenant. And on the other hand, if the Hirer repenting of his wicked Design, orders the Assasine not to proceed, the Assasine shall not force him to continue in his Resolution for fear of losing the promis'd Wages. Neither shall he in this Case demand the Money of the Hirer, as on whose account purely he now desisted, and was hindred from earning it. Nay, if after he has been thus countermanded he go on, and accomplish the Mischief, the Hirer shall not be Guilty of the whole Fact, but shall be condemn'd, only in so much as shall seem a proportionable Penalty, for conceiving a Murder in his Imagination, of which he repented before it was put in Execution.

Grotius (e) observes, that a Promise of this kind is therefore Vicious and Void, because it is made to excite a Man to do a wicked Act (f).

VIII. It is a second point of Enquiry, whether in Case such a Villany having been once committed, according to the Bargain, the other Party be obliged to pay the Price agreed upon. Which Grotius affirms; because says he, the Price or Reward before the Fact was accomplish'd had indeed a Blemish and Imperfection, as being the Incentive to Wickedness, which blemish ceaseth, when the Wickedness is once past, and the Crime perform'd. But we cannot but declare our selves of a contrary Opinion; for a Bargain of this kind is so far from ceasing to be Vicious, when the Deed is over, that it seems then to arrive at its highest pitch of Baseness, as having gain'd its end. Unless it be a smaller degree of Sin to have stolen, than to think of stealing, to receive the Wages of Villany, than to hope for and expect them, to pay the Reward than to promise it. Indeed if the Promise be in it self Vicious, because it is the Incentive to Wickedness, the fulfilling of the Promise will certainly be Vicious, as being the Recompense of Wickedness, and an Encouragement and invitation to new Mischiefs. And on this account some secret Stain or Blemish is commonly thought to stick on such Rewards, even after they have pass'd to a third Possessor by a just Title; because they were at first the Wages of Iniquity. Thus the Jews were forbidden to bring the Price of Whoredom, as an Offering, into the House of God (g). Thus when Judas (3) brought back the Wages of his Treason, the chief Priests thought it not lawful to put it into the Treasury. And thus it is a known Proverb, that a Family seldom thrives on an ill-gotten Estate. Therefore we can by no means assent to what Grotius delivers, that till the time of performing the Villany, the Force and Efficacy of a Vicious Promise, remains in suspence; just as doth the Efficacy of Conditional Promises till the Condition be made good, and of Promises about things at present Impossible, till the things do really fall under our Power, as we have probable Hopes they will, at our first making the Bargain: But that when the Fact is once committed, the Obligation then breaks out, and exerts its Force, which was not at first entirely wanting, (in as much as the thing was done by mutual Consent,) but was only hindered from displaying it self by that Vice or Defect, with which it was attended; namely, its contributing to the Commission of a Sin. But should we admit this Doctrine, the Edict of Natural Law forbidding us to enter into Covenant about unlawful Matters, would be void, if when the wicked Terms of the Covenant on one side were put in Execution, the other Party must by the Law of Nature be bound to stand to his Agreement. What an insignificant Order would it be to prohibit Theft, if the Act of stealing being once over, the Goods were to remain in the Possession of the Thief, without Blame or Danger? And that Remark is very false, 'That there was not Originally 'wanting to the Vicious Covenant, an internal 'force of obliging; but that it was only kept 'in Suspence upon account of the attending 'Wickedness, till such time as it ceas'd to be 'an Incentive to Sin. For to give a Pact an inward Obligatory Force, it is not enough that it be made with the Consent of both Parties, but the Subject of it ought to be such a thing as Men have a Right and Power of disposing of at their Pleasure. Otherwise if mutual Consent were sufficient to produce an Obligation, it would be easy to overthrow all Laws, should Men but enter into a Covenant to break them; and thus the Law of Nature would manifestly contribute to its own Destruction. It is our Judgment then, that with regard to the Law of Nature, neither the Actor of a Villany, can by any proper Right demand the Wages promis'd him, nor is the Person who hired him bound to pay the Reward by any inward Tie affecting the Conscience. And that therefore the Court of Natural Justice, does not think it self concern'd to enquire, whether or no a Man has committed a Wickedness, gratis, or to trouble it self in giving him relief. Indeed, if the Cut-throat here, or any other Man retain'd for the Execution of some unjust Violence, shall upon the other Parties refusing to pay him his Hire, do him some Mischief in Revenge, no body will pity the Sufferer, nor think that he has been treated injuriously, but only that he has been dealt with in his own way. This then we must observe, that although Covenants in themselves Vicious, are not Obligatory by any Intrinical Force or Vertue, nor fit to produce an Action in Courts of Justice, yet they have some kind of Effect upon a Man, who having at first freely consented to them, refuses afterwards to make them good. For they hinder him from having any Right to complain of hard Usage, in case the other Person violently bring him to a Compliance, or inflict some Evil on him for his Refusal. It is true the Law of Nature forbids, that a Man should have forfeited his Claim, by another's dealing injuriously, or be compell'd to pay what he does not justly owe, or should be punish'd for denying so unreasonable a Demand. But he who agrees to a vicious Covenant, does by that very Act quit all claim to the Favour of this Law, in as much as he endeavours, so far as he is able to give another an unjust Power over him. And those Evils are adjudg'd to fall very deservedly on Persons, to which they give Occasion by their own Fault. For Instance, the Law of Nature forbids, that a Virgin should be rob'd of that Title and Character against her Will; yet if she once consents to her own Dishonour, she has suffer'd indeed an irreparable Loss, but she cannot complain of any Injury that has been done her (a). And thus too in Commonwealths, where Duels are prohibited by Law, a Man who has receiv'd a Challenge, is not bound to come into the Field, though he has given his word to appear. Yet if he freely meets his Antagonist, and happens to be wounded in the Incounter, he cannot say that he has suffer'd Wrong, or demand the Charges of his Cure.

Grotius in favour of his Opinion, urges the Example of the Patriarch Judah in the Scripture (b), who appear'd very earnest and solicitous to send Thamar the Price of her playing the Harlot. To this Mr. Selden (c) answers, 'That in the Judgment of those times it pass'd 'for lawful, for a Woman free from Marriage, 'and other Restraints, to bestow her self upon 'a Man, without any Condition of living together; and this either Gratis, or for a Reward. And that therefore this Agreement 'was able to produce a Good and Valid Obligation, being made about a Matter, which if not 'Naturally, yet was civilly lawful, or according to Opinion of States and People in those 'Days. We may say farther, that most Men think they ought in point of Generosity to pay something for the purchase of their Pleasures. And besides, Judah might not express so much Care and Concern, least the Harlot should lose her Wages, but least he himself should lose his Staff and Ring, the Pledges he had left in her Hands. Another Argument on Grotius's side, may be alledged in that Passage of the Roman Laws (d), What is given to a Strumpet cannot be recover'd; yet not because both Parties are in a fault; for indeed the whole Offence, as to this Point is on the side of the Giver. 'Tis vicious in the Strumpet, to practice such a Profession, but 'tis not vicious in her to receive the Fees of her Profession. The meaning of which Determination is no more than this; though to make an open Trade of Lewdness, and to own as much before the Adiles, did not fall under the Penalty of the Laws in the Roman State, yet all Good and Vertuous Men, thought it most Base and Scandalous to engage in such a way of Life. However, when Persons had once fix'd themselves in so vile a Calling, they contracted no new Vileness, by making the usual Gain and Advantage of it. Or to speak more concisely, the Business was thus; the Romans granting Toleration to Courtesans, the Bargains and Contracts made on the Score of that Profession, were in their Law adjudg'd to hold good and valid (a).

This still remains true, that a Man cannot fairly pretend to be displeas'd with a piece of Wickedness, which has been undertaken with his Consent, and for his Service (b). Though it be a very usual, and a very good Custom of Princes, to take the benefit (in some Cases) of Men's Treasons and Villanies, and to punish the Traytors and the Villains, that the Infection may not spread by Encouragement. Of this Proceeding, we have a very remarkable Instance, recorded by Paulus Orosius in his History (c), Sulpitius having been voted in Senate a Publick Enemy, was brought into their Hands by the Treachery of his own Slave; the Consuls, with a Wise Distinction, order'd the Fellow to be presented with his Freedom, as a Reward for his Service to the State, and to be cast head-long down the Tarpeian Rock, as a Punishment for Betraying his Master (d).

IX. The third Question moved on this Head is, whether a Reward given for Villainous Service, may be redemanded or recover'd. And here the Law of Nature affords no Pretence for such a Recovery, provided the Receiver has not dealt deceitfully with the other Party. In as much as the Giver by delivering up the thing promis'd, intended no doubt to transfer the Propriety of it; and this too in way of Debt, in Consideration of a Service perform'd for him, which he himself valued at this rate. Now we know that when any thing is given, even gratis, all Right of recovery ceaseth. Nor will it alter the Case to urge, that the thing was here obtain'd on an unjust Title, and by Ways and Means expressly forbidden by the Laws. For this Allegation cannot with any colour be made by the Person who gave the Reward; in as much as he voluntarily bargain'd for the wicked Service, and when that was perform'd for him, thought himself to receive somewhat equal in value to the Price agreed upon; nor can he complain of a Villany, of which he himself was the Principal Author. Indeed the Illegality of the Means by which the Reward was acquired, if consider'd in regard to the Publick Authority, shall produce this Effect, that it shall be in the Magistrates Power, to take the thing from the Receiver by way of Punishment, and (if he sees fit) to restore it to the first Owner. For Instance, if a cunning Strumpet shall chouse an unwary young Man out of a considerable Summ of Money, she may fairly be obliged to refund; since even in the most vicious Bargains, some Shadow of Justice is kept up, and the Laws of Contracts in some sort observ'd.

But farther, since it is accounted most base and vile in a Man, to demand a Reward, for doing a thing which it is his Duty to perform gratis, it is made another Question, whether what he have promis'd or given for a thing before justly due to us, may be with-held or recover'd. Some answer absolutely (1), that if we respect the Law of Nature, Promises of this kind are Good and Valid, since those likewise are so, which we make without any particular Reason or Prospect. Yet that at the same time whatsoever Damage is sustain'd by violent Extortion, ought to be fully repair'd. Perhaps the Business may be more clearly settled, if we distinguish whether the thing which we say was before due to us, was due upon an Imperfect, or upon a perfect Obligation. If the former, our Promise of a Reward for it shall hold good, and we cannot sue for Recovery. Thus for Instance, although the Law of Humanity obliges me to set a Traveller in his Way, and though such a piece of Service may perhaps cost me no Trouble, yet if I bargain to receive some Consideration on that account, I may fairly demand the Payment, and the other Person cannot recover what he thus parts with; unless I forced him to make a large and unreasonable Promise, by filling his head with false Frights, or any other Stragem of Knavery. Those Promises are likewise Valid, which we make to incite another to the more ready, and the more exact Performance of his Duty. For these pass for matters of free Bounty and Gratuity. But if the thing was before owing to us in a perfect manner (a), and yet the Person who is to perform it, refuses Compliance, unless upon our Promise of a new Reward, we take this Case to be the same, as in Engagements made through Fear or Guile; and therefore to require the same way of Proceeding. If then in a State of Natural Liberty, a Man refuse to pay me my due, it is plain he does it upon Presumption of his own Strength, and because he believes it is not in my power to compel him. And consequently, if he deny to fulfil a Covenant fairly made, without a new Supplemental Condition, he immediately gives me just Cause of using Hostility to reduce him. And if my present Affairs will not permit me to engage in a Method of War, but incline me to agree, though on hard Terms, I may afterwards require Satisfaction for the Damage I now suffer; unless I end the matter by an act of voluntary Forgiveness. Yet it quite alters the Case, if his denial did not proceed from meer Unfaithfulness and Wickedness, but from his being able to shew that he was exceedingly injured in the former Covenant, to which he now demurs. As for the Members of Commonwealths, if they refuse to answer an old Bargain without some additional Reward, they will be compell'd to be honest by a Course of Publick Justice.

To this we may add the Distinction of the Roman Lawyers (b) in Cases of Vicious Service, whether the Fault or Wickedness was on the part of the Receiver only, or of the Giver only, or of both. In the first Instance, they allow an Action of Recovery; but not in the other two.

X. We are likewise Morally unable or incapable to perform any thing, or to oblige ourselves to such Performance, about the Goods or Actions of other Men; which are not subject to our Pleasure and Disposal. And being thus independent from us, we cannot by any Act of ours; whether of Promise or of Bargain, give another a Right over them, by Virtue of which he should claim them as his Due. Hence 'tis a Rule with the Civilians (c), 'That in Case one Man promise that another shall give or shall do such or such a thing,

'neither of them shall stand obliged (1). Which is very just and true, if we stick to the bare Words of such a Promise. But because it seems inconvenient, that an Act seriously undertaken should produce no Effect, we are apt commonly to interpret Promises of that kind in this Sense, that the Person promising, will take care to bring the other Party to Performance; in whose Name he now seems to make the Engagement. But if I make a Promise to a Man in so express and direct Terms as these, that I will endeavour to prevail on a third Person, to do for him so or so; I am then obliged to labour by all means morally possible, to move that Person to a Compliance. We say by all means morally possible, that is, so far as the other Man can honestly desire me, and so far as is consistent with the Nature and Method of Civil Life. And if in this Case, I omit nothing on my part (2), and yet the third Person refuse to grant the Request, I am not bound to make good the Default; unless this was an express part of my Promise, or was implied in the Nature of the Business (d). But if I promise in this manner, unless a third Person do so or so, I will forfeit thus much, it is manifest that if the third Person fail, my Engagement will stand good against me. Somewhat like this we meet with in the Roman Constitutions, which decree that in Case a Person disposes in way of Legacy, a thing which belong'd to another Man, and which he knew so to belong, the Heir shall be obliged to redeem, and to restore it, or if it cannot be redeem'd, to give the value of it to the Owner (3). Yet certain it is, that a Promise of what kind soever, cannot lay an Obligation on the third Person, nor give the other Man a Right of requiring any thing immediately from him.

But if the third Person be one placed under my Governance and Command, his Things or Actions are not accounted anothers, but my own; so far as my Authority over him extends. And thus far I can by Promise or other Engagements effectually dispose of them; so as not only to bind my self to see the Agreement made good, but to cause that the Person in whose behalf I transact, shall as soon as he is acquainted with my Pleasure, be obliged by vertue of my Power over him, to perform the Condition. Though the common and regular way of proceeding in these Cases, isto apply to the principal Promiser, and to require him to force the Person under his Care and Direction to a Compliance; and upon the Obstinacy and Default of the govern'd Party, the Action at Law shall lie against his Governour, unless he has resign'd his Charge, and left him wholly to his own Disposal.

(b) Add. l. 12. Tit. 5. D. de Condiç. ob turp. Caus. (a) Liban. Orat. 5. I receive only those Advantages which the Law allows me; and where is the Favour in this Case. He that hath been obliged with a Kindness, ought to make Requit to his Benefactor. But we can owe no such return to a Judge, who doth not act out of Favour to us, but as the Necessity of the Law directs him. (c) *Add. f. 3. l. 3. tit. 20. Instit. de inutil. (3) See Instit. B. II. tit. 20. de Legatis. f. 4. vid. D. l. 32. Leg. 30. f. 6.

XI. Lastly, I am Morally incapacitated to make a Promise with any effect, to a third Person, about such Things or Actions of mine, to which another has already acquired a Right; unless perhaps this other Party be content to wave his Claim. For he who by a former Engagement has made over his Right, can have no power left to dispose of it anew. And all Pacts and Promises might be cancell'd and eluded with very little trouble, were we allow'd to enter into new ones, either directly contrary to the former, or any way inconsistent with them, as to the Performance. In this case therefore, the latter Contract is dissolv'd and rendred ineffectual by the former, or as we should rather speak, the former shews that the latter can be of no force or use. Hence for instance, are all those Covenants void, which Subjects make either among themselves or with others, in prejudice of the Duty and Allegiance they owe to their lawful Sovereigns (a).

It is a common Rule, that he who has the Precedency in Time, has the Advantage in Right.

(a) Gramond. Hist. Gall. l. 5. He that is born under a Prince, doth originally engage his Faith and Allegiance to him; and whosoever attempts to draw them away, is a most unjust Invader of another's Rights; nor will any such Covenant hold good, being made contrary to the Laws and Constitution of the Kingdom. He that gives his Promise against his Prince, is by the very Act releas'd from the Obligation. (1) Vid. Instit. l. 3. tit. 20. de inutil. Stipulat. f. 6. (2) Vid. D. l. 47. tit. 20. Stellionatus.

Not that Time consider'd barely in it self can make any such difference; but because the whole power over a thing being formerly secur'd to one Person, bars all others from obtaining a Title to it afterwards. And hence too it comes to pass, that a Servant cannot dispose of his Labour (1), otherwise than his Master pleases, to whom by Vertue of a former Contract it entirely belongs. By the Roman Laws, a Slave could not enter into any Obligation, even with his own Master, besides the general Obligation implied in that State and Condition of Servitude; and the Reason of this was, because his Master had before a full Right over all that he possess'd, and all that he could do to any advantageous Purpose.

If a Man, contrary to these Duties, shall have deceived and prejudic'd another by promising a thing, which either was not his own, or was before otherwise bestow'd and secur'd; he shall be oblig'd to make good the Damage; and in many Cases, shall be liable farther to suffer the Penalty of Cousenage (2).

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Conditions of Promises.

Concerning Engagements by Promise, this is farther to be observ'd, that some are made purely, or simply, and some under Condition (1); or that sometimes we oblige our selves absolutely to such or such a Performance, and sometimes we suspend our Obligation, till certain Clauses or Proviso's are made good.

II. A Condition is an Appendage (2) added to such Acts, as are productive of Rights and Obligations, by Vertue of which their whole Force and Efficacy is made to depend on some particular Event, proceeding either from Fortune, or from Human Pleasure (3). So that to the true Nature of a Condition, these two things are requisite, first that it have the Power of deferring and suspending the force of the Obligation, and secondly that the Event express'd in it do not as yet appear; at least that it be at present uncertain, as to our Understanding.

III. Hence we may conclude, that those additional Clauses are not properly Conditions, (tho' they seem to be such in a Grammatical sense) which refer to the time present or past.

For Futurities only are dark and obscure to Mortal Apprehensions, but as for things which are now before us, or have already gone over our Heads, we have usually a clear Knowledge of them; and therefore they can include no power capable of suspending our Assent. And therefore it is given as a Rule in the Institutions (a), that Conditions which regard the time present, or the time past, as suppose I should say, I will give such or such a thing, if Titius has been Consul, or if Mævius be still alive; do either immediately cancel and annul the Obligation, or else do not put it off at all, nor hinder it from being pure and absolute. For if the things annex'd for Conditions, are not as they are suppos'd to be, the Engagement is to no purpose; but if they are so, the Promise is Valid as soon as it is made, and begins absolutely to oblige. Yet here it must be observ'd, that a Condition regarding the time present or past, may be added to an Obligation, in case both or either of the Parties transacting, be uncertain of the thing. And Promises of this kind seem to imply a convenient space of Delay. In as much as nothing can be demanded by Vertue of them, until it shall be made clearly apparent to the Promiser, that the matter inserted as a Condition, has really happen'd; and the Proof of this must necessarily take up some time. For Instance, a Man unskill'd in History, may be drawn in to promise Another Person Ten Pounds, if Cæsar ever pass'd the Rhine. Now here before the Sum can be claim'd, it must be made evident from the Authority of Creditable Historians, that such an Adventure was actually perform'd. Again, if I promise in this manner, 'I will give so much Money, in case Mævius who is travelling abroad be still alive; the other Person can then only require the Money, when I have receiv'd certain Assurance of Mævius's Life. But if we take a closer View of these Matters, we shall find that the above-mention'd Promises, and the rest of the same Nature, ought to be interpreted in this Sense, I will give you so much if you prove to me that Cæsar pass'd the Rhine, or that Mævius the Traveller is now living; and thus they become truly Conditional; but then the Condition is not the Truth, and Certainty of the present, or past Act consider'd in themselves, but the future Proof of it to the promising Party. It is certain therefore, that if the Truth of the Matter inserted, was known on both sides, and the Persons were in earnest, the Promise is not Conditional but Absolute. Again, if both knew the matter to be false, the Promise shall pass for a Jest, and consequently produce no Obligation. If a future thing be added which they knew must infallibly come to pass, or suppose, if the Sun rise to Morrow, 'tis generally agreed that such a Clause ought not to be reckon'd a Condition; in as much as the future Event being already known to be most Certain and Necessary, does not delay the Obligation, nor hinder it from taking place this very Instant. Yet because we ought not easily to presume that the Clause is added for no Reason, it is worth while to consider, whether in such a Promise, the Particle if be not put for the other Particle when; so that the Engagement shall not be Conditional, but only made for a Day hence; as suppose thus, I will give such or such a thing to Morrow when the Sun riseth.

(1) The Roman Lawyers add to this Division, the Determination of the Time and Place of their Performance. Vid. Instit. B. 3. tit. 16. f. 2. & 5. (2) See the Eighth Chapter of this Book, § 2. (3) See Mr. Barbeyrac's Second Note upon this Section. (a) B. 3. tit. 16. f. 6. de Verb. Oblig.

And thus we find that every Condition properly so call'd, includes somewhat which is at present uncertain, at least to one of the Parties, between whom the Business is transacted; and the Obligation remains in Suspence, till the thing shall hereafter come to pass, or shall be demonstrat'd by good Evidence, to have already happen'd. When the Condition appears true, the Obligation begins to have a pure and absolute Force; if the Condition fail, the Obligation expires with it.

IV. Conditions are commonly divided into Possible and Impossible. The former are such as make an Obligation depend on some Event, which may Naturally or Morally happen. And are again subdivided into Casual, Arbitrary, and Mixt (a). A Casual Condition is such as depends, either on the pleasure of a third Person, not obnoxious to our Power and Authority, or else on meer Chance and Fortune in respect of us; as suppose in such a Promise as this, I will give you ten Pounds if Caius marries Titia; or if it don't rain within these three Days, &c. an Arbitrary Condition is such as depends as to its being or not being on the Will and Power of him, to whom a Promise is made under that Limitation (b). But should a Condition be annexed, depending on the Pleasure of the Promiser, the Engagement would be insignificant (c); as if one should say, I will give you ten Pounds if I think fit. For the Sense of such a speech amounts to no more than this: I make you an absolute Promise that at present, and hereafter too, it shall be at my Choice, to promise absolutely or not. And therefore the other Party can hence require no Right, unless the Offer be afterwards improved to a full and perfect Engagement; since the Condition here mention'd may be perpetually sloop, or eluded by the Promiser. So that We may reasonably say, that what is perfectly in our Power, ought not to be confounded with, or thrown amongst, matters of Chance and Accident. If the Condition be indeed in the power of the Promiser, and yet such as he is not able or is not willing always to elude, it must be enforced by supposing a particular time, beyond which it cannot be deferr'd; as if I say, I will give you such a Summ of Money if I Marry, that is, when I Marry.

From what has been hitherto offer'd, we may be able to explain more accurately, the Assertions of Grotius (d) upon the same Head. He says, That if the thing promised, be not at present in the power of the Promiser, but may be hereafter, then the Strength and Efficacy of the Promise lies in suspence; for it must then be supposed to have been made conditionally, that is, in case the Promiser should have it in his Power. Now this Rule we allow to hold good, provided that the other party knew the thing not to be at present in the power of the Promiser. For otherwise it looks like Knavery, when a Man expects an absolute Promise, which shall begin to bind immediately, to put him off with a Conditional one, which cannot take place till hereafter. He adds, *if the Condition whereby the thing promised, may be brought into our power, be it self in our power, (*) we are obliged to do whatever is Morally fit and just, for the Performance of it*. That is, if I promise you any thing, which at present it is impossible to me, but may by my Pains and Care be hereafter rendred possible, I am bound to use all my endeavours, that I may become able to discharge my Engagement. stance, a young Student in the Law, promises a Man to plead all his Causes in the Court, if he arrive at any good skill in his Profession. Here according to Grotius's Rule, the Student is under an Obligation to ply his Business with his utmost Strength and Diligence, that he may make himself fit for the Bar. But this will not hold, unless the Person Promising, has expressly declared or given fair Presumption, that he will set himself in earnest to the acquiring strength for the Performance. Otherwise the Condition may be delay'd in infinitum. We may observe too, that Grotius here useth the Term, Conditio Potestativa, quite contrary to that Sense, in which we have above defined it; he makes it to be in the power of the Promiser, we in the power of him to whom the Promise is directed.

Lastly, a Mixt Condition is that, the fulfilling of which depends partly on the Power of him, who receives the Promise, and partly on Chance; as thus for instance, I will give you a Sum of Money, if you marry such a Gentlewoman. Now, this is not purely at your Pleasure; for the Gentlewoman may refuse your Suit, or may die before the Match is finish'd.

We have only this to add, that a Condition is then look'd upon as perform'd, when the other Party concern'd, does himself hinder it from being perform'd (a).

V. Impossible Conditions, are either Naturally or Morally so; that is, some matters by the Nature of things cannot be done, others by the Laws ought not to be done. Such Conditions annex'd, especially if both Parties knew them to be such, do according to the plain and simple Construction of the words, render the Promise Negative, and therefore Null (b). In Business transacted between those who live in a State of Natural Liberty, a Condition naturally impossible, does plainly shew that the whole thing is void. Only with this difference, that to deny some Requests, in such a round about way, by making the Answer run Affirmatively, but clogg'd with an impossible Condition, is usually reckon'd an Affront; when a plain Denial might not have been taken ill (c). And as to this Point, if the Condition be Morally impossible, the Case is the same, as if it were Naturally so. Should the other Party accept of this vile Condition, and actually fulfil it, how far he may then claim the Performance of the Promise, is easily to be gather'd from the preceding Chapter, §. 8. (1).

In Commonwealths, Provision may be made by Civil Ordinances, that in a Promise utter'd under a Condition Naturally impossible, especially if the Party to whom it is directed, knows not that it is Impossible, the Condition shall be Null, and the Man rescued from the Cheat and Delusion. As for those Pacts and Promises, to which vicious Conditions are annex'd, the Laws of all Countries most wisely declare them void; lest the Contracts of private Men should tend to the Subversion of the Publick Establishment. And thus the Roman Laws, disannul'd all Impossible, Vile, or Jest-ing, Conditions inserted in Wills; because it was thought most absurdly unreasonable, that Men in a Business so very serious and grave, should be put upon with trifling and impertinent Clauses (d).

VI. If in Promises, mention be made of a certain place, without mention of a certain time, it is taken for granted, that so much time shall be allow'd for performing the Promise, as will serve to bring a Man conveniently into the place of Action (e).

VII. But in case a limited Time be expressly added, this will cause that the Obligation shall not exert its Effect till such a Space be expir'd, or that no Demand shall be made before the appointed Day (2).

VIII. It may be convenient in the last place to examine, in what Points these Conditional Promises differ from Pacts, and in what Points they may be resembled to them. In this then both those kinds of Engagements seem to agree, that as the former do not bind, unless the Condition be made good, so the latter, when

(a) Vid. l. 50. D. de Contrab. empt. (b) Vid. l. 1. f. 11. l. 31. & l. 44. tit. 7. D. de oblig. & act. (c) When Miltiades, in Corn. Nep. c. 1. & 2. summon'd the Lemnians, to yield up their Island to the Athenian Power, they answer'd in a scoffing manner, that they'd then surrender, when the North-wind, which was directly contrary to Athens, brought him from home to Lemnos. The General took no more notice, but sailing by them, possess'd himself of Chersonesus, and there fix'd his Seat and Command; and soon after return'd to Lemnos, whither now the North-wind directly carried him, and claim'd their Promise; his Home, as he said, not being now Athens but Chersonesus. The Inhabitants not daring to make Resistance, fairly quitted the Island; but it was non dicto sed secunda fortuna adversariorum capta; not won by the force of their Word and Engagement, nor by the good Fortune of their Enemy. Such was the Promise of Lesdeguier, made to Maphæo Barberini, about professing the Romish Religion; which we find Gramond. Hist. Gal. l. 16. p. 708. (1) See Mr. Barbeyrac's 4th Note upon this Section.

(d) Thus Eumolpus's Will runs in Petronius, Let all those to whom I have given Legacies; besides my Children, receive them upon these Terms and Conditions; That they cut my Body in Pieces, and eat it amongst them before the People. Of the same kind is Tiresias's merry Story in Horace, l. 2. f. 5, 84, &c.

Me Sene, quod dicam, factum est. Anus impræba Thebis, Ex Testamento sic est elata: Cadaver Unctum oleo largo nudis humeris tulit Hæres;

Scilicet elabi si posset mortua: Credo Quod nimium insisterat viventi. —

Which place the *Scholias*t thus interprets, The old Gentlewoman order'd by Will, that her officious Heir should carry her Body naked, well oil'd upon his Shoulders to the Grave, with this pleasant Thought; That she might at least slip from him now she was dead, tho' he had stuck so close to her during her Life; that she could never before escape his Importunity. See more on this Point in the Civilians, in B. 7. tit. 8. D. de usu & habit.

one Party forbears to perform the Articles, do by no means oblige the other (1). And hence it is a common Remark, that the particular Heads of a Contract are in the manner of so many Conditions. Some indeed make one Exception to our Rule about Pacts; that in case any Article should be added, not for use, but perhaps out of Gallantry or Complement, the Non-performance of such a matter shall not release the other Party from his Obligation. But as little Indulgence as possible, should be granted to this Exception; as well left Men should abuse it by applying it to the Principal Articles, as because it is not to be presum'd, that Persons would clog a serious Covenant with Clauses impertinent and unnecessary (a).

(1) See hereafter in B. 5. C. 11. S. 9. of Marriage between Charles the First, when Prince of Wales, and Henrietta of Bourbon, that they were added by the most Christian King in Complement to the Court of Rome; neither Party imagining, that they were intended to be kept.

Promises under a Potestative or Arbitrary Condition, do in this agree with Pacts, that in both a Man must perform somewhat on his side, before he claim the Promise or Bargain of the other Party. But in this they differ; that in the former, the Person promising does not think it much his Interest, whether the thing be perform'd or no; at least he does not intend to oblige the other Party to a Compliance, but leaves him to use his own Pleasure. But in Pacts, as the Reason why I have undertaken any Performance, is the prospect of somewhat to be done for me by the other Person; so if he fail in his Part, I am not only releas'd at present from mine, but I may oblige him by Force to stand to the Agreement.

(a) Gramond. Hist. Gal. l. 16. observes of the secret Articles

C H A P. IX.

Of the Ministers, or Agents, concern'd in contracting Obligations for other Men.

IT is very usual for us to confirm and ratify Pacts and Promises, not immediately by our selves, but by some Agent or Proxy. What Rules are to be observ'd in such Proceedings, it is now our Business to explain. This then is certain, that a Man is oblig'd, not only when he makes known his Consent to the Person, towards whom the Obligation is directed, immediately from his own Mouth, but also when he signifies the same to another Man, whom he has empower'd to transact on his Behalf. The Agent in such an Affair is to be look'd on as a kind of Instrumental Cause; in as much as he not only does all by another's Authority, but likewise acquires no proper Right, brings no Obligation on himself, referring to the Person with whom he is appointed to treat; but obtains a Right only for the Person who has employ'd him, and to him indeed, he stands under an Obligation to manage his Concerns with Honesty and Faithfulness. For those Actions of another do produce an Obligation or a Right in us, and are consequently to be esteem'd ours, for the performing of which we have invested the other Person with full Power, and have openly profess'd that we will acknowledge them for our own. But before a third Man can treat to any effect or purpose, with such a Person, 'tis Necessary he be well assured, that we have chosen and constituted him the Interpreter of our Will, and that we will account whatever he acts, as perform'd by our selves (a).

II. Now we are wont to depute another to Covenant in our Name, either by a general Commission, empowering him to do whatever he thinks most convenient for our Affairs; or by an express and limited Form, prescribing him both the Subject and the Manner of his proceeding. In the former case, I stand oblig'd by whatsoever he has concluded about the Business in hand, Honestly, or Bonâ fide. It is necessary to add this Restriction; for he cannot bind me by what he does treacherously and with a knavish Design of circumventing and abusing me. In as much as when I confer'd such Authority upon him, I must be thought to have suppos'd his Integrity, as an essential Condition. Nay, the acting bonâ fide, or uprightly and faithfully implies this farther, that what the Substitute performs, shall not derogate from the Honour and Advantage of his Principal; at least so far as the present Posture of things will bear. For to be ignorant of these Points, is almost as gross a Fault, as open Dishonesty. The same must be said of those blank Papers with our Names subscribed at the bottom, which we often deliver to our Agents to be fill'd up and turn'd into Instruments of Obligation. These shall not bind us at all, if any matters be inserted in them, as are Disagreeable to the Nature of the Affair given in Charge, and such as we cannot be presumed to have consented to (a).

If I depute a Man with limited Orders, he cannot lay an Obligation on me, beyond the Bounds of his Instructions.

If any Assent be sent with a double Commission, one Open, to shew the Person, with whom he is to transact, the other Secret, prescribing what Steps he shall take, and how far he shall proceed; it may be made a Question, Whether the Agent shall oblige his Principal, if he exceed his private and secret Orders, yet so as to keep within his open Commission: where the Affirmative side ought to be maintain'd (1). For by my open Instructions, I bind my self to the third Person, with whom the Contract is made, that I will ratify and make good what my Agent shall conclude on. And by my secret Orders I bind my Agent, not to recede from such positive Terms; in which Point if he transgress, he stands accountable to me, for so much as I lose by his Mismanagement. But I am still tied to perform to the third Person, what was thus granted in my Name. For otherwise there could be no manner of Safety in treating by Commissioners, it being ever to be fear'd least their secret Directions should differ from their open Powers; neither could there be a more specious Pretence made use of, to overthrow all Affairs transacted by Mediation, and to deceive and abuse Men with vain Treaties (b). But it must be observ'd, we suppose here, as in the former Case, that the Agent when he thus transgresses the Bounds of his private Instructions, did it not out of a dishonest and treacherous Design.

III. If we make use of a Deputy in transmitting a Promise to another Man, and the Person employ'd, happen to die before he have declar'd our Proposal to the other, or obtain'd his Assent, it is plain his Promise may be revok'd (2). For my express Will in this case, was to contract an Obligation by the Words of this Person only whom I intrusted with the Affair. And therefore although he may have declar'd his Message to a third Man, whence it may come to the Ears of the Party, to whom it was directed, yet this way of Communicating the matter, can lay no Tie upon my Conscience. For it was neither my Design in the least to render my self oblig'd, by the means of this third Person, nor is he so fully acquainted with my Will, as to give another any good Assurance of it. But the Case is otherwise, as to a Bearer whom I intrust only with Letters of mine, expressing my Pleasure to a Person at a Distance. Though the Bearer die before he reach the Person, and the Letters are deliver'd by another, yet this is no Hindrance to the contracting of a firm Obligation. For here the Letters, and not the Bearer, are the instrumental Cause of the Engagement; and it signifies nothing to either of the Parties concern'd, by what hands the Deeds were convey'd and presented (c).

IV. On many other Accounts there is great Difference, whether a Man act by my Deputation purely as a Messenger, and a Bearer of my Opinion and Pleasure, or as an Agent and Mediator, with a Liberty of interposing his own Judgment, in some Points of the Business. Which Grotius, in B. 2. C. 11. S. 17. thus expresseth in other words, Whether the Person be pitch'd on to signify the Promise I make, or whether he be authoriz'd to make the Promise himself. In the former Case, if I revoke my Promise before it have been accepted by the other Party, my Revocation shall stand good, although the Messenger being unacquainted with it, should go on in signifying my first Resolution (d). But if a Man acts for another in the latter way of Deputation, unless the Change of Mind be notified to him, it shall be void, and his Principal shall stand oblig'd, if he proceed to settle the Business, as he was at first commission'd. For the Principal when he chose to offer his Promise by such an Agent, lodg'd the obliging Power in his Person, and not in his Pocket; that is, he intended him not barely for the Messenger of his Purpose, but for one that should employ his own Judgment as well as his bodily Service in the Affair (e). The same Distinction the Civilians apply to the Question, whether a Grant should hold good, in case the Donor die before it be accepted. Which they affirm, if the Person deputed to carry the Grant, were of the former kind, because then nothing would be wanting on the Donor's part. But they deny it if the Agent's was, of the latter sort; because the Donor did not fully make the Grant, but only order'd it to be made; or had not yet actually offer'd the thing, but only given Commands for its being offer'd (f).

(a) We have a famous Instance of such a Cheat in Blanks, recorded by Zonaras, Tom. 3. and by Glycas, Tom. 4. in Roman. Lacapen. circa princip. The Patriarch Trypho being accus'd of extream Ignorance, and as one that was not so much as capable of Writing, to confute the Censure, wrote down his Name in a fair Paper, before the Judges appointed. This Paper Theophanes of Cesarea, fill'd up with a formal Resignation, and so brought it to the Emperor; who as the Plot had been laid, took hence an Occasion to eject the Patriarch. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Third Note upon this Section. (1) See Grot. B. 2. c. 11. f. 12. (b) Vid. Memoires touchant les Ambassadeurs. pag. 582, 583, 588. — (2) Vid. Praef. & Costal. ad l. 3. tit. 3. D. de procuratoribus, cap. un. de renunciat. in Clementin. (f) Yet see Ziegler on Grot. l. 2. c. 11. f. 17. where he delivers it as his Judgment, that the Donation may be accepted, in case the Person deputed, made offer of it, during the Donor's Life. But one would wonder how the other Party should make any stop or delay at Acceptance, if the Donation be suppos'd to have been thus communicated. Grotius says, that the same Rule is to be follow'd in deciding the Controversy, whether a Person thus acting by a Commission, can bring an Action against the Heir of the Principal or Donor, for recovery of the Charges he hath been at since the Donor's Death, in executing his Orders. In which Case the Author of the Books to Herennius, B. 2. c. 13. informs us, that two Roman Judges gave a quite contrary Sentence.

V. As we may declare our Consent to an Engagement, by an Agent or Minister, so it is a farther Question, whether a third Person may accept in our behalf, a Promise made to us by another. And here the Dispute is not about those Persons whom we have commission'd to make Acceptance in our Name; for what we do by them we are suppos'd to have done our selves, and when we have intrusted a Matter to another Man's Pleasure, our Will and Consent is included in his. But the Doubt regards only those whom we have not in this manner authorized. And here Grotius (a) observes, 'That we ought to distinguish, whether he who makes us a Promise on behalf of a third Person, does address and bind himself immediately to us, or whether he promises directly to the absent Party, and useth us only for Witnesses of the Act. That is, whether the Words run thus, I promise you that I will give Seius such a thing, and you are Witnesses of this my Resolution. In the former Case according to the Natural Sense and import of the Promise, so soon as I have accepted it, I acquire a Right of taking care that the thing mention'd, be transferr'd to the third Person, if he too will accept it; so that the Promiser in the mean time cannot revoke his Engagement. Yet he to whom the Promise was immediately directed, may remit it before the third Man has declared his Acceptance. The Promise then seems on the whole, to amount to this, I will give Seius such a thing, if you please. And consequently it is in your power and choice, whether you will transfer the Promise on Seius, or whether by refusing the Offer, you will hinder it from coming to him by your Means. And this is all you can do; for if I am absolutely resolv'd to confer the Kindness, I may perform it without your Mediation or Assistance. But if you declare your Approbation of the Proposal, I am not then at liberty to repent, before the matter had been made known to Seius; and if he joyn his Acceptance to yours, the Promise shall by the Law of Nature be good and valid. Indeed the Roman Laws declared all those Stipulations to be Null (1), which were made for the benefit of a third Man, without having a Penalty annex'd to them. And the reason they gave for their Judgement is this, that the original design of inventing Stipulations, was to enable a Man to obtain somewhat for his own Advantage; whereas if the thing promised be to pass to a third Man, he who obtains the Promise, does not serve his own Interest, nor is himself concern'd in the Gain. But if I make a Penal Stipulation, that is, if I procure such an Engagement as this, 'Unless you give Seius an Hundred Pound, you shall by way of Punishment pay me Fourscore, I then acquire thus much Right at least, that if you do not make good the first Sum on my Friend's account, I can demand the latter on my own. This Rule of the Roman Courts seems to have been introduced for the lessening the Number of Suits. For the Judge might well rebuke the Importunity of such a Complainant, who should give him and others a publick Trouble, without being himself concern'd, or interested in the Affairs. And though it cannot indeed be said to be no Advantage to us, when by our Means we derive a Benefit on a third Person, in as much as we thereby oblige him to a grateful Sense of our Service; yet it was thought very Improper, to grant a Man an Action for the recovery of a thing in another's Name, which that other Party could not demand in his own; and consequently to give a Man the Priviledge of purchasing the Friendship of a third Person, at the Charges of a Second.

But in the other Case, when the Promise runs after this manner, I engage, or I declare before you, that I will give Seius such a thing, if you are not Commission'd by Seius to accept the Offer, your Agreement to it will have no Force or Vertue; you neither acquire a Right for your self, nor for Seius, who does not acknowledge your Act for his own. And therefore it signifies nothing, whether the Witness here yield his Consent to the Promise or not; since it is not directed to his own proper Person. And the Promiser, in as much as Seius obtains no Right by the Witnesses Acceptance of the Proposal, may revoke it without Injury; though not always without a breach of Constancy and Truth.

VI. It is farther certain, that if any Offer be made to a Person yet living, by Letter, Messenger or the like, and he happen to die before he has accepted of it, his Heirs cannot accept of it for him; and consequently that such a Promise may fairly be revoked. For the Promiser seems plainly to have refer'd the Acceptance to the choice of the Deceas'd Party, not to his Heirs. Nor is he presumed to have thought of this Accident, or to have been willing that his Promise should stand good upon such a Supposition. We are often inclined to make a Grant to a Person, to be afterwards by him transfer'd to his Heirs, which we are by no means dispos'd to give to his Heirs immediately; it being a very material Point to consider, on whom we bestow our Favours (b).

VII. It may in the last place be enquired, whether a Man can add a Charge or Burthen to his Promise, after the Words have been once deliver'd (2). For that he may before annex what Conditions he pleaseth, is true beyond Dispute. This then may be done, so long as the Promise is not yet perfected by Acceptance, nor made irrecoverable, by the plighting of Faith for his Performance. For the other Party before he accepts of the Proffer, can acquire no Right to it; and therefore in the mean time, as the Promiser may, if he thinks fit, utterly withdraw it, so he may load and clog it with new Conditions. But when a Grant is compleated by the Act of both Parties, no farther Terms can be annex'd to it (a).

'Twill be ask'd, what if the Burthen be added for the sake and benefit of a third Person; as suppose I say, I'll give you such a Sum of Money, provided you'll engage to maintain Seius a Year at the University? We answer, that he who binds himself under this Burthen, may recall it so long as Seius has not yet confirm'd the Promise by his Acceptance; before which it does not of Right belong to him.

VIII. The most general Division that can be applied to Pacts, seems to be this, all of them create a Right, but in some that Right extends it self to the common use of Mankind, in others it is limited to the particular Benefit of certain Persons. For the Life of Men would have proved too plain and simple, had they not to the Ordinances of Nature, added their own Institutions; by means of which their Proceedings were regulated, not only with more Convenience, but with more Comeliness and Grace. Of this latter kind, the Principal are (1), Speech or Discourse; the Propriety, and the value of Things, together with Sovereignty or Command; all which presuppose some Universal Pact, tacit or express, by Vertue of which they have been tied up to certain Forms and Rules. And the introducing and settling of these Engagements, was what Nature her self, supposing the increase of Mankind to a great Number, directed and advised; as conducing in the highest degree to the Peace, and to the Ornament of Human Life. Having therefore finish'd our Enquiries about Covenants in general, we will proceed to examine these Institutions, to discover on what Pacts they are founded, and what Precepts of the Law of Nature, such as we have already term'd Hypothetical or Conditional, do arise from them.

Of Speech, and the Obligation which attends it.

THAT Man was design'd by Nature for a Life of Society, this alone might be a sufficient Argument; That he only of all Living Creatures is endued with the power of expressing his Mind to Others by Articulate Sounds: A Faculty which, abstracting from this Social Condition, we cannot conceive to be of any use or advantage to Mankind. 'Tis well observ'd by Aristotle (a), Nature doth nothing in vain; and Man is the only Animal whom she hath invested with the Privilege of Speech: Not such as consists in the bare repetition of borrow'd Sounds, like the Talk of Parrots, but such as is join'd with a Sense and Understanding of what the Words import. By means of which one may be able to teach another; one may in the most convenient manner command another, and the other apprehend his Commands; without which assistance, there would scarce be any shadow of Society, Peace, or Discipline among Men; or at best, such only as would be in the highest degree rude and unpolish'd. For (as the Philosopher goes on,) Voice (or a certain kind of Inarticulate Sound,) is no more than an indication of Pleasure or Pain, and is therefore to be found in other Animals. Nature having in them proceeded so far, as to give them a sense of what is agreeable, or distasteful; and an ability of signifying, in some sort, these Affections amongst themselves. (Whence it appears, that the Sounds utter'd by Brutes, of whatsoever kind, are determin'd by Nature, not by Custom and Institution, like Human Discourse.) But Speech was given to signify farther what was useful or prejudicial; just, or unjust: It being the Prerogative and Property of Men, above their Fellow Creatures, to have a sense of Good and Evil; of Justice, and Injustice, and the like; since from their Society and Communication, proceed the united Bodies of Families and Commonwealths. (b) And since that Want and Weakness which particular Men lie under, may by the assistance of others be conveniently remov'd, and yet another cannot apply himself to my aid, unless he first understand what I desire; which he may do most readily by means of some Signs and Tokens, and especially by Articulate Words; therefore, that the most useful Instrument of Human Life may duly obtain its End, in uniting Men in Society; and lest by the abuse of Speech, Man should be rendred less Sociable, than if he were Dumb, or Silent, it must be suppos'd a Precept of the Law of Nature; That no Man deceive another by those Signs which have been instituted to express our Meaning and our Thoughts.

II. Now, to trace this Point from its first Head, we must understand, that the Nature and Ability of those Objects which affect our Senses, is such, as not only gives us notice of their own presence or approach, but likewise affords our Reason an opportunity of attaining the Knowledge of other things. And this

Our Speech declares — Pliny (N. H. l. 7. c. 1.) Expresseth the necessity of Speech in a very smart Sentence, when he observes that, Externus alicui non est hominis vice; One Foreigner is not a Man to another. Add. Garcilass. de la Vega, Comm. Reg. l. 7. c. 1.

either because there is a Natural Alliance and Connexion between those Objects, and the Things with which they thus bring us acquainted; or because Beings endued with Sense and Understanding have, without this Natural Relation, fix'd such Notions upon them, as to make them capable of representing continually the Images of certain Things to the Mind. Hence ariseth the distinction of Signs into those which are Natural, and those which owe their force and validity to Custom and Compact. Of the former kind we are on every side supplied with Instances from the Frame of Nature; as the Day-break is the sign of the Sun's rising quickly after; Smoak is the sign of Fire, and the like. By Compact, Men have imposed the use and power of Signifying, on certain Things, Actions and Motions, and above all, on Words, or Articulate Sounds form'd by the Tongue, and afterwards reduced into Letters: And all these are found to be in use, either with some certain Persons, or with the greatest part of Mankind, or in general, with all the World. Under the first of these Classes may be rank'd the Light-Houses and Nightly Fires on the Coasts, for the direction of Vessels: By the abuse of which, Nauplius of old is reported to have driven the Grecians, in a Tempest, upon the Rock of Caphareus, to revenge the Death of his Son Palamedes (a). As likewise those other Marks set up to guide Ships by Day, and to point out the Rocks and Quicksands; together with the Mercuries, pointing Hands, and other Conveniencies for information of Land-Travellers. And thus heretofore the Persians by lighting Fires all along on the tops of their Hills, used in a very little time, to spread some Reports or Alarms through every part of the Kingdom (b). An infinite variety of these Signs are met with in Commonwealths, employ'd for the acquainting the Subjects with some particular matters. To which Head belong, Clocks, Bells, Spears set up at Auctions, Bushes, Signs before Houses, and the like. In War the Sound of Trumpet, Beat of Drum, discharge of Canons, Waving of Colours, &c. And so too, certain Gestures and Motions have been taken up amongst most People, to denote such, or such Intentions of the Mind: To go out of the Way, to Rise up, to Bow, to Kiss the Hand, are Signs of Honour and Respect with the greatest part of the World. To uncover the Head in the Ceremony of Saluting, or to pluck off the Shoes in some Places, is interpreted as a Mark of Honour, in others, of Contempt. It is in some Countries looked on as reproachful to point with the Finger, to bend the Nose, to bid, A Fig for one, (fare le fica) as the Italians call it) with many the like Motions. To take by the Beard is in some Nations the highest Affront, with others it passes for a Token of Veneration; as with the Tartars, with some of the Indians, and, as some think, with the Ancient Gauls (c). 'Tis likewise a common Practice to express by some Gesture our desire of performing such an Action as would require that particular Motion of the Body, by which in strange Countries we, after a sort, supply our Ignorance of the Language. To affirm a thing by gently bending our Head; to deny by throwing it on our Shoulders; to refuse by turning our Back, are Customs almost universally receiv'd. As for our pointing out a certain Thing or Place, by stretching our Hand or Finger towards it, this perhaps ought to be reckon'd amongst the Natural, rather than amongst the Arbitrary Signs. What Discoveries may be made by Nods, Winks, Motions of the Fingers, or of the Feet, when particular Men have once agreed on those ways of Intelligence, is vulgarly known, and need not be farther insisted upon in our present Design (d). Lucian (e) tells us of a Famous Artist in Nero's Court, who express'd the Amour of Mars and Venus as well by Dancing, as he could have done by Narration; whom for this Reason, a certain Barbarous Prince begg'd of the Emperour, for an Interpreter. And the Sieur de Sancy, the French Ambassador, at the Ottoman Court, gives an account of two Mutes whom he saw there, one by Nation a Turk, the other a Persian, who by reason of their using different Signs and Motions, could not understand each other; till at length a third Mute was found out, who was able to perform an Interpreter's Part between the two former.

III. But that which we are chiefly concern'd about in our present Enquiries, is Speech or Discourse, the most common and the most useful Sign amongst Men, and introduc'd for the sake of communicating Notions and Thoughts. Of the rise of which, Diodorus Siculus, B. 1. p. 8. Ed. Rhodom. through his ignorance of the true Origine of Mankind, gives this Fabulous Account: The first Men who were born into the World, led a Savage Life, without culture or refinement; going out in Herds to the Pastures, and feeding on the most juicy Plants, and those Fruits which plain Nature produced. Being infested with the wild Beasts, Use taught them to assist each other, and Fear compell'd them into Society; by means of which they grew acquainted, by degrees, with the resemblance of their Shapes and Features. And having from Confus'd Voice, and without signification, arriv'd by slow attempts to pronounce Articulate Words, shewing every thing by Signs, that they had occasion to observe, and to communicate; they at length gain'd ability to inform one another of all Matters by Discourse. But, inasmuch as there were many of these Communities establish'd in different parts of the World, and every Man join'd his words together meerly as it happen'd, all did not speak in the same manner. And hence arose the number and the variety of all sorts of Languages. Lucretius's Description is exactly of a piece with this: l. 5. v. 1027. &c.

He concludes, That since Brute Creatures could

Mr. Creech.

The chief Design of Lucretius in these Arguments, seems to have been to oppose Cratylus in Plato, who celebrates the first Inventor of Words, and the first Author of the Names of Things, as a Person of the highest Wisdom: An Opinion which we shall examine by and by. And indeed those who believ'd the first Mortals to have crawl'd out of the Earth, could not easily hit on any other Account. For 'tis manifest, that no Languages are born with a Man, but all are learnt by Use and Experience. Whence it comes to pass, that Persons born Deaf, are likewise Dumb. And 'tis look'd on almost as a Prodigy, when such an one is taught to speak; as hath been in the present Age perform'd on the Brother of Velasco, Constable of Castile; who having been Deaf from his Cradle, was made to speak, to write, to read and to understand Authors. And an Instance of the like wonderful Operation, was not long since given by Dr. Wallis at Oxford. Nor doth it look probable, that some one Man in the Beginning should have fram'd a whole Language, with an exact Contexture of Words, and a just Agreement and Conformity to the Things which they were to represent. But 'tis the general Opinion of Christians, founded on the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, That the first Language was by Almighty God immediately infus'd (1) into the Original Pair, which their Children easily learnt, by the Use and Custom of hearing. And that, as for the Diversity of Tongues, this was miraculously produced by the Confusion at Babel (2). Yet some have doubted, whether even the Language which Adam spoke, was at first completely full and perfect, and rich enough to express all manner of Conceptions; inasmuch as the Scripture directly mentions only the Names which he set on living Creatures. As it is certainly true of most Tongues, that they were at first but very poor, and very plain, but were enrich'd in time with Copiousness and Elegance: As likewise that they have in a long course of Years, undergone very signal Alterations; and that from their Corruption and Confusion, many new ones have within the compass of a few Ages, sprung up in the World (a).

IV. But this is most clear and evident, that the power of signifying determinately, thus, or thus, that is of raising such certain Ideas in our Mind, doth not belong to Words by Nature, but ariseth purely from the Pleasure and the Imposition of Men; for otherwise no Reason could be given, why different words should in different Languages, be applied to express the same thing (b). Nor is it any Presumption to the contrary, that we believe Adam to have given Names to the Creatures, not as it fell out by Chance, but with the highest Reason and Design; such as were taken from the peculiar Nature of the Things, and fully and accurately express'd their distinguishing Properties, so as that upon the first sound of the Words, the Nature of each Thing might be understood; as Philo the Jew reports (1). For although we should grant that the Names set on Animals, and some other things, (for no Man can easily prove this of all,) were such as denoted their Genius and Disposition, or their principal Affection; yet those very Primitives whence these Names were derived, signify merely at Pleasure. For Instance, tho' Adam gave this Reason for the Name of Eve, Because she was the Mother of all Living; yet that the Word hava should import to live, is absolutely owing to Imposition: And though in all Languages, Things allied by Nature, are usually allied in Name, there being observ'd in most Words of this kind, some Conformity of Structure, and which the Grammarians term Analogy; yet this is by no means constant and regular, many Words having very particular ways and methods of Variation: and even this Analogy it self, inasmuch as it consists in a certain Inflection and Combination of words, is it self establish'd by Human Appointment. This is the Judgment of Quintilian himself (c); We must remember, says he, that the Rule and Method of Analogy cannot universally be drawn, since in many places it is apparently inconsistent with it self: For Analogy was not at the first Production of Mankind, sent down immediately from Heaven, to teach them the due Form of Speech, but was invented after they had accustomed themselves to discourse, and had observ'd the peculiar Cadences of every word. It is not therefore built upon Reason, but Example; nor is it the Law, but the Experiment and Remark of Speaking; Analogy being indeed the Effect of nothing but Custom.

In Plato's Cratylus, the Opinion of the Person whose Name the Dialogue bears, is to this purpose; That every individual Being includes in its Nature the true Reason of its Name; which is vain and absurd: And that that is not properly the Name of a thing, by which Men agree to call it, by uttering such or such a Portion of their Voice: Which in one sense may be admitted for true; that is, when some particular Men, contrary to common use, impose odd Names on things for the Deception of others: as in the Case of Jugglers, Strawlers, and Gypsies: With regard to which, feign'd Names are oppos'd to true; being fix'd on Persons or Things, contrary to the publick Imposition. But that there is one and the same true Reason of Names, innate alike to the Greeks and Barbarians: which Assertion is likewise false. Hermogenes in the same Dialogue, thus delivers his Opinion on the other side; I can never be perswaded that there is any other Rule or Standard for the Names of things, than Compact and Consent: 'Tis my Judgment, that the Name which a Man fixeth on any thing, whatever it be, is true and proper: And that if he afterwards alter'd that Name for another, the last is no less true and right than the former; as 'tis usual with us to change the Names of our Servants: (Which will hold good, provided no Prejudice be hence done to the Common Agreement.) For nothing Naturally hath such or such an Appellation, but derives it purely from the Law and Custom of Speaking. What Socrates disputes on the side of Cratylus, doth by no means turn the Cause. Thus for Instance, when he scouts it as an Absurdity, If I should give the Name of a Horse to what we commonly call a Man, it would follow, that the same thing might be truly stiled, A Horse and a Man. It may be answer'd, in short, That words of publick Use derive all their Force from publick Imposition, which private Persons ought not, to its Prejudice, to contradict; as we shall shew more at large hereafter. Again, That Argument of his is no better than a Fallacy; If a whole Proposition may be false, therefore a part of it, as suppose, the Noun, or Name of a thing may be likewise false. For a single Word is not capable of that Falsity which we sometimes discover in entire Propositions. The long Discourse he afterwards makes about the Propriety of Terms, will only hold in some

(a) Comp. Hobbs's Levi. c. 4. (b) Which is likewise true concerning the different Forms and Characters of Letters. St. Austin. (de Doctrin. Christian. l. 2. c. 24.) hath made this Observation on the Point; 'That one Letter fashion'd like a Cross (X) imports one Thing amongst the Greeks, and another amongst the Latins; not by the Appointment of Nature, but by the Pleasure and Consent of Men, in fixing such different Significations; and a Person who understands both Languages, when he would express his Mind in Writing to a Grecian, useth this Character differently from what he doth when he writes to a Roman. Thus to the Word Beta, under one and the same Sound in Greek, is the Name of a Letter, in Latin, the Name of a Pot-herb: And when I say, lege, these Two Syllables are by those different People understood in different Senses. See the Art of Speaking by Father Lami. B. 1. c. 14. Edit. Amst. 1699. (1) This Opinion is ill-founded as Mr. Le Clerk makes appear in his Notes upon Gen. II. 19. Derivatives, but not in Primitives. And since the same things are in different Countries express'd by different words, it likewise frequently happens, that words which signify the same thing, have an Etymology utterly distinct. Thus θεός the Greek Name for God, is deriv'd from τρέω to run; because the Stars which are perpetually running their Course, were look'd on as Gods by the Ancients: But what Affinity is there in the Latin Tongue between Deus and Curro? So Man is in Greek term'd ἀνθρώπος quasi ἀναθρώπων ἀ ὄρωμε from considering or contemplating the Objects which he beholds. But must we therefore say, That Homo in Latin comes from Contemplatio? The Soul in Greek is named ψυχή from ἀναψύχων to cool or refresh: But is refrigeratio in Latin for this reason the Theme of Anima? And the same may be shown in any other Instances. In short, however diligent any Person may be in tracing Etymologies, and assigning the Reasons of Words, yet when he hath gone as high as he can, to the Primitive and Simple Terms, he will be forc'd to acknowledge, that they are purely owing to Imposition (a). What can be more ridiculous, than that of Socrates, when in the Disputation of which we have been speaking, he is required to give a Reason for the Words πῦρ & ὕδωρ, he can say nothing else, but that they owe their Original to the Barbarians? Indeed he himself confesseth, that there can be no farther Questions or Answers about Reasons and Derivations, when we are once arriv'd at the first Element of Both. Though he afterwards is very Ingenious to no purpose, in tracing out the Reasons even of primitive words: And yet after all, when he hath argued so long, in all Appearance, for Cratylus's Opinion, he at last fairly doubts on the whole matter.

Sofipater Charisius (b) the Grammarian thus discourseth out of Varro; The Latin Tongue is made up of Nature, Analogy, Custom, and Authority. The Nature of Verbs and Nouns is immutable, and delivers to us neither less nor more than what it receiv'd. Thus if a Man should say scrimbo instead of scribo, he would be convinc'd, not by the power and virtue of Analogy, but by the very Constitution of Nature (c). But we must confess our selves at a loss to find out this Necessity of Nature, unless it be said, that the Latin Tongue having in it an extraordinary sweetness, wonderfully agreeable to the Ear, it must hence come to pass, that we reject at the first hearing, any harsh and untunable Conjunction of Letters in that Language (d). Arnobius (e) speaks excellently to this Point; No way of speaking, says he, is by Nature either true and right, or false and improper: For what Natural Reason can be given, or what Law, in the General Constitution of the World, that we should say, hic paries, and hæc sella? Since neither do those things admit of different Sexes, so as to be distinguished by the Masculine and Feminine Genders; nor can the most learned Critick inform me of the Original Reason and Meaning of these Terms, hic and hæc; or why the first should be applied to the Male, and the second to the Female Sex. All this proceeds from the Arbitrary Appointment of Mankind.

Grotius (f) rightly rejects the Opinion of those who make this to be the difference between Things and Words, that the latter are Naturally the Signs of our Thoughts, the former not. Indeed if the meaning of the Assertion be no more than this, that Words were instituted for no other end, but to be the Signs of our Conceptions, and that therefore their whole Nature and Essence consists in their power of signifying; whereas when Things are used for Signs, this is merely extrinsecal and accidental to them: we ought then by all means to admit it as true. But if it be intended in this sense, That the power of signifying such or such a particular Matter inheres Naturally in Words, but not in Things; the Position is false and groundless. And on the contrary it is true, that words Naturally, and without respect to Human Imposition, signify nothing at all, unless it be some such confused and Inarticulate Sound as we make use of in Sorrow, or in Laughter which ought rather to be call'd Noise, than Speech. If the said Notion be thus explain'd, that such is the Nature of Man above all other Animals, that he can signify to others the Conceptions of his Mind, and that words were invented to be the Instruments of Communication, then the Assertion is true, but not compleat: For it should be added, that these Discoveries are conveyed not by words alone, but by Nods and other Motions. As we find several Dumb Persons who are able to express their Inward Conceptions after a very surprizing and artificial manner. Hence, in the Roman Law, (g) those who have not the Gift of Speech, are yet supposed to say thus or thus, by that striving and straining which they use, and that Sound and Inarticulate Voice which is utter'd by them. And 'tis a Rule in the same Law (h), That Dumb Persons may contract Matrimony, by Mutual Consent without Words: That is, it shall be sufficient if they express their Agreement by Dumb Signs. Nay Pliny (i) tells us of some Nations of Aethiopia, who had no other Speech amongst them, besides these Gestures and Motions of the Body (k).

(a) To this we may add the Remark of Quintilian, Institut. Orat. l. 1. c. 6. p. 64. Ed. Lugd. Bat. Shall it be affirm'd likewise, that Man took his Name of Homo, because he was humo natus, Born of the Earth? As if all Animals had not the same Original! Or, as if those Primitive Mortals first set a Name upon the Earth? and then upon themselves!

(b) Institut. Grammat. l. 1. ex Varrone. (c) We meet with the same in Diomedes. l. 2. (d) Vid. Huart. Tryal of Wits. C. XI. The Reason alledg'd by P. Nigidius, to prove that Words signify according to Nature, in Aul. Gell. l. 10. c. 4. is altogether vain and frivolous. (e) L. 1. advers. gent. p. 45. Ed. Paris. 1605. (f) L. 3. c. 1. f. 8. (g) L. 33. t. 10. D. de Supell. leg. (h) Cap. 25. X. de Sponsal. (i) N. H. l. 6. c. 30. (k) Add. Quintilian, l. 11. c. 3. Institut. Orat. Of the Marks or Signs used by the Peruvians under their Yucas, See Garcilass. de la Vega. l. 6. c. 9.

To the same Head belong those Marks and Characters which do not denote Voices or Words, but immediately the very Things themselves. And this, either upon account of some agreeableness which they bear to the things represented; as in most of the Egyptian Hieroglyphicks; or because the Imposition of Men hath invested them with such a power, as in the Chinese Characters, by which they express entire Notions and Sentences.

It may not be inconvenient to remark somewhat concerning that kind of Imposition, by which such a peculiar or Proper Name is affix'd to Persons, Places, and some other Things; the design of which is, that one Man, one Place, one City or Country, may be distinguish'd from another; and that by these Marks there may be a mutual understanding between Men, in determining their Words or Actions. Now as the Proper Terms of other things follow the manner of Appellative, or Common Nouns, so with regard to the Proper Names of Men, it is to be observed, that the power of imposing them usually belongs to those who have others under their Authority and Government: Thus Parents are wont to give Names to their Children, Masters to their Slaves and Vassals, and Princes to those of their Subjects, on whom they confer any Signal Honour. In case this Office be omitted by those Superiors who have such a right to perform it; or in case many have been invested with the same Title, it shall be lawful for every Person to take upon himself some term and note of distinction: But as no Man ought to assume another Name, when by such an Act of his, the General End of imposing Names may be intercepted and hindred; or when upon this Alteration, any damage or prejudice, or any probable danger and Suspicion of it, is likely to accrue to another Person; so neither ought any Man to hide or dissemble his true Name; unless in such a Case, when by this concealment we do not prejudice the Rights of others, and yet procure some advantage to our selves, or effect our deliverance from Loss or Danger; according to those Rules which we shall hereafter deliver about the Obligation to speak Truth (a).

V. As all Signs, except those which we call Natural, denote some determinate thing by Virtue of Human Imposition, so this Imposition is attended with a certain Agreement, Consent, or Compact, tacit or express; from the force of which, there ariseth a necessity of applying such a Sign to such a particular Thing, and to none else. The like Covenant must be supposed in relation to all those Things which we use for Signs, whatever account we follow of the Origine of Human Speech. For although we conceive the Primitive Languages to have been immediately infused into Men, yet since each Person separately enjoy'd his power of Discourse, and could use it freely as he pleas'd, by applying any Words to any Things; this Faculty would not have obtain'd its proper End and Use, unless an Agreement had pass'd between Men, that each Party should exercise their Talent in the same uniform manner, and constantly express the same things by the same Words. For since he who is placed in a State of Natural Liberty, doth not hold his Powers at the beck and controul of others, but hath the Priviledge of using them as his own Judgment shall direct, another Person would have no manner of Right to require of me, that I should apply my Powers in such a particular way, and no otherwise, so as to enable him to apprehend my Thoughts and Intentions, unless we had before settled this Point by some Pact between us: The full extent and force of which Pact is this; That although Signs do not inform us of the Minds of others by an Infallible, but only by a Probable, Certainty, Men being Naturally capable of Dissimulation and Disguise; (b) yet that which any Person hath express'd by these Signs, shall be presumed to be his serious purpose. And therefore as to matters of Right, the Effect shall follow the Consent of the Party, as by Signs declar'd; though perhaps his Inward Thoughts and Resolutions were really different from these Outward Indications (c): For otherwise the Use and Design of such General Marks would be utterly frustrated. But the Mutual Communication of good Offices amongst Men could not be exercis'd, unless they had some certain information of the Wants and Wishes of each other; and since the Condition of Human Nature would not allow this to be convey'd in any other way than by Signs striking upon the Senses; therefore the use of those Signs was by some settled Compact to be ratified and circumscribed, that every Person might clearly apprehend what Service or Assistance was desired of him by Others (d).

VI. This Compact and Agreement about the Use of Signs, and especially of Words, is either General, or Special: The former is suppos'd to pass between Men who speak the same Language, engaging them to express particular Things, and principally those which

Use may revive the Obsolete Words,
And banish those that now are most in Vogue;
Use is the Judge, the Law, and Rule of Speech.

My Lord Roscommon.

There are, says Sextus Empiricus (b), and were, and ever will be, various Alterations and Revolutions of Words; for the Age is still delighted with Change; and not more in Plants and Animals, than in Speech. And the same Author (c) hath this admirable Remark to the same purpose; As in a City or County, he who is contented to take the Money that commonly passeth, may live under that Government, and buy and sell, drive Bargains, and Trade without Molestation or Hindrance; but he who will not comply with the Coin ordinarily Current, but frames a New kind according to his own Fancy, and offers it in Payment, is manifestly out of his Senses; so in Life, he who will not follow the common Speech, (like the common Coin) when establish'd by Use and Custom, but invents a new Language peculiar to himself, is not many Degrees remov'd from a Madman. Indeed, that such a Compact is absolutely Necessary, appears from hence; That Men could receive no manner of Use or Benefit from Speech, unless the Parties speaking were mutually understood. We are all Deaf, says Tully (d), in those Languages with which we are not acquainted. And so Ovid (e) complains in his Banishment,

Barbarus hic ego sum, quia non intelligor ulli,

Not understood, I'm a Barbarian here.

We may observe farther, That as most Tongues are varied by Dialects, so it often happens that Words of the same Tongue have in different Places different Significations: The Meaning and Importance therefore of such Words shall be determin'd by the Custom of the Place where the Business is transacted; unless it shall appear that the Stranger hath not yet agreed to quit his own Native Phrase, and to conform to the Idiom of the other Party. And thus too there are several Words which in some Places and Times are look'd on as scandalous and reproachful, in others not. Of this the Name of Tyrant is a known Instance. In the same manner, the Term of Barbarian, which the Greeks and Romans held to be so disgraceful, the Gothic King Theodoric frequently applies to his own Nation. And in the Law of the Burgundians, Barbari is very often the Style which those People bestow on themselves. It is here likewise worthy to be consider'd, that most Terms of Speech have besides their principal, a kind of accessory (1) or additional Signification, by which we at the same time express our Judgment, Passion, or Esteem. And this is the reason, that of many words which as to their main Importance exactly fall in with each other, some are Opprobrious and Injurious, others not; because this additional Signification is found in some and not in the rest. Thus if I give a Man the Lie, I not only signify that his Speech is disagreeable to his Thought, but farther denote, that he did this with an ill Intention, and on account of procuring my Prejudice or Hurt. And 'tis on the score of this latter Indication that the Words are look'd upon as contumelious and injurious. So if I call any Person an Impostor, or an Ignoramus, I affront him; because those Names, besides their proper meaning, include by the by, somewhat of Contempt and Reproach: whereas there are many other words by which I may, without any such Affront or Abuse, signify my self to have been hurt by another, or shew that another is ignorant of some things; and which consequently shall only declare the direct sense, without any such Indication of Disgrace. Sometime this additional Mark ariseth, not from the General Imposition of Men, but from the Tone of the Voice, (which is different according as we either teach and admonish, or flatter and court, or chide and reprove,) from the Lines of the Face, from particular Gestures, and other Natural Signs, which are wont very considerably to alter, diminish or increase, the principal Signification of words. And thus too a Figurative Speech very often denotes some Passion in the Speaker, whereas a plain Expression barely imports the thing asserted: Usque adeo mori miserum est (2)? denotes no more than if we should say barely, non est usque adeo miserum mori: because it includes a Contempt of Death. From the same accessory Meaning it comes to pass that some Words are accounted Obscene, others not; though as to the main they signify the same Thing; nay, though the Thing be not really in it self foul or indecent. The reason of which Difference seems in part to be this; that since some words express a Thing or an Act more loosely and generally, others in a more distinct Manner, and with particular Circumstances; therefore he who makes use of the latter sort, at the same time betrays his Lust, with Regard to such a Thing or Act, and discovers a Satisfaction and Approbation which a Man of Vertue and Breeding would be asham'd of: Sometime too the Obscenity of words proceeds from hence; that they either denote a Contempt of the Thing signify'd, or else are used only among the baser People, or towards such to whom we owe no Reverence or Respect (a). Casaubon in his Comment on Persius (b) hath disputed at large, whether it be allowable to apply Obscene Words even to the Reproof and Correction of Vice, which is the ordinary Practice of Satyrical Writers.

Those words are grounded on Special Compact, which either have been invested with a peculiar Signification, different from what they bear in common use, or which are utterly unknown to the ordinary Methods of Speech. Of which kind are all those Terms of Art, used by Mechanics and others; which on account of either the Multiplicity and Confusion of Things, or the meer Pleasure of the Authors, have either been invented anew, or applied to another Meaning than what they obtain'd in Vulgar Discourse. Now, that no Man may be deceiv'd by these Terms, amongst Persons who understand the particular Art, the very Nature of the Business in hand, will be a sufficient Caution and Security. And amongst the Unskilful, they ought to be explain'd and limited by common words. Which Explication and Settlement is likewise necessary, when either Artificers differ about the use of their Terms; or when any Person for some particular Reasons, thinks fit either to coin new words, or to fix a new sense on old ones (c). Some few Persons in Confederacy may, and often do frame to themselves peculiar Words and Marks of Things, or put a different Signification on Vulgar Terms, so as to be understood by each other, and by none besides. (And how far this Practice is Lawful, will appear from the Sequel of our Enquiry.) In which Point it is enough, if those Words or Marks rightly discover my Mind to those, with whom I have thus entred into a particular Covenant about their Use: And this holds too in other Signs, determin'd by the peculiar Imposition of certain Men. Amongst these the Principal are the Military Tokens and Signals of War; of which Silence it self hath been sometimes used for one. Thus in Polyænus (d), the Arcadian General, undertaking by Night to surprize the Spartans at the Tegæa, gave his Souldiers no other Sign but this, That they should kill all who ask'd for any Sign. The Arcadians therefore were silent; but the Spartans not knowing their Fellows in the Dark, and so demanding the word, were slaughter'd by the Enemy. And so Pammenes, in the same Author (e), put a Cheat upon his Enemies by altering the Signal of the Trumpet, and quite inverting the ordinary Method and Use; commanding his Men to fall on when the Trumpet sounded a Retreat, and to retire, when it seem'd to call them to a close Engagement.

VII. But we must carefully observe, that although by this general and special Compact we are bound to use our Words and other Signs in the manner that hath been agreed upon; yet we are not hereby in the least oblig'd to open and discover our Minds to all Persons (f). But to effect this, it is necessary that another Obligation be added, arising either from some particular Covenant, or from the general Command of the Law of Nature; or lastly, from the Quality and Condition of the Business which is at present to be transacted by Speech (1). Thus, for Instance, if I undertake to be an Instructor to any Person, I am engag'd, (by the Contract of Letting and Hiring,) to explain and communicate to him all that belongs to that Art or Profession. If I send a Person with Commission to search into the State of such or such an Affair, he is bound by Covenant to acquaint me with all the Discoveries and Informations he hath gain'd about that matter. If I am to exercise towards another any Duty of Humanity which must be perform'd by Speech, it is manifest my Words must be agreeable to my Thoughts and Intentions. If a Man undertake to write an History, he is to deliver nothing which he knows to be False, by Vertue of that general Obligation by which we are bound to promote the Use and Benefit of others. As we are likewise, by a common Engagement, tied to express our Minds by the clearest and plainest Signs, in all such Cases, when if we do otherwise, we may bring some hurt or prejudice on Innocent Persons. So, lastly, in all Commerce and Business between Men, in which, by the consent of the Parties, some Right or Obligation is to be produc'd, we are to declare our Meaning openly and clearly to the Persons with whom we deal. For otherwise there could be no possible way of rightly adjusting those Concerns. But, since it doth not always so happen, that I am bound by any of these Rules to open my Thoughts to another about any Affair, especially such as is private and particular; it is evident from hence, that I am not under an Engagement to unfold all my Opinions and Intentions to Men alike, but those only which they have a right (either perfect, or imperfect,) to understand; which Right supposeth a correspondent Obligation on my part: And that therefore I may fairly conceal and dissemble those Things, which another hath no Right to know, and which I my self have no Obligation to disclose (a): Nay, in such Cases, where no Body else is injur'd in his Right, and where the Advantage or the Safety of my self, or of some other Person cannot otherwise be procur'd, it shall be allowable for me to apply the Common Signs in such a manner, as to express what is really contrary to my Judgment. For since the Compact about applying Signs in such a certain way, bears a regard to other Obligations, which are by the means of these Signs to be fulfill'd; therefore when those Obligations cease, there appears no reason why I may not make a different use of the Signs, if I injure no Man, and at the same time have no greater convenience of benefiting my self or others.

VIII. From these Principles and Fundamental Rules, it is easy to understand both the Nature of Truth, which Men are obliged to speak and profess; and the Nature of a Lye, which is so abhorr'd by all the Good and Honest, and the imputation of which every Man looks on as the foulest Disgrace (b). The former then consists in this, that the Signs which we make use of, and especially our Words, do in a proper and convenient manner represent our Thoughts to another, who hath a right to understand them; and to whom we are bound, either by a Perfect or an Imperfect Obligation to discover them: And this to the end, that he by apprehending our meaning, may obtain some Benefit, or may escape some undeserv'd Evil, which would have follow'd upon our deceiving him. So that besides that Logical Truth which consists in a conformity between Words and Things, this Ethical or Moral Truth, of which we are now treating, superadds the Intention and Obligation of the Speaker: On which Score, he who declares the Truth out of Error or Imprudence, hath barely recited the Logical Truth, but hath not exercis'd the Moral. And he who blabs out any Matter without any Obligation in himself, or any Right in the other Party, ought to be esteem'd rather an Idle Prater, than a Speaker of Truth. And hence 'tis easy to gather, what must be the Nature of a Lye; namely that it is, when our Signs or Words bear a different Sense from our Real Conceptions; whereas the Person to whom the Signs were directed, had a Right to understand, and to judge of those Conceptions; and we on our part, lay under an Obligation to make him apprehend our Meaning. I take this to be a more clear and distinct way of shewing the necessity we stand under to declare our real and undisguis'd Intentions, than if I should derive the Sin and the Baseness of Lying, barely from that General Rule of Natural Law, that no Man is to be hurt; as if the whole Nature of a Lye consisted in its power of hurting. For strictly speaking, we do not hurt another by with-holding from him what he hath only an Imperfect Right to receive: and yet the violation of such an Imperfect Right is sufficient to constitute a Lye. For the same reason Philostrotus's Notion of a Lye is confus'd and unaccurate; when he reports (c), That amongst some of the Indians, any Student in Philosophy who was found guilty of this Vice, was rendred incapable of bearing any Magistracy or Honour, Because he had by Lying cheated the Common Society of Mankind. But, as in all Acts by which we recede from Law, Error, Imprudence, and Rashness are distinguish'd from Malice, or Wicked Design, so neither is any Man properly said to Lye, but he who with Evil Intention, and preconceiv'd Malice, tells another what is really different from his Sentiments or Resolutions, either to prejudice or to delude him. And hence, he who having been deceiv'd by another Man, delivers things which he himself takes to be true, reports a Lye, but is not himself the Lyar. Yet a Person, who catching up things with too hasty a Credulity, afterwards disperseth them amongst others, exposes himself to the Censure of Rashness and Folly. Nay, the spreading of another Man's Lye, or of a Matter not certainly known, may in some Cases bring an Obligation on the Publisher to repair the Damage occasion'd by the Report: especially when such a Publication approacheth near to that Trespass which the Civilians term culpa lata (d).

IX. Having thus discover'd the true source, and the Genuine Foundation of Truth and of Lyes, we may assure our selves, that those Authors are mistaken, who assert, That a Lye, and an Untruth are really the same thing, and that he deserves to be branded with the Name of a Lyar, who says any thing differing from his Judgment; and that consequently to speak otherwise than we think, is in its own Nature base and sinful. An Untruth is when you apply Words in such a manner, as that another shall conceive from them a Sense not agreeable to your inward Imaginations. But now, if the other Party have no Right by Virtue of which he ought clearly to understand my Meaning; and if I do not hereby prejudice any Man without cause, there seems to be no reason, why, if I find it convenient for me, I may not use those Words rather according to my own pleasure, than the pleasure of another. Hence every Lye is an Untruth, but every Untruth cannot come under the Name of a Lye: And if we take Aristotle (1) in this Sense, when he affirms, That a Lye is in it self foul and disgraceful, there will be no need of Grotius's Limitation; who explains καθ' αὐτὸ in it self, by Generally, or without regard to the Circumstances (a). For such an Untruth as escapes censure, by Virtue of some particular Circumstances, ought, on no account, to suffer the Odious Character of a Lye. And, on the other side, that every Lye, properly so called, is in its own Nature base and scandalous, seems to be beyond dispute.

It is worth remarking on this Head, that the very speaking what is true may sometimes create and constitute a Lye: Which not only happens when a Person affirms the Truth with the Air and Address of a Lye, and by his Manner, his Gestures, and his Actions, which used to be as it were the Life and Soul of Discourse, makes his Hearers believe the contrary to what he delivers; as Quintilian (b) shews us how 'tis possible to be guilty of a Lye, as well as of a Solacism, by base Action, when we speak one thing, and hint another, by a Posture or a Nod: but it chiefly takes place in those, who by a practice of frequent Lying, have depriv'd themselves of all Credit and Belief. Now such Persons as they are not easily regarded, how willing soever they may be to deliver serious Truths; so they have an opportunity of abusing the diffidence of a hearer, to his deception and delusion; who thinking them to be always like themselves, may easily be cheated by believing quite the contrary of of what they aver. The Instance in the Fable is well known, where the Boy so often tricked the Countrymen with a false Alarm of the Wolf, that at length when the Wolf really appear'd, he could not gain Credit enough for their assistance. Agesilaus turn'd this Fetch into a Stratagem of War. For inasmuch as 'tis reckon'd most impolitick in a General openly to proclaim his Resolutions, for which reason the Enemy is not wont to believe what is given out in this free and secure manner, Agesilaus by this piece of Subtlety prevail'd on the Persian Nobleman who oppos'd him, to march his Army quite another way than what he had thus publish'd, that he would take himself (c).

But, as no Man will presume to condemn the Wise Gravity of Epaminondas (1), who could not bear to utter a Lye though in jest: So, on the other hand, it is very weak to believe, that a Person always incurs a heinous guilt, when, without injuring any one else, and for the advantage of himself and others, he delivers Words differing from his real Thoughts. It were therefore to be wish'd, with Cicero (2), That all Simulation and Dissimulation were utterly banish'd from Human Life: and that Men were arriv'd at such a happy temper, as that no one should envy the the Goods of another, or plot to rob him of them; that no one should abuse the Simplicity and Credulity of others, to their prejudice or deception; and lastly, that no one should in any Instance, resist the Command of Right Reason: Such a strict and accomplish'd Person Achilles pretends to be in Homer (d); it is his Brave Declaration,

Ἐχθρὸς γὰρ μοι κείνῳ ὁμῶς αἰδέομαι πύλησιν,
Ὅς γ' ἔπειν ῥα κεύθει ἐνὶ φρεσίν, ἄλλο ἢ βάζει.

*Like Hell I hate the Man, whose Tongue reveals
A different Tale from what his Heart conceals.*

But since he who is ever freely publishing and declaring his own Concerns, lays himself open to the Fraud of wicked Men; and since most Persons are inclined rather to be won upon by Artifice and Shew, than to be convinc'd by solid Plain-dealing; therefore it may not be advisable for us to exclude from Human Society, the Art of Innocent Diffimulation, till all the Wickedness, and all the Folly of Mankind is turn'd into Probity and Wisdom. Pindar's Remark is excellent to this purpose (e).

*Not Truth with open Face, and open Heart
Is serviceable always, always wise:
But often 'tis in Life the Noblest Art,
To know the prudent Use of Silence or Disguise* (f).

Though 'tis certain, at the same time, that he who makes use of these Practices of Concealment and Cunning farther than is necessary for his own Defence, renders himself unfit to be trusted, and incapable of being dealt with in any Honest Affair or Business: inasmuch as 'tis impossible, but that such a Person must be suspected in all that he says or does.

The Arguments by which some attempt to prove that every Untruth is in it self odious and sinful, are of no weight. They tell us, 'That the False Speaker defiles and disgraceth his Tongue, that most noble Member, by such an abuse: that he deprives himself of Credit, to the great stop and hindrance of many good Offices amongst Men; since he never fails to gain this amongst other advantages, not to be believ'd tho' he speak the Truth. But this Charge holds good only against a strict and proper Lye, not against such Falsties as Prudence often adviseth and recommends. They add, 'That to falsifie, argues a Man to be of a low and abject Spirit; since he who could rely upon solid Plainness and Truth, would have no need to seek refuge in Tricks and Shifts. But those Untruths which are both innocent and unnecessary, do not always proceed from meanness of Soul: And sometimes, amongst wicked Men, Honesty and Truth it self cannot be supported, but by indirect and artificial Methods. Others are more fond of this Argument; 'Speech is given to be an Interpreter of the Mind; since then every Untruth is contrary to this End, it ought likewise to be esteem'd repugnant to the Order of Nature: and, farther, that to have the Tongue differ from the Mind, quite disturbs that Harmony which should appear in the Powers and Faculties of Man. In reply, we willingly allow, that Speech is the Interpreter of the Mind; but 'tis in such a manner, as that it ought not to blab out more than the Mind gives it commission to disclose; the Mind being to judge what is convenient to be declared, and what to be concealed.

X. We have asserted every Lye to be a violation of some Right; but what kind of Right this is, and how acquired by Men, all are not agreed in explaining. Some conceive, that since both God and Men have a Natural ability to understand the Truth, which is obstructed by the contrary Speeches, therefore they have on this very account, a Right of requiring others to express themselves in an intelligible manner. Now with regard to Almighty God, the thing is beyond dispute; For to use any kind of Falstiy in our Addresses to him, is not only extremely irreverent, as if bare and open Truth were not as prevalent with the Divine Majesty, as Colours and Fictions; but also in the highest degree foolish, since God doth not stand in need of the Information of Men. And therefore Cain (1) was not only impious, but stupid, in endeavouring to conceal his Brother's Murder from God, especially by so impudent and so rude a Reply. And thus far that of Sophocles (a) will hold good; I hate a Man, who being taken in Wickedness, attempts to make his Excuse. But otherwise, this is no good Consequence; a Person is Naturally capable of understanding a matter, therefore he hath a Right to understand it; nor doth a Physical ability always infer a Moral. As for that which some add to what we are now saying; That he who hears an Untruth, doth yet understand the Words; and therefore that false-speaking doth not take away the Right of Understanding; this is nothing at all to the purpose. For such an one understands indeed; but he understands only a Shadow and Fiction, instead of the Truth which he desires.

Others there are which derive that Right which is violated by Lying, not from Nature, but from the Art of Men; that is, from some tacit Compact: For, say they, since Discourse, and other the like Marks and Tokens were introduc'd by Human Institution, Men at the same time laid a mutual Obligation on each other to use these Signs in such a manner, as to be able hence to make a Judgment of the Person's Sentiments, with whom they should confer (2): Because, without such an Obligation, and if every Person were allow'd to apply

Words how he pleas'd, and to hinder others from apprehending his Meaning, this Invention of Signs had been altogether vain and fruitless. This is the Opinion of Grotius (b); on which we may make this Remark; That there is not sufficient Care taken in it, to distinguish between those Two Obligations, one of which regards the Applying Signs in General in such a due manner, that another may understand our Thoughts; and the other engageth us to discover by those Signs our Real Meaning to such or such a particular Person; which two are very different and proceed from distinct Principles: For inasmuch as Words borrow their Signification from the Force of Imposition, we must suppose some Agreement to have pass'd between Men who speak the same Language, that, in common Use, they would apply such Signs to express such Things. But the Obligation which ties me actually to address those Signs to another, or to open my Mind to him about such a certain Affair, ariseth either from some general Command of the Law of Nature, or from particular Covenant; as has been above explain'd. Hence it appears what Judgment we should make of their Notion, who deny the Nature of a Lie to consist in the Violation of a Pact on this Principle, 'That whatever is constituted, not by Nature, but by the Compact of Men (especially tacit) is to be derived, and to be valued from the Point of Profit, and from that alone. Whereas, that Men should understand all that others say, doth not seem to be a thing so very profitable and beneficial. On the Contrary, it is much for our Interest, that we should have a full liberty of covering either with Silence, or proper Colours, such Matters as may be kept secret without the Prejudice of other Men, and with our own Advantage. Here those Points are confounded, which ought to have been with Accuracy distinguish'd. For in this, that a Man should understand the Thoughts of all others; or that all others should understand his; there is indeed no Profit; nor did Men by introducing of Speech, lay any such mutual Obligation on themselves. But we have already shewn how far any Person is bound to declare himself to another, and how far the other hath a Right to understand him. Supposing then an Obligation in us to communicate our Thoughts to such or such a Man, upon this the other Obligation which attended the Introduction of Speech falls in, and exerts its Force, engaging us so to apply our Words, that the Party may apprehend our Meaning. And of this the Profit or Advantage is so very great, that without it there would be no manner of use in Speech.

XI. Thus much being premised, it will not be difficult to judge how rightly those several Cases in which the Truth is not precisely spoken, are yet in common Estimation, exempted from the Character of Lies. And here first of all some distinguish between speaking what is False, and not speaking, or dissembling some part of what is True; affirming the former to be unlawful, but the latter to be often innocent. On which Point we are to know, that although to hold our Tongue cannot properly be term'd a Lie, especially if we used no other Sign equivalent to Speech; yet our Silence may on another account become Criminal: As suppose we hinder by it some Good which we were oblig'd to procure; or cause some Evil, which we were bound to avert. This is what the Poet calls —animumque nefas scelerare silendo (a);

The Soul with silent Mischiefe to defile.

Thus a Watchman who is set to give notice of the Enemy's Approach, shall incur the severest Punishment upon Neglect of Information. Polybius (b) says, That an Historian who professeth to give an account of Affairs, is no less a Liar, if he suppress and conceal what really happen'd, than if he relate what is false. But in a matter which I am not obliged to declare to another, if I cannot with Safety conceal the whole, I may fairly discover no more than a part. An Instance of this is usually given in the case of Jeremiah, who in the 38th Chapter of his Prophecy, vers. 25. 6c. (1) being consulted by the King, concerning the Issue of the Siege, prudently hides that Particular from the Princes, as the King expressly order'd him; assigning another Reason of the Conference, which notwithstanding was also really true. Here the Prophet told only a part of the Truth, being no wise obliged to disclose the whole. To the same purpose the Story of Athanasius is produced, who meeting himself with those who were sent to apprehend him, and being ask'd, Whether he had seen Athanasius; answer'd, That he saw him lately pass by this way, and that he was now gone on Board. For here he was under no Obligation to betray himself. As to the Example of Abraham in Genesis XX. 12. some question whether that most holy Man acted prudently in calling Sarah his Sister, and concealing their Marriage: For he knew her Beauty to be such, as might kindle a Passion in the Beholders, and at the same time, that Unmarried Persons are reckon'd more capable of Addressees than others. Nor, say they, was Abimelech's Expostulation with him unjust: and on the contrary, it was most inhuman in Abraham, to suppose, that there was no Piety or Honesty in a State, before he arrived to be their Instructor. Others excuse the Patriarch, on this Argument, That the Hope of Life commonly bends the greatest and most stubborn Souls; and that scarce any thing is look'd on as base and infamous, which is undertaken on the Score of declining Death. But this Point we leave undecided.

XII. Grotius (c) distinguishes likewise between those Signs which have been invented and determin'd, μετὰ συνθήκης or with a mutual Obligation, and other things about which no such Agreement hath pass'd: (For no doubt when a Compact hath been made concerning the use of any thing, we are exactly to conform to that specified Use.) And as to the latter sort, he is of Opinion, that 'tis allowable to misapply them, even when we foresee that the other Party will thence be led into a false Judgment; provided either that no farther Hurt follow this Deception, or that the Hurt which follows it, is (setting aside the Consideration of the Deceit,) Lawful; and when we might fairly have hurt him in an open manner: And to this we willingly subscribe. For since no Agreement, either general or particular, is suppos'd to have pass'd, which might have laid a Necessity on me to apply the Thing in such a manner, and no otherwise, to the end that the said Party might gather my Meaning from it; therefore I am presumed to be left at full Liberty, as to its Use, so long as I hurt no Man injuriously, or without Cause. The Party may thank himself for the wrong Notion he hath form'd; and attribute it to his overcurious Impertinence in passing Judgment on other Men's Business. Whilst I am exercising my proper Right, I am not always obliged to hinder another from taking up a false Opinion in other respects harmless. For Instance, if a Man to keep himself from being frighted in the Night, or to have a Light always at hand for some Occasion, should sleep with a Candle in his Chamber; he is not bound to put it out, how deeply soever his Neighbour may fancy that he sits up at his Business. The Example of our Saviour, Luke XXIV. 28. is a Case of no Difficulty. For every Man may, at his Pleasure, use the Gesture there represented: And nothing is in Common Life more frequent, than to feign our selves in a Readiness to be gone, that we may discover whether or no we are welcome Guests: We being seriously resolv'd to depart, unless we are solicited and importun'd to stay. The Case of St. Paul in Acts XVI. 3. seems a Matter of higher Consideration (2). But as to the other Instance alledged by Grotius, of deceiving an Enemy, by counterfeiting Flight, Cloaths, Colours, Sails, Arms, and the like; this Practice is allowable beyond Dispute; since we might lawfully have done him what Mischiefe we could, by the most plain and open Means.

XIII. It is the Judgment of the same Author, (d) 'That we do not always contract the guilt of Lying, when we use an Ambiguous Word or Expression, which admits of divers Significations, either in Common-Speech, or by

‘ the Custom of Art, or by some Figure not ‘ unusual or intelligible, provided our inward ‘ Meaning is agreeable to any one of these Sig‘ nifications; although we believe that the ‘ Person to whom we speak will understand it
 ‘ in a different sense. But he very rightly adds,
 ‘ That such Equivocal Speeches are not rashly
 ‘ to be approv’d of and allow’d; being only ‘ Justifiable when they serve for the Instruction ‘ of one committed to our Care; or for the ‘ avoiding some pernicious and insinuating Que‘ stion (a); or for the procuring some Benefit ‘ to our selves, without the Damage of others
 ‘ (b): For else, if you are under an Obligation to discover your Mind clearly to me, ’tis the same thing whether you deceive me by a plain Lie, or by a doubtful Expression: Especially since the latter must, to serve your purpose, be so fram’d and contriv’d, that I may lay hold on the more obvious and vulgar sense, whilst the more abstruse and uncommon answers to your inward Conceptions: Otherwise, if both Significations are alike probable, scarce any Person will be so supinely negligent, as not to ask you, which way you would be understood? But to speak ambiguously, or obscurely to one whom we intend to instruct, or whose Proficiency we would thus try and examine, is on no account Faulty; if the good End we propose may by this means be better obtain’d, than by more plain and direct Application.
 To this purpose is the Instance in St. John VI. vers. 5, &c. (1). So if I am not oblig’d to declare my Mind at all to such or such a Person, nothing hinders but that I may as well let him be mistaken, as let him be ignorant, if besides that Mistake, he incur no other undeserv’d Prejudice. And therefore no one will censure Athanasius for the Deception he put on his Pursuers, which we have already recited (c).

It is hence evident, that we ought to interpret Grotius with some Caution, when he says (2), ‘ It is requisite to the general No‘ tion of a Lie, that what is either spoken or ‘ written, or by any Marks and Tokens ex-‘ press’d, cannot otherwise be understood, than
 ‘ in such a Sense as is different from the In‘ tention of the Person thus declaring. For in Cases, where a Man is bound clearly to discover his Meaning, he ought so to frame his Expressions, as that the same Sense which either the Nature of the Business in hand, or the common Use and Custom of Speech suggests, shall be likewise agreeable to his real Thoughts. Nor can he, with the least reason, bid the Hearer thank himself for the Mistake or Damage he suffers, only on the account of not diving into all the remote Quirks and Terms of Expression, utterly foreign to the present Affair; that is, for not being a Conjurer. And the Remark of Isocrates (d) must be own’d for a certain Truth, That to use am- biguous Sayings in Judicial Contentions about Bargains, and Matters of Interest and Moment, is scandalously base, and shews a very high degree of Wickedness.

XIV. Much more ought we to abhor and detest those Mental Reservations (3), which the wicked Artifice of some Men hath invented, by wresting Words to a quite contrary Sense to what they outwardly and plainly import; and this even in Cases where there was an Obligation to speak the Truth, and in Assertions confirm’d by Oath. The Effect of which is, that a Person seems outwardly to affirm what he inwardly intends to deny, and so vice versa. A Practice by which the whole Use and Design of Speech is utterly perverted, no Man being sure in what Sense he ought to take the Words of another. Nor is the Invention less absurd than it is pernicious. For since Discourse was Originally introduced, as a Means of declaring what we conceive in our Minds; and since our Thoughts, so long as they do not come abroad, are of no manner of Use or Effect in Human Life; by what Authority can these secret Reserves, so repugnant to the common Custom of Mankind, take away that Effect which the uttering of Words would otherwise naturally produce?
 Thus much indeed is usual with us, to annex to a General Expression some Tacit Condition or Restriction, taken from the subject Matter, or some other Circumstances; by Means of which we dexterously adapt our Speech to the Business under Debate, and free it from Confusion or Inconvenience. But where would be the Reason, or where the Subtilty of my Proceeding? If for Instance, being ask’d, whether I have done such a Thing, I swear I have not done it, meaning another Thing, or the same at another time? Or if when a Man desires Money of me, I tell him, I have none; that is, none to give him? Or, if I promise that I will give it him; that is, meerly for Form and Fashions sake, so as to take it immediately again? ’Tis a foolish Argument which is urg’d to excuse such Persons from the Sins of Lying and of Perjury, That they do not indeed speak that particular determinate Truth which the Hearers apprehend, and which the Words imply, yet they speak another Truth of a different kind. As if it were at all satisfactory to my Question, to be told a Truth of any other different kind, and utterly foreign to the Business which I am now upon: Or as if a Man did at all promote my Purpose, or the Reason of my Enquiry; if when I ask of Chalk, he answers me of Cheese (e)! No less ridiculous is that other Plea, that if in these Cases, we put the open Speech, and the mental Reservation together, they will make an entire Proposition; which taken in that united sense, shall not be false: As for Instance, if I say,

(a) Vid. Senec. Troad. v. 597, &c. (b) 1 Sam. XXVII. 10. (1) Vid. Grot. ubi supra. (c) Vid. Theod. Hist. Eccles. l. 3. c. 9. (2) B. 3. c. 1. f. 11. n. 1. (d) Panathenaic. 486. Ed. Par. 1621. (3) See Mr. La Placette in his Treatise of a Lie, &c. C. 8, &c. (e) Add Mr. Pascal's Letters Provincial. Lett. 9.

I am not a Priest; keeping this Clause in my Mind, so as to be under any Obligation of telling you that I am; this whole Proposition taken together will be true, I am not a Priest, so as to be under any Obligation of telling you that I am. But in as much as Discourse was invented with regard to others, not that every Man should talk to himself; so the Truth or Falshood of it is measur'd according to that which we openly declare to those with whom we converse.

XV. That we are not guilty of Lying, tho' we speak a Thing which bears a wrong Signification, to Children or Persons out of their Senses, is generally asserted; and therefore 'tis thought very allowable (a). The Reason assign'd by Grotius (b) is, Because since such Persons have not the liberty of Judging, they cannot suffer Injury with respect to that liberty which they want. This Principle we do not take to be sufficient: for to speak chiefly of the Case of Infants, it is plain indeed, that they so far want the Faculty of Judgment, as simply and rashly to catch at any thing, spoken or represented to them in a wrong manner; not being able by Reasoning to distinguish Truth from Falshood: Yet since they make a part of Mankind, and on that account have a Right, not to be hurt by others, as they have likewise to receive the common Office of Humanity, and to be furnished with good Notions, particularly by their Parents, and those who have the Care of their Education (c), and are at least capable of apprehending what is easy and familiar; we are by all Means to hold, that they have thus far the same Right with Persons of advanced Age, that what ought to be shewn or declar'd to them, shall be propos'd in such manner as that they may understand it. But for as much as through the weakness of their Reason, and the strength of their Passions, they have scarce any Relish for plain Truths, therefore 'tis convenient to instruct them by Fables, and to keep them in Awe by false Terrors, 'till such time as they grow weary of Trifles, and are able to apprehend and to value the real Solidity of things. And thus we address to them by Fiction and Disguise, not to sport with their Ignorance, or to procure their Harm; but only because they cannot well be apply'd to in any more serious Method of Information, Strabo (d) is admirable on this Point; 'Not the Poets alone, says he,

but long before them Publick Societies and States made choice of the Art of Fables; and the Lawgivers themselves, in regard to the common Advantage, when they had first reflected on the Genius and Temper of Rational Creatures. For Man is led on with a most greedy Desire of Knowledge; and our Earthly Acquaintance with these feigned Relations, is the first step this Passion makes towards its own Satisfaction. Here Children begin their Information, and willingly improve their Stock, for the sake of communicating it to others. The Reason of all this is, because Fables do ever carry somewhat of Novelty in them, whilst they report not common and consistent Things, but what is very strange and unusual. But now whatsoever is thus new and surprizing, and what Men never heard of before, cannot fail to be sweet and agreeable: And 'tis this which breeds in them a covetous Sollicitude, and an Eagerness after farther Delight. In case the Story be wonderful and prodigious, this Delight is highly increas'd; which is the Bait that tempts the Young Learners to Industry and Study. It is fit therefore that they should at first be thus caught and insnar'd with Pleasures: but when they have attain'd to a more mature Age, they are to be disciplin'd and instructed in the Solid Knowledge of things; their Mind and Judgment being now strengthened and confirm'd, and they no longer standing in need of being flatter'd and humour'd in their Good (e). In the same manner it is very lawful to apply Fictions to Persons out of their Senses, in all such Cases where they are not capable of apprehending true Reason.

XVI. And indeed, all in general, upon whom we cannot by plain Speech obtain the good end we design, we may, without the Censure of lying, by feign'd Addresses, lead into a Mistake, for their own Interest and Safety. Nor is it needful to draw the Reason of this Practice from hence; 'That we may presume, in such a Case, the other Party will not think hard of our Trespas on his Liberty of Judgment; nay, that he will give us thanks for the Advantage he receives from it: and therefore what is done with his consent and approbation, can be no injury to him. For he had indeed a Right, that our Speech should procure him some Benefit, or deliver him from some Mischief; but not that it should produce the quite contrary Effect; which it would have done, had he understood the plain Business without Art or Colour. And therefore in these Cases, we ought as much to accommodate our Discourse to the Temper and Condition of the Hearer, as Physicians do their Medicines to the Patient's Strength and Constitution. Since then no Person can be said to have had a Right of hearing Words under such a Form as would have prov'd fatal to him, it cannot be properly affirmed, that there is any waving or remitting of Right in the present Case. And then for the Speaker, since he was on his part obliged to perform this Office through the mediation of Speech, either by the Law of Humanity, or by some stricter Engagement, 'tis manifest, that he cannot be bound to apply his Speech in such a manner as shall make it lose its End and Effect. Therefore all such feign'd Speeches, as either save and protect Innocence, appease Rage, assuage Grief, or procure any Benefit or Convenience to others, which could not have been obtain'd by direct and open Expressions, are not only to be exempted from the number of Lyes, but to be applauded as so many Instances of Wisdom (a). We have a famous Example of this proceeding in the Story of Rahab the Harlot, Josb. 11. 4. (1). And tho' Grotius observes on this place, that before the Gospel, a Lye which contributed to the preservation of Good Men, was not esteem'd faulty; and that therefore this Act is commended by the Apostles, Heb. 11. 31. and James 2. 25. as agreeable to the Times in which it was perform'd; yet 'tis our Judgment, that the same thing may even now be lawfully done, provided no Civil Obligation be prejudiced by it (b). To the same Head belongs the Case of those Commanders, who in the Heat of an Engagement raise the drooping Spirits of their Men by some False Insinuation or Report, on the strength of which Encouragement, they may force their way to Victory and Safety: Or those, who before a Battle, lessen and undervalue the Number of the Enemy (c). Though

I know not whether Agessilaus's Stratagem of this kind deserves commendation; who when he saw his Soldiers in some fright and concern at their being like to be overpowered by the opposite Forces, wrote in his Hand the Word VICTORY; and taking the Beast's Liver out from the Sacrificer, printed those Letters upon it, and then shew'd it to the Troops, as a Divine Promise of Success (d). For the same Reason Physicians are not to be accounted Lyars, when they perswade a nice or a froward Patient of the sweetness or mildness of what they apply for his Cure (e). The Conduct of Joseph is justifiable on the like account: who to work his Brothers to a serious Repentance for their Crime in selling him, and to judge how they stood affected towards his Father, and towards Benjamin, held them a long time in consternation and suspense, by Feigned Accusations (f). Lastly, that the Fables of the Poets, by which they insinuated Truth under a taking Disguise, are not to be condemn'd for Criminal Falsities, every one will easily admit (g). And thus far the Saying of Sophocles will hold good,

Δικαῖον ὡς ἔστιν ψῆμα οὐκ ἔστιν κερδὲς κερδόν. (b)

I judge no Speech amiss that is of Use.

XVII. The Governors of States may sometimes too very lawfully use a manner of Speaking not strictly true (2); inasmuch as their Counsels and Resolutions, if divulg'd, frequently come to nothing, or perhaps turn to the prejudice of the Commonwealth. And therefore when bare silence is not a sufficient Covering, they may veil their Designs with Feign'd Speeches, to divert the Curiosity of Inquisitive Men. Lying (says Plato (i)) is useful to Mankind only in the way of Physick; and therefore should be allow'd to Publick Physicians, but ought not to be touch'd by Private Patients. Princes and Governours (if any Persons else) may be permitted to use the same Stratagem, either for the ruin of the Enemy, the preservation of the Subjects, or any way for

In all appearance under those that are just and good. In Sophocles, (Philoctet. v. 108, 109. when Neoptolemus asks Ulysses, Don't you think it base to affirm a Falsity? His Answer is, No in case the Falsity be a means of Safety. Add. Frontin. Stratag. 1. 1. c. 11. 1. 2. c. 7. Polyæn. 1. 1. c. 33. Stratag. Of Leotyehides. Maxim. Tyrius. Dissert. 3. p. 29. Ed. Lugd. The bare telling the Truth is no such brave and comely thing, unless it be done to the benefit of those we are to instruct. Thus a Physician often deceives his Patients, a General his Soldiers, a Master of a Ship his Crew, and we censure neither of them upon this account. For in some Cases, a feign'd Story doth Men good, when the plain Truth would do them harm. (d) Plutarch Apoth. Lacon. p. 214. E. T. 2. Ed. Weck. (e) Liban. Declam. 29. p. 664. D. Ed. Paris. Morell. We see the Physicians beguiling their Patients Appetite with harmless Deceits. The same we ought to practise towards those who are in Health, so often as 'twould be better for them to be deceiv'd than to be truly inform'd. Yet I question whether the Artifice of Erasistratus, Physician to King Seleucus, in making him believe that his Son Antiochus was in love with his Wife, may be admitted into this number. the Advantage of the Community: But all others ought strictly to abstain from this Practice (1). A famous Instance we have in Solomon's Judgment, 1 Kings 3. 25. And so Claudius, in Sueton (a), brought a Woman to own her Son, whom she first, on probable Arguments, deny'd, by commanding her to marry him. Thus a Father and a Son being arraign'd together for murder of a Priest, when it could not be made out which of the two had committed the Fact, each refusing to accuse the other; Charlemagn, as we are told, gave Sentence of Death upon them both; upon which the Father confess'd himself the Murderer. So, it being a Law in Spain, That in case a Female Slave be with Child by her Master, she shall be immediately restor'd to Liberty: Once it happen'd that a Nobleman's Maid was discover'd to be in this Condition; the Nobleman denied the Thing, and the Proofs alludg'd not being evident, King Alphonso order'd the Child to be publicly sold into Servitude; the News of which Sentence mov'd the Father to discover himself (b). So when Neleus, being about to lead abroad a Colony, was commanded by the Southfayers, to purge his Army of all Polluted Persons; he pretended that he himself had murder'd a Child, and so stood in need of Expiation: and by this means perswading others to confess themselves guilty, he left all those behind him, whom he had thus convicted of Impurity (c). 'Tis a Proverb with the Spaniards, Tell a Lye, and you'll get out the Truth. To the same Head belongs the Dissimulation and Concealment about the Sickness or Death of Princes, for the prevention of Tumults. Though we are not willing to extend this Liberty so far as to justify the Politick Devices of Numa (d). Nor will the same Priviledge hold at all, in the Case of Promises and Engagements (e).

XVIII. But farther, Grotius (2) having thus asserted, That every Lye ariseth from the impairing of some Right which one Man may have to understand the Mind of another; concludes from hence, that we cannot be charg'd with this Fault, when we direct a Feign'd Discourse to one who is not deceiv'd by it, though a third Person should thence happen to entertain a wrong Opinion. For 'tis to be suppos'd that I, and he to whom I address'd my self, are transacting some private Business, which doth not at all belong to the Person who overhears us. Therefore the Man with whom I am dealing, is certainly not deceiv'd with my manner of Speech, because he well apprehends my Meaning by it; just as if I should relate a Fable, or use an Irony or Hyperbole to one who knew how to put the Right Construction upon the Words. And as for the third Man, I do not contract the Guilt of Lying in respect of Him, because I have no business with him, and consequently he hath no Right to understand my Sentiments. So that if he take up a false Notion, from Expressions applied to another Person, not to himself, he is to lay all the blame on his own Curiosity and Impertinence. But least this Position should be abused to ill purpose, we are to add, as a necessary Caution; that 'tis by no means allowable for two Persons to make use of such Occasions as these, by way of Stratagem to delude or expose a Third. For although it be never so true, that this Third Man hath not a perfect Right to know my Judgment, yet the Law of Humanity and Charity requires, that my Speech do not occasion his undeserved prejudice. Therefore we ought on all accounts to make this distinction, whether the Third Party overhears our Discourse without his own Fault, or whether either out of a busy or a malicious Humour, he purposely intrudes into our Secrets. And therefore this Assertion chiefly holds good against those Inquisitive Gossiping Knaves, who make it their Employment treacherously to catch up what other Persons drop in Private Company. Now when we apprehend our selves to be watch'd by such sly Designers, and yet are not inclin'd to be altogether silent, we are wont to disappoint their busy Curiosity, by throwing in a set of Talk quite impertinent to the Affair which we were before debating; or by agreeing to tell some Story, which our Politick Evesdropper hugging as a mighty Discovery, may, upon his communicating it to others, be sufficiently laugh'd at for his pains; provided neither he nor any Person else suffer any farther damage by this Contrivance. We know very well 'tis a general Duty, not to lessen the Honour and Reputation of others, nor to ridicule and expose them. Yet, as we do not think our selves guilty of any Sin, when we discover the Mistake of another, supposing it to be done without either Bitterness or Insolence, (things so unworthy of Men of Sense and Breeding,) although we should hereby rather diminish, in some respect, than improve his Credit: So what should hinder us from correcting a Fault in a Man's Morals, when it proves troublesome to us, even by Sport and Ridicule, that we may incline him to leave off the Habit? For to amend and reform others, cannot therefore be judg'd unlawful, because it tends to the Disparagement of their Worth and Excellency. Thus, since 'tis the common Interest of Mankind, that each Man should not understand the Secrets of all, it is establish'd, as 'twere by the general Consent of Nations, that seal'd Letters should be open'd by Him only to whom they are directed: therefore if I find any Person intercepting and searching my Letters, it can be no Crime if I contrive to let some Writing fall into his Hands, which shall give him no great satisfaction in the reading. As a greedy Boy who hath got a Trick of plundering the Cupboard, suffers no Injury, if amongst the other Provision he meets with a Bait not very sweet or savoury. It was a pleasant piece of Deception, that which Herodotus (a) reports of Nitocris or Semiramis, who order'd the following Words to be engraven on her Sepulchre, If any Babylonian Prince happens to be in great distress for Money, let him open this Tomb and take out as much as he pleaseth. King Darius afterwards removing the Stone, found no Treasure, but only this Rebuke, If thou hadst not been insatiably Covetous, thou wouldst never have plunder'd Coffins to enrich thee: Or, as Maximus Tyrius (b) gives the Story, All Curses follow thee, thou most greedy of Mankind; who for the sake of Gold, hast presum'd to disturb and violate the Dead. To give Credit to such Inscriptions is no more an Argument of Avarice, than of Folly. In the Story of Papyrius in Gellius (c) (1), the Senators rightly commend the Cause of the Young Gentleman's Fiction; that is, the Wit and Secrecy of so unexperienc'd Years; but adjudge the manner of it to be a little Undutiful and Disrespectful to his Mother; especially since the Jest occasion'd a Petition not much to the Honour and Credit of the Ladies, That one Wife should rather have two Husbands, than one Husband two Wives. Nor could I ever prevail with my self to be heartily angry with that Senator in Plutarch (d), who to divert his Wife's Importunity in asking about the Secrets of the House, told her a strange Tale of a Quail, said to be seen fly thro' the Forum, with a Golden Helmet. Though he ought indeed at the same time to have taken care that this Babbling Dame should not put others into a groundless Fright by her Report. For then the present Mistake, which lasted but an Instant, would have been sufficiently recompenc'd by the Diversion and Satisfaction which follow'd it. Now if we are bound to use Caution, that the Person whom we have justly and deservedly impos'd upon, should not deceive others; much less will it be allowable, to persuade one Man of what is false, with design that he may delude a third Person; although perhaps the former do not hereby suffer any particular Hurt. For indeed to be thus made the Instrument of deceiving another, is in it self mean and unworthy: and as for our part, 'tis the same thing, whether we abuse a Man immediately by our own Act, or by the Intervention of some Person else, whom we have suborn'd for that Service. Though 'tis an Art which many practice; first, to cheat those

XIX. This is manifest, that since the Obligation to disclose our Mind, ceaseth with regard to Enemies, it cannot fall under the Sin of Lying, to give them a feign'd Relation (2), to terrify them with False Rumours, or any way to procure their Prejudice, provided no undeserved Loss or Damage ensue to a Third Party who is our Friend. For why may not we by Stratagem and Subtlety, and without endangering our own Persons, hurt him whom we have Licence to attack with Open Violence? The Reason why some have disdain'd this Method of Hostility (3), was not because they thought any Right to be violated by it, but because among the most Fierce and Martial Souls, no Action against an Enemy is look'd on as Glorious, but such as carries in it some sort of Vigour and Force of Body and Mind. But what we speak about deceiving and circumventing an Enemy, is by no means to be extended to any Pacts or Treaties set on foot about concluding, or intermitting, the War. For since the Law of Nature commands us to maintain Peace as far as may be done with Convenience, and to repair any Breach that may happen in it, we must suppose our selves commanded at the same time, to use those Means without which this End can ne'er be obtain'd. But now Enemies cannot possibly come to an Accommodation, unless there be on both sides an Obligation to the clear Discovery of their Mind, in reference to what is transacted between them; and, consequently unless their Mutual Diffidence be remov'd by a Necessity and Engagement to speak the Truth in all Articles and Conditions of Peace. And when 'tis asserted as Lawful to delude or mischieve an Enemy, by any feign'd Report; this ought on no account to be carried so far as to justify the spreading of false Crimes and Imputations, in order to the impairing his Honour and Credit. The state of Hostility doth indeed license me to conceal my Meaning from my Foe, or by scattering false News to open my way to his Hurt. But he that goes about to charge an Enemy with any grievous Crime, and would have his Accusation believ'd by those who are at peace with him, must lay aside all the Stratagems and Deceits of War, and set up for an Assertor of plain Truths; and therefore with regard to those Persons, who are suppos'd to be his Hearers, he is to play the part of an Historian, or ordinary Relator. Whence, if he voluntarily recede from the Truth and Reality of Things, he cannot avoid the double Guilt of Lying and Slandering. Again, to charge an Enemy falsely to his Face, is a Mark of a low and impotent Reviler. To return Lies for Lies, is to imitate the Folly and Vanity of the Adversary (a). As for the Notion of Lipsius, in his Treatise of Politicks (b), who reckoning up the Persons towards whom we may be allowed to practice Simulation, or Dissimulation, joins Foreigners to Enemies; this ought no farther to be admitted, than as it is for our Advantage to hide our Designs or our Affairs from their Notice. For that we should by feign'd Speeches procure their Harm or Loss, is what Nature it self will not bear; on account of that Nearness of Blood by which all Mankind stand related and allied to each other.

XX. 'Tis a Question of more Difficulty, Whether a Criminal or an Offender arraign'd on any Account, may deny the Fact with which he is charg'd, or endeavour to elude the Accusation by feign'd Arguments, and yet not incur the Guilt of Lying. And here we do not speak of the Divine Tribunal, in respect of which the safest Course is, to fly immediately to humble Confession, and an earnest imploring of Pardon: since it would not be less Impiety than Folly, to use Excuses or Denials before an Omnipotent Judge. And 'twas on this Principle that Josua made the Exhortation to Achan, which we have in Josb. VII. v. 19, 20. For there the Criminal was before detected by the Hand of Heaven. The present Enquiry therefore is confin'd to Human Judgments; which are Principally design'd for these two Ends and Uses: First, that every Man may obtain what is his Right and Due: And Secondly, that fit Punishments may be inflict'd, for the Correction and Restraint, both of those who have dared with wicked Purpose, actually to Violate the Rights of others; and of those too, who by Reason of their cold Affection towards Justice, would have proceeded to the same Commissions, did they not dread the Suffering those Evils, which they have seen fall so heavily on other Offenders. Now, to decline the Severity of this Process, some think it by no means allowable, to make use of False Speeches. First, because the Judge hath an especial Right to understand the Truth. Wherefore neither the Sanctity of the Magistrate, who presides in the Name of God, nor the Necessity which the Subject lies under to Obedience, will give the least Place or Countenance to Contumacy or Circumvention. Besides, they say this Permission appears rather Dangerous, than Needful or Beneficial; inasmuch as conceal'd Crimes do the more Mischief. Especially if what is deliver'd in Excuse, be not only false in Fact, but in Theory; every such Untruth being of ill Consequence, not only consider'd by it self, but likewise in regard that one Error gives Occasion and Rise to an infinite Train of others. Yet the contrary Opinion is by many preferr'd; who say, we ought to distinguish in every Crime, between the Damage done, and the base Guilt or Commission; to the former of which, Restitution properly answers, and to the latter Punishment. By the Law of Nature every Man ought to make Restitution for Damage occasion'd by his Fault; and at the same time the suffering Party ought, upon his Sorrow and Reparation, to admit him to Pardon. Therefore every Guilty Person is, by an Obligation strictly so call'd, bound to be always ready to repair any Damage he hath caus'd.

But no Man is tied to offer up himself freely to Punishment, and to be an Informer against himself. So that if the Fact be not known, and an open Restitution would be a Confession of the Guilt, in this Case the Restitution is to be made in some Indirect and Secret manner. All Punishment must be inflict'd upon Men against their Wills; otherwise it could never obtain its due End, which is to deter the present Offender, and all other Persons from Sin. But whatever we lay under an Obligation to perform, is to be undertaken by our own free and voluntary Motion. Since then no Person is properly obliged to invite and call down Punishment on his own Head, (c) but must, indeed, as he is a Man, Naturally abhor it in the highest degree; especially if it tend to Death, or some other grievous Evil; there appears no reason, why he may not decline it any way possible, provided he do not hereby injure a Third Party (d). Nor can it much conduce to the Interest of a Commonwealth, that after Reparation hath been made for the Damage, any such Fact, as we now speak of should be punish'd; that is, a Fact not open and notorious, and which consequently might be disguis'd or excus'd by some Colour or Plea. Therefore, as none but a Fool will deny manifest Faults; so from what hath been here alledg'd, It seems allowable for a Man to wipe off an Imputation by a False Defence. Though for a Prisoner to urge False Opinions, can seldom turn to his advantage, the Court being suppos'd well skill'd in Right and Equity. A Judge indeed hath Power and Liberty to get out the Truth by any possible Means, in Case the Fact be of such consequence, that the Safety of the Publick absolutely requires it should be punish'd. And therefore he cannot be tax'd with Lying, if to bring the Party to a Confession, he make use of some Stratagem of Fiction: As suppose, by pretending that he hath receiv'd full information some other way, or by threatening that he will proceed to such or such Severities, if the Person accus'd persist in his Obstinacy, and the like (e). But it cannot hence presently be concluded, that the Criminal himself is bound to own the Charge: Because neither doth every Power which denotes the bare exercise of some Act, infer an Obligation in the Object towards which it is directed: And besides, there are other ways for the Judge to penetrate into the Business, as by Arguments and Witnesses, which Witnesses, when examin'd about the Crimes of others, are oblig'd, though unsworn, to declare the Truth, in obedience to the Command of Authority. Farther, Self-preservation is a thing which challengeth so much Favour and Allowance, that 'tis reckon'd odious to punish the most Notorious Offenders, without giving them a Hearing. On which account; no Person is blamed for casting any Veil or Colour over his Fault (a). The Divine Tribunal and the Human are not in all respects alike; nor doth a Mortal Judge preside with such Majesty and Authority as Almighty God. And if a Prisoner be not bound to make a voluntary Confession, his Denial cannot in the least impair that Obedience, which he owes to the Civil Power. 'Tis true, a Crime which hath been resolutely and stubbornly disown'd, commonly meets with the severer Punishment; because free Confession is generally a Sign of Penitence, which much lessens the Malignity of the Offender: Yet whether it be more advantageous cunningly to deny a Fact, or to embrace the Ingenuity of an Open Acknowledgment, is a Point which belongs to another kind of Enquiry, not to that which we are now engag'd in, and which confines it self to Matters of strict Duty, what a Man is bound to do, and what not. Which of these two Opinions ought to be chosen rather than the other, any Man will apprehend, who hath Judgment enough to weigh the Arguments offer'd on both sides. 'Tis very remarkable, that which Haytho reports in his History of the Tartars, c. 48. That although in other respects they are most notorious Lyars, yet in Two Things they strictly observe the Truth: First, That no Man among them arrogates to himself the glory of an Exploit which he really hath not perform'd: And Secondly, That whoever hath committed a Crime, though such as he knows will cost him his Life, when examin'd by his Lord, never conceals the Matter. And amongst the Japonese, to be discover'd in a Lye before the Judge, is a Capital Offence.

XXI. But 'twill be ask'd, What liberty may the Council, or the Advocate fairly take in this Case? Our Opinion is, that we ought here to distinguish between Civil Cases and Criminal. In the former it doth not appear that the Advocate can with a safe Conscience hinder the injur'd party from obtaining his Right, as soon as possibly he may. And therefore in such Controversies, we condemn as unlawful, not only false Allegations, and feigned Reasons, but likewise all dilatory Exceptions and Demurs; inasmuch as all these are a Let and Hindrance to the one Party from paying what he owes; and to the other from receiving what is due to him (b): But in Criminal Cases, where the Dispute regards only the Punishment, we judge it ought farther to be consider'd, whether the Council be assign'd by the Publick Authority, or by the particular Appointment of the Prisoner. If by the former, it doth not seem allowable for them to make use of feign'd Arguments, and false Colours; since the Design of the Court in deputing them, was only, that they might wipe off any Calumny thrown upon the Prisoner, and take care that he suffer no Injustice. Which End is sufficiently answer'd by a bare refutation of the Proofs offer'd by the Accuser. But he whom the Prisoner particularly chuseth and retains to plead in his behalf, since he only acts as his Client's Interpreter, may, in our Judgment, lawfully use the same Method of Defence, which the Prisoner might have used, had he answer'd for himself. He is under a very great Mistake, says Tully (c), that fancies he hath got our real Opinion and Authority for all that he meets with in our Judiciary Orations. Whatever we deliver'd on those Subjects is to be ascrib'd to the Causes, and to the Times, not to the Man, or to the Pleader. And in his Second Book of Offices, he maintains, sometimes to defend a guilty Person, is not contrary to any Duty of Religion. Nor is Justice in any great danger of suffering by this Permission: For, since the Judge is supposed fully to understand the Law, the Advocate by producing false Laws, or false Authorities, is not likely to prevail to any purpose: And he is never credited upon his bare Assertion, but oblig'd to produce sufficient proof. And therefore, if a guilty Person, do by this means sometimes escape unpunished, the Fault is not to be charged on the Advocate, or on the Prisoner, but on the Judge, who had not the Wisdom to distinguish between Right and Wrong: Yet Plato (d) would not grant even this degree of Indulgence in his Commonwealth. And the Ancient Egyptians held it for a certain Maxim, that the Harangues of the Lawyers very much darkned and perplex'd the Law (e). Especially since as Euripides (f) observes, Truth always speaks plain; and therefore doth not stand in need of the Windings and Turnings of Interpreters: Whereas, Unjust Speeches being always sick and weak in themselves, require strong and subtle Medicines for their support. 'Tis a saying of Pindar, Three Words are enough to set off a Good Cause. And Isocrates amongst his other Rules to Demonicus, adviseth him, Never to undertake in Court the Defence of a Wicked Man: For, says he, People will think you are inclined to those Practices your self, which you defend in others.

It is hence evident how far we may admit of Quintilian's Assertion; A Wise Man, says he, (a) is on some occasions allow'd the privilege of Lying: and an Orator, if he cannot otherwise bring the Judge to Reason and Equity, must necessarily apply himself to the moving his Affections. And again, (b) That which at the first Proposal appears so harsh and strange, may however be maintain'd upon reasonable Grounds; namely, that a Good Man in defending a Cause, may sometimes go about to perplex the Truth, and deceive the Judge. But the Instances which he offers requires a more strict Examination. First, he affirms that A Person arraign'd for plotting against a Tyrant, may be defended by false Allegations. And this is built upon the Grecian Hypothesis, which makes the killing of Tyrants lawful. Otherwise, to defend by feign'd Arguments, a Person guilty of Treason against the Prince to whom we have our selves sworn Allegiance, is therefore unlawful, because every Subject is bound to guard and preserve his Sovereign to his utmost Ability. Whereas the desire or endeavour of sheltering a Conspirator from Just Punishment, would be utterly inconsistent with that Obligation. He proceeds to urge, What if a Judge should be about to condemn a Man for some Good Actions, unless we can prove the Actions not to have been perform'd, shall not the Orator who appears in his behalf be allow'd the use of such means, to preserve this Innocent, and what is more, this worthy and commendable, Member of the State? But indeed such a Case as this can hardly be suppos'd. For nothing ought to be honour'd with the Name of a Good Action, but what is agreeable to the Laws of the Commonwealth. And it doth not appear how any Man should be brought into Judgment for such a Performance. Let us Imagine therefore, that a Person by some Good and Noble piece of Service hath incurr'd the Envy of Wicked Men, and that these Wicked Men have afterwards got possession of the Seat of Justice. Here if the Fact were openly known, and an Accusation brought against him for it, 'twould signifie nothing to disown it. As 'twould have been idle for Cicero, had he been arraign'd for putting to death the Associates of Catiline, to deny the Charge. But if the Fact may still be dissembled with some colour and probability, there's no reason why an Innocent Prisoner may not be defended by feign'd Arguments before a Wicked Judge. As for the other Instance of Quintilian, When a Man is to dissuade some Undertaking, just indeed Naturally, and in it self, but in the present juncture of Affairs disadvantageous to the State: there's no need he should endeavour by false Reasons to prove those Just Things to be Unjust; but 'tis sufficient for him to shew, that what may justly be done, is not always necessary to be done; and that the Times now require us to chuse what is Useful and Profitable, rather than what, in Strictness may seem more Commendable and Right: and all this may be urged without receding from the Truth. Another Case propos'd by Quintilian is, "When an Orator hath good Hopes of the Criminal's future Reformation. And this indeed may prevail with him to be the more willing to lend the Prisoner all his Parts and Cunning in order to his Deliverance, because he is assur'd that 'twill not be to the Prejudice of the Publick, that such a Person should go unpunish'd. But to rescue a good Commander from suffering for a manifest Crime, when his Life is Necessary for the Honour and Success of the State, the best Expedient is, not to have Recourse to Falshood and Fiction, but rather to take that plain and open Method which Tully tells us (c) was us'd by Antoninus the Orator, in his Defence of M. Aquilius."

CHAP. II.

Of an OATH.

WE proceed to examine and state the Nature of an Oath, which is judg'd to add great Strength and Confirmation to our Discourse, and to all our Acts which have any Dependence upon Speech: which though we might have treated of very properly and conveniently hereafter, when we come to explain the Enforcements of Pacts and Covenants; yet we chose to assign it this particular place rather than any other, because the Custom of Swearing is us'd for the Establishment and Security, not only of Covenants, but of bare Affirtions. (To which purpose it may, not impertinently, be observ'd, that amongst the Jews no Oaths nor Vows were esteem'd Obligatory, but such as were openly deliver'd in words (a).) An Oath the very Heathens look'd on as a thing of so great Force, and of so sacred Authority, that they believ'd the Sin of Perjury to be pursued with the severest Vengeance; such as extended it self to the Posterity of the Offender, and such as might be incurr'd by the bare Thought and Inclination without the Act (b). Thus Diodorus Siculus (c) reports of the Egypt- tians, That by their Laws Persons who had forsworn themselves, were adjudg'd to Capital Punishment; as guilty of the two greatest Crimes, in violating that Piety which they ow'd to God; and in destroying Faith from amongst Men, the strongest Pillar of Human Society.

II. An Oath then, is a Religious Affeuration, by which we either renounce the Mercy, or imprecate the Vengeance of Heaven, if we speak not the Truth. That this is the Sense and Purport of Oaths, appears from those Forms of words in which they are commonly express'd, As so help me God; God be my Witness; God be my Avenger, and other Equivalent Terms, which amount to much the same. For when a Superior, who hath a Right of Punishing is appeal'd to as a Witness, his Vengeance is likewise invoked in Case of Breach of Faith (a); and God who knows all Things, being ever a Witness, is ever an Avenger. Nor can a more grievous Punishment light upon Mankind, than their losing all Title to the Protection and Assistance of Providence. Yet when we say that God is invoc'd as a Witness in Swearing, it ought on no account to be hence infer'd, that an Oath should be look'd on as the Testimony of God; or as if God himself gave Attestation to the Veracity of the Swearer; which seems to be the Opinion of Bp. Sanderfon (b). But when an Omniscient and Omnipotent Being is call'd to be both a Witness, or Guarantee, and likewise an Avenger, we therefore presume upon the Truth of what is deliver'd, because we cannot conceive any Person to be arriv'd at such a pitch of Impiety, as lightly to stir up the Divine Vengeance against himself. And hence Perjury appears to be a most Monstrous Sin, inasmuch as by it the forsworn Wretch shews, that he at the same time contemns the Divine, and yet is afraid of Human Punishment; that he is a daring Villain towards God, and a sneaking Coward towards Men (c). The Scope, and Meaning of Oaths is likewise suggested by the End for which they have been introduc'd: And that is, that Persons might be the more firmly engag'd to declare the Truth, or to perform their Promises, by the just Awe and Dread of the Divinity, infinite in Knowledge, and infinite in Power; whose Wrath they thus invite down upon their own Heads, if they knowingly deceive: whereas perhaps there would not have been Force and Security enough in the Fear of Men, whose Strength they might fancy themselves able to baffle or to decline; or whose Discovery they might hope to escape (d). For in Cases where the Party with whom we transact, if he deceive us after his bare Word or Promise, cannot possibly lie conceal'd, nor avoid Human Punishment, it seems superfluous to put him to his Oath. 'Tis the Advice of Demosthenes (e), Those who escape your Justice, leave to the Vengeance of the Gods; but those on whom you can lay hands, never consign over to Providence, without punishing them your selves. And for this Reason we should judge it to be an Absurdity in the Civil-Law (f), when, on the contrary, it allows a Woman to swear that she is not with Child. This Caution will appear to have the more weight, if we consider that the too frequent use of Oaths, doth in many Persons much impair the Reverence due to them. It was an Excellent Lesson which Pythagoras gave his Scholars; Very rarely and very hardly to be brought to an Oath, but if they had once sworn, most inviolably to observe it. Nor is Isocrates's Precept on the same Subject to be despis'd; Never swear, saith he, on the account of Money, though you could do it with the greatest Safety and Assurance; least you draw upon your self a double Imputation of Perjury with some, and of Avarice with others (g).

But as 'tis just and Right to pay the most Religious Reverence to Oaths, so is it vain Presumption to expect or desire, that their Truth or Falshood should be evinc'd by an immediate Miracle; as if God were oblig'd to exercise his Judicial Office, at the Pleasure and Humour of Men. And yet this was a Superstition which very much obtain'd of old, not only amongst the Heathens, but in the

(a) Plutarch. Quæst. Roman. 44. observes, That every Oath terminates in the Curse of Perjury; or, that is the Ground and Bottom upon which all Swearing depends. In the same place enquiring into the Reasons why the Flamen Dialis amongst the Romans was not allow'd to swear, he delivers himself to this Purpose. Was it because an Oath is a kind of Torture, or the only Force that may be applied to the Souls of free Subjects: Whereas the Priest ought to be exempt from all Violence, as well in Mind as in Body. Or because every Oath terminates in the Curse of Perjury: Whereas all Cursing is Ominous and Unlucky; which is the Reason that the Priests are forbidden by the Laws, to use Imprecations towards others? And indeed the Conduct of the Athenian Priest was commended, who being order'd by the People to devote Alcibiades with the usual Ceremonies, refus'd, alledging, That his Business was to preside in good Wishes, not in Bad. Or, was it because the Guilt of Perjury might turn to be the Danger of the Publick, if an impious forsworn Wretch were to offer Vows and Prayers in Behalf of the State, and to perform the Offices of Religious Worship?

In Sophocles, Oedip. Colon, Oedipus thus bespeaks Theseus, p. 293.

Ignorant

Ignorant and Barbarous Ages amongst Christians themselves. Sophocles (a) (1) plainly speaks of the Fiery Ordeal;

ἡμεν δ' ἔτοιμοι καὶ μύθους αἶψαν ἔχειν, &c.

Prepar'd we stood to lift the Burning Steel,
To tread the Flames, and by all Heaven to swear.

'Tis Remarkable what Phil. Baldeus in his Treatise of the Idolatry of the Indians (b), reports of the Malabars, That amongst them, the Person who is to take a Purgative Oath, hath his Three first Fingers dipt in Melting Butter, and then wrapt up in Leaves, which three Days after are uncover'd to see the Effect. Others are order'd to swim over a River between Colchis and Cranganor, full of Crocodiles: Others to reach an Apple out of a Pot stuf't with Serpents, and by the Success of these Attempts a Judgment is made of their Innocence (c).

And, indeed, if we would confess the Truth, Oaths either infer or presuppose the Diffidence, Unfaithfulness, Ignorance and Impotency of Mankind. For what need would there be of such Engagements, if we could securely rely on the Faith and Constancy of others; or, if there were no Examples extant of Perfidiousness; or, if we had Strength enough to compel Persons to make good what they owe? Lastly, what Occasion would the Judge have to enquire the Truth of Sworn Witnesses, unless he were ignorant of it himself? And from this Principle I should draw the Reason of that Speech of the Emperor Frederick in the Poet (d),

Regis inesse solet, quovis juramine major.*

The Sacred Awe that guards a Prince's Word, Hath stronger Tyes than strictest Oaths afford.

Not only because to have Faith and Honesty kept up inviolably in the World, is in the highest manner the Interest of Princes; but likewise because 'tis unbecoming their Majesty, to seem liable to the least suspicion of Perfidiousness, Falshood, or Deceit. Thus we are told, that amongst the old Peruvians, Oaths were not at all in use; but the Persons who were to give their Testimony, barely promised they would confess the Truth to the Ynca (e).

III. Since GOD alone is of Infinite Knowledge, and of Infinite Power, the Absurdity is manifest of Swearing by any thing which we do not look upon as Divine; in such a Sense as to invoke it for a Witness of our Speech, and for an Avenger of our Perjury. Hence as it was usual for the Heathens to swear by the Stars, because they judg'd them to be so many Deities; so for a Christian to imitate them in that Practice; would be a mixture of Impiety and Folly. As for those Forms attributed to some of the Ancients, as that of Socrates, by a Dog, by a Goose, (whatever Porphyry (f) pretends to the contrary,) and by the Plane-tree, that of Zeno, by a Caper; and that of others, by Crambe (g), we are to esteem them merely Jocular. They swore by these, as Apollonius (h), not as by Gods, but to avoid Swearing by the Gods; when by the practice of the generality of Men, it was grown into an Ill Custom, to apply Oaths as the Supplemental Ornament of Speech.

But that which was most in use by the Ancients, was to swear by those Things which each Person held most dear, or set uppermost in his Veneration and Esteem. So Ascanius in Virgil,

Æn. IX. v. 300.
By this my Head; my Father's Oath before.

So we every where read of Persons swearing by their own Life and Soul, and by the Life and Soul of those Friends who stood first in their Affections. And the Lovers thought themselves very Religious in swearing by the Bright Eyes, the Sweet Lips, the Golden Tresses of their Mistress. (i) All which Speeches are by no means to be interpreted in this Sense; either that those things were invoked as Witnesses and Avengers of Falshood, as Apuleius (k) amongst others believed; nor that they were cited to give Testimony under the Notion of belonging to God, and expressing somewhat of the Divinity, namely his Truth, Goodness and Power, and which the Person thus swearing hereby acknowledgeth, that he enjoys by God's Mercy; and that he is unwilling to lose by God's Justice; as if he should say, I swear by my Life; that is, by God to whom I owe my Life; which is the Opinion of many, and particularly of Bishop Sanderson (l). But they only thus invoc'd GOD himself, desiring that if they swore falsely, he would be pleas'd to punish their Crime in those things especially, for which they were most nearly and tenderly concern'd (a). Thus it was the ordinary Custom of the Athenians, in their Solemn Oaths to devote themselves and their Family to Destruction, if they deceiv'd; and on the contrary to beg all happiness from the Gods on themselves and Friends, if they swore truly: as is evident from frequent Instances in Demosthenes (b). And they firmly believ'd, that the violation of such Engagements would draw down the Anger of Heaven upon the Heads of others, as well as upon their own. Pliny (c) tells a Story of one Regulus, who made a gainful Trade of Perjury, in relation to Wills and Testaments; that, giving a Visit to a sick Lady, (Verania, Wife to the Famous Piso.) and persuading her that by his Astrological Observations he foresaw she should recover: The Lady being easily credulous under so great an apprehension of danger, call'd for her Will, and set down Regulus for her Heir; but soon after falling into Extremities, she dy'd with this Exclamation against her Deceiver; O wicked and perfidious! O worse than perjurd Villain, who forswore himself by the life and safety of his own Son! The Reflection which Pliny makes on the thing, is this; Regulus useth this Stratagem not more frequently than wickedly; whilst he imprecates the wrath of the Gods, whom he every day deceives, upon the Head of the unfortunate Youth (d).

And hence too we may gather the Meaning and Design of those Oaths, which were heretofore made by the Life, the Genius, the Safety of Princes; which we are told are still customary amongst the Persians, and are esteemed more strict and sacred, than those in which the Name of God is immediately invoked. For they did this, not as thinking there was any Divinity in their Princes, whilst alive, nor as imprecating their Displeasure if they spoke false; but because many of them either in good earnest, or at least in Flattery, intended hereby to shew, that they prefer'd their Prince's safety to their own; and therefore look'd upon it as a more horrid Perjury to devolve the Wrath of God upon Him, than upon Themselves. So that the Sense of those Protestations was properly this; So may my Prince be happy and safe, as I perform what I now promise; that is, unless I fulfil my Engagement, I desire the Divine Judgments may light upon my Prince's Head. St. Augustin (e) speaks very pertinently to this purpose. What else, saith he, is that which we call (Jurare) to swear, but (Jus reddere) to pay the Due or Right; to God, if we swear by God; to our Children, if we swear

by them? And what Right do we owe to our own Safety, to our Children, or to our God, but the Right of love and of truth, not of Treachery and Falshood? When any Man says, by my Safety, he pawns and engageth his safety to Providence, for the truth of what he affirms; when he says, by my Children, he consigns over his Children as so many pledges to God; desiring, that whatever comes out of his own Mouth may fall upon their Head; Truth, if he declares Truth; Falshood, if he speaks falsely. Whatsoever therefore a Person names in his Oath, whether his Children, his own Life or Safety, or any thing else, he devotes and binds it over to Almighty God. And hence, altho' Philo the Jew, is justly to be prais'd for condemning rash and profane Swearing, yet we can by no means approve of his Doctrine, when he delivers himself so loosely, as in the following Terms: (f) *If, says he, the exigency of Affairs, necessarily requires an Oath, it is more becoming to swear by the Health or the prosperous age of our Father or Mother, if alive; or by their Happy Memory, if they are dead. For their Act of producing their Children into life from nothing, makes them the Images and Representatives of the Divine Nature. They too deserve Commendation, who as often as they are urged to swear, by delaying and hesitating, strike an awe, not only into the Spectators, but into those very Persons who require the Oath at their hands. For 'tis a custom with some, when they have pronounced the first Words of the Form, So help me, to leave off abruptly, adding what they please besides in their Mind and Thoughts. For the Sentence may be fill'd up by subjoining, not only the Highest, or the Creator of all things, but the Earth, the Sun, the Heavens, or the World. Nor do I see any Excuse that can be brought to justify that Oath of the Christian Soldiers, recited by Vegetius (g), which carries in it too gross an excess of Reverence towards the Emperors. They swear, says he, by God, and by Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, and by the Emperor's Majesty, which next to God is to be loved, and to be worship'd by Mankind. For when our Prince hath been once invested with the Title of Augustus, we are to pay to him as to a present and Mortal God, Faithful Devotion, and most watchful Service. For though we should grant the following Clause, A Civil or a Military Person then serves God, when he faithfully loves him who reigns by God's Appointment and Authority; yet this is by no means a Reason why they should swear by the Majesty of the Emperors in the same manner as by the Name of God.*

And I am not yet arriv'd at so desperate a degree of misery, nor am so unreasonably covetous of Money, as that I should be willing to devote my Family to a Curse, only that I may leave them a Maintenance; or by an Unnatural Wickedness to rob my Father of his Estate.*

And here likewise it may be remarked by the by, that the Banjans in India, who set the highest Value and Respect on their Cows, esteem it a most Sacred Oath to hold a Knife near the Cow, and say, If what I affirm be false, or, if I do not perform my Bargain, may the Cow be struck through with this Knife, Pietr. della Valle Itin. Part 2. Epist. 1

(e) Citat a Grotius in Flor. Sparf. ad l. 23. D. de jurejur. (f) De special. legib. (g) De re militari l. 11. c. 5.

Nor is it to be supposed that Common Soldiers should be capable of so much Subtilty, as to distinguish the Word (by) in the same Form into two different Senses, one as apply'd to God, another as spoken of the Emperor. This is certain from Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, (a) that to swear by the Fortune of the Emperor, was accounted one of the Marks of abjuring Christianity; which therefore St. Poly-carp resolutely refus'd to the last. And so too it may be justly question'd whether we ought to approve of that Oath prescribed by Charles Gonzaga, to his New Order of Knights, in the Form following; I swear by the Immortal God, and by the Ancient Nobility which I profess (b). Hence likewise it appears, that the Ancients had good reason for punishing with the utmost severity Persons who had forsworn themselves by their Princes Life or Safety; inasmuch as they were thought hereby to make him obnoxious to the Divine Punishment, whose success and preservation is yet so closely connected to the publick security (c). Thus we find the Scythians in Herodotus (d), as often as their King happen'd to be sick, making strict enquiry whether any of the Subjects had sworn falsely by the Royal Throne; and if such a Person was discover'd, he suffer'd Death for his Perjury. In Zozimus (e) the Roman Magistrates declar'd they could not accept of the Proposals of Alaric, though fair and just, because they had sworn by the Life of their Prince, that they would never consent to a Peace with the Invader. If their Oath had been directed to God, they say, they might possibly have wav'd it in this necessity, relying on the Divine Mercy for the pardon of so Impious a Crime; but since they had bound themselves by the Life of the Emperor, they thought it absolutely unlawful for them to break through so solemn an Engagement. In the Capitulary of Charles the Great, (f) we find a Prohibition against swearing by the Life of the King, or of his Sons. As to the Civil-Law, Ulpian (g) doth not deny it to be an Oath, when a Man swears by his own safety; but says, it is not valid, unless it were expressly propos'd to him in those particular terms (h). Because Oaths being taken for the Benefit and Security of him that requires them; therefore Custom makes it necessary they should be form'd in the Words which he proposeth, so that they may fully bear his Meaning and answer his Design (i). Whereas if the party who is to swear might chuse his own Words, he would have an opportunity by invidious or equivocal Expressions, to evade the force of his Obligation. Another Reason for Ulpian's Assertion may be, because, such Speeches and Protestations continually losing somewhat of their Reverence by daily use, no Man can be bound to let the Trite Form of another party (with which he often lards his Discourse when he doth not think on't,) pass for a Serious and Solemn Oath. And Mr. Hobbes (k) is in the right, when he censures these Customary Expressions, as not properly Oaths, but profane abuses of the Name of God, arising from an Ill Habit of being too positive and vehement in Talk.

From what hath been offer'd it is clear, that Execrations, although strictly taken; as when a Man barely lays Curses or imprecates Mischief on himself or others, they are not Oaths; yet are on all accounts to be reckon'd part of an Oath, as they respect any Assertion or Promise, which they are added to bind (l). And this is to be extended likewise to those Prayers or Wishes by which a Man makes the performance of his Oath the Condition of his obtaining such or such a Blessing. As that of the Boy in Ælian, (m) So may I crack Timostias's Skull. Thus we find Julian to encourage his Army, constantly swearing (as the Historian speaks,) (n) not by the Graces, but by the Greatness of his Commenc'd Exploits; So may I bring the Persians under the Yoke; so may I relieve the weak condition of the Roman World. As Trajan is reported sometimes to have confirm'd his Speeches, by adding, So may I see Dacia reduc'd into the Form of a Province; So may I lay Bridges over the Danube and Euphrates (o). 'Tis remarkable in the Patanes, a People of Indostan, that they are so extravagantly proud, as to use for an asseveration, May I never come to be a King in Dehli, if I don't make good my Promise. And hence too it appears what Interpretation we ought to put on those Oaths which we meet with in Scripture, when even good and pious Men swear by some Created Thing (p). That amongst the Jews of the latter Ages, nothing was more common than Oaths, by the Head, by Heaven, by the Temple, by the Gold of the Temple, by the Altar, by the Gift upon the Altar, is evident from St. Matth. 23. v. 16. &c. Where our Saviour reproves them severely for their profane abuses, and impertinent cavils in this matter. The ἄνθρωπος οὐρανῶν in Homer (q), Didymus thus expounds, We are to know, says he, that in swearing by the Sceptre, they swear by God himself, the great Governor and Controller of Kingdoms (r). Yet Ovid hath given us another sort of an Explication:

Per sceptrum; sceptrum non putat esse Deos.* (a).

Who by his Sceptre swore Briseis free,
Ne'er took the Wood to be a Deity.

We learn from Procopius (b), that the Persians, in the latter Times of that Nation, used to swear by Salt. And in one of the Byzantine Historians, we find Mabomet the Turkish Emperor adjuring by Bread and Salt, his Vizier Bajazet (c).

IV. To proceed: That part of the Form in Oaths under which God is invoc'd as a Witness, or as an Avenger, is to be accommodated to the Religious Perswasion which the Swearer entertains of God: It being vain and insignificant to compel a Man to swear by a God whom he doth not believe, and therefore doth not reverence. And no one thinks himself bound to the Divine Majesty in any other Words, or under any other Titles, than what are agreeable to the Doctrines of his own Religion; which in his Judgment, is the only true way of Worship. * And hence likewise it is, that he who swears by False Gods, yet such as were by him accounted True, stands oblig'd; and if he deceives, is really Guilty of Perjury. Because whatever his peculiar Notions were, he certainly had some sense of the Deity before his Eyes; and therefore by wilfully forswearing himself, he violated as far as he was able, that Awe and Reverence which he ow'd to Almighty God (d). Yet when a Person requiring an Oath from another, accepts it under a Form agreeable to that Worship which the Swearer holds for True, and he himself for False, he cannot in the least be said, hereby to approve of that Worship. Thus a Christian when he admits of the Oath of a Jew, doth on no account subscribe to his Opinion, who denies the One only True God, the Maker of Heaven and Earth, to be the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Yet I doubt whether the Example of this Case, alledg'd by Grotius (e), from Gen. c. 31. v. 53. comes up to the Purpose; For the God of Abraham, and the God of Nabor, and the God of the Fathers, was the Living and True God (f).

V. But farther, it is requisite to the Force and Obligation of an Oath, that it be taken with deliberate Thought, and real Design.
And therefore he shall by no Means stand bound, who not thinking himself to swear, hath happen'd to utter Words which imply an Oath; or who hath barely recited the Form; or who being by Virtue of some Office, appointed to give other Persons their Oath, tells them how they shall speak after him (g).

In this Case, Lucian's Saying will hold good,
We are not to consider his Mouth, but his Heart (h). It was vain therefore in Cydicpe to fancy her self Religiously oblig'd, by reading the Oath which Acontius had wrote upon the Apple.
And so indeed Ovid (i) hath taught her to argue,

*Quæ jurat, mens est; nil conjuravimus illa.
Illa fidem dictis addere sola potest.
Consilium prudensque animi sententia jurat,
Et nisi judicii vincula nulla valent.
Si tibi nil dedimus præter sine pectore vocem,
Verba suis frustra viribus orba tenes.
Non ego juravi; legi jurantia verba. &c.*

The Mind must swear; with that we never [swore;
Yet that alone can add a binding Power.
Oaths are the Act of Wisdom and of Thought; Words give the Thread, but Judgment ties the [Knot.
Since all we said an Empty Sound we prove,
Sound without Sense hath lost its Force to [move.
We did not take, we did but read the Form,

But 'twould be most senseless and absurd,
If a Man designing to swear, or at least pretending such a Design, should yet refuse to be ty'd by what he says; and should urge in Excuse, that when the Oath was administer'd to him, his Intention was barely to recite the Formal Words, but not to lay any Obligation on his Conscience (2). Not so much (if we consider the immediate Reason,) because Obligation is the necessary Effect of an Oath, and inseparable from it; as because otherwise the whole use of Oaths, nay and the whole Method of engaging each other by mutual Signs would be banish'd out of Human Life; if any Person might be able by his secret Intention to hinder an Action from obtaining such an Effect as it was first instituted to produce.
Therefore, whatever your inward Purpose might be, you shall certainly be bound by your Oath, when both the Party to whom you swore, apprehended this to be your Meaning and Design, and you your self when you utter'd the Words, evidenc'd by all outward Tokens, that you were in Earnest, and not in Jest. And 'tis indeed a downright Contradiction, to desire to take an Oath, and yet not to be oblig'd by the Oath; to desire to promise, and not to be bound by your Promise; to desire to utter Words in a serious manner, and yet not to let them bear that Use and that End which hath been assign'd them by the common Agreement of Men. Thus 'twas grossly ridiculous for the Milanese to tell Frederick the First, We swore indeed, but we did not promise to keep our Oath (a). And 'tis much to the same Effect, what Father Paul reports in his History of the Council of Trent (b); That during the Vacancy of the Holy See, the Cardinals are wont to draw up a Form consisting of so many Heads, for the Reformation of the Papal Government, which each of them swears he will exactly observe, in case the Election falls on him. Though the Experience of all Ages testifies, that not one of them so stands to the Engagement; inasmuch as immediately after their being chose Popes, they declare, that either they could not be tied by any such Bond; or that their very Investiture with that Dignity quite releases them from the Obligation. If therefore any Person shall pretend that he took an Oath with such a preposterous Design, the Excuse shall avail nothing towards reversing what he promis'd, but shall pass for meer Trifling. We may illustrate the Case by a like Instance: A Person who hath his Doctor's Degree conferr'd on him in the Schools, is nevertheless a Doctor, though we should suppose that he who pronounc'd the Form of his Promotion, thought all the while of dignifying an Ass. But if a Player upon the Stage invest another with the Habit and Formalities of that Degree, he shall be just as much a Doctor as he was before. Ipsa statim scena rem fictam esse testatur, as Quintilian (c) observes on a like Occasion; The Place shews the Action to have been Insignificant. Whence we see that 'tis an idle Question, Whether a Person be oblig'd, who deliberately utters the Words of an Oath, yet with an Intention not to swear? For if he barely rehears'd the Words without any farther Purpose, 'tis plain he hath neither sworn nor is oblig'd. But when the Matter hath been perform'd in Earnest; that is, when he who spoke the Words, gave all Proofs of his real Design to swear, and the other Party understood him in that Sense, no doubt but the Oath is properly taken, and the Obligation contracted, whatever secret Drift the Swearer might entertain in his own Mind.

VI. We ought likewise carefully to observe, that Oaths do not of themselves, produce a new and peculiar Obligation (1), but are only applied as an additional Bond to an Obligation in its Nature Valid before. For whenever we swear, we always suppose some Matter, upon Non-performance of which, we thus im-precate the Vengeance of Heaven. But now this would be to no purpose, unless the Omision of the thing suppos'd, had been before unlawful, and consequently unless we had been before oblig'd. Though indeed it frequently happens, that we comprehend in one Speech both the principal Obligation, and the additional Bond of the Oath; as for Instance, if I say, So God be my Helper, as I shall pay you an Hundred Pounds. And yet it doth not follow, that an Oath is unnecessary or superfluous, because it is thus added to an Obligation before firm and good in it self. For although all Men, except Downright Atheists, believe, that God will punish the Violation of Promises, not confirm'd by Oath; yet they believe at the same time, and with good Reason, that those Wretches will feel a more severe Vengeance, who have in express Terms call'd down the Wrath of God upon themselves, and so far as in them lies have shut themselves out from all Hopes of Mercy; whilst they engag'd in Wickedness with so full a Purpose and Design, as to shew, that they valued not the Displeasure of him who is able to bestow the greatest Goods, and to inflict the greatest Evils. Whence we may conclude, that those Acts which were before attended with some inward Flaw hindring any Obligation to arise from them, cannot be rendred obligatory even by the Addition of an Oath. As neither can a prior Obligation truly valid, be disannul'd by a subsequent Oath, or the Right which it gave another Person, be revers'd. Thus for a Man to swear that he will not pay a just Debt can be no Prejudice to the Claim of the Creditor.

VII. And hence too it follows, that since in Promises and Pacts, Consent grounded upon Mistake, is not Effectual towards producing an Obligation, therefore an Oath is not binding, in Case it be Evidently made out, that the Person who swore suppos'd some Matter to be otherwise than it really proves to be; and which if he had not thus suppos'd, he would not have taken the Oath: especially, if his Mistake was caus'd by the Deceit of the Party to whom he swore. For here the Point suppos'd was in the Nature of a Condition, which failing, all that was built upon it falls of course. Thus if a Person brings me some very welcome News from a remote place, in Consideration of which I solemnly swear to reward him; in case I afterwards find his Relation to have been false, my Oath shall hold no Tie upon me. Grotius (d) adds, If it be doubtful whether a Man would not have sworn although he had not been thus mistaken, then he shall stand to his Oath. Because Simplicity and plain Meaning are the most agreeable attendants of Oaths, and all Tricks and Evasions are strictly to be banish'd from them: And likewise, because

The Promise was not built on that Mistake only, though such a false Prospect might be the Occasion of its being express'd in larger Terms. But this doth not clearly settle the Case; for who shall be the Judge whether in this Case, abstracting from the Mistake, the Promise would have been nevertheless made? Certainly, not the Party towards whom the Oath was address'd: For how is it possible he should be able rightly to discern what mind the other Person would have been of, upon supposal of such or such a Condition? But neither can the Person who swore give a full Determination of this Difficulty; since we are not wont to be equally pleas'd with the same things propos'd at different times, or at the same time in different manners. It seems probable therefore that even such an Oath is not valid; at least, so far as it is founded upon Mistake. Yet if the Party who made it, thinks he shall pay some kind of Regard to the Honour of God, in not receding from it altogether, he ought to judge by the Condition of his Affairs, how far he may conveniently go in the Performance. And whilst we are speaking of this Case, it will not be improper, to make a Reflection or two on the Oath which Joshua perform'd to the Gibeonites (a). Where we may first observe, that the Subtlety used by that People was not culpable, nor did fall under the Notion of a Lie strictly so term'd. For who will blame a Man for endeavouring by some Fiction of Speech to preserve his Life from an Enemy bent upon his Destruction? Nor, properly speaking, was this Stratagem the Cause of any Damage to the Israelites: For what doth a Man lose by being hinder'd from shedding the Blood of another Person, whom he may nevertheless spoil of all his Possessions, and drag into perpetual Servitude, so weaken'd and disarm'd, as to be incapable of future Opposition or Resistance? The whole Point therefore turns upon this Question, Whether or no it was the express Command of God, that they should kill all and each of the Inhabitants of Canaan, without Distinction; even such as should voluntarily Submit to their Yoke, and from whom they could apprehend no Danger hereafter? If this be absolutely affirm'd, Joshua's Oath was void. For then, the only use of it would have been to evade a Divine Injunction: That is, Joshua would have invoc'd God to punish him if he did not break his Command. Nor can it be urg'd, that Joshua was therefore willing to keep his Oath, least it should somewhat abate the Awe and Reverence towards the Divine Majesty, in those Nations, to see him break a Covenant which he had call'd God to attest. For the Inconvenience in this respect would have been the same, had he neglected to put the Divine Command in Execution. Grotius (b) therefore is of Op-

nion that the Order in Deut. 7. 2 and 20. 16. is to be understood with this Limitation, unless any People should submit upon the first Summons; which he urgeth many Reasons to confirm (1). Mr. Selden likewise has shewn at large (c), that the utter Slaughter and Extirpation of those People, was rather a Permission to the Israelites than a Command. And others think this the more Probable, because the Reason assign'd for that Commission against the Canaanites was, partly lest the Israelites should imitate their Idolatry, being then strangely prone to foreign Superstition; and partly lest the ancient Inhabitants, if left in any considerable Numbers, should gain Strength to turn out their New Guests; especially in case they were allow'd to live with them upon equal Terms (d). This Danger therefore being once surmounted, they judge it would have been no Fault to admit some to Mercy and Favour; especially such as should abjure their Idolatrous Worship. However this were, 'tis plain that Joshua, upon Discovery of their Fraud, interpreted his Oath in a more strict and severe Sense. They had profess'd themselves the Servants of the Israelites, a Phrase common with the Eastern Nations, and had desir'd a League. Joshua had promis'd them their Life, and had enter'd into League with them, according to their Petition: And by this Agreement, (had they prov'd such as they pretended; that is, none of the Number of those Nations which God had design'd to Destruction,) they had been left in Possession of their Goods and Liberties (e). But on account of the Deception they had us'd, he insists strictly upon his Words; and, as it appears, left them nothing but their Life and necessary Maintenance (f).

VIII. But what are we to think of Oaths extorted by unjust Fear? Surely the Person who by means of this Fear procur'd a Promise upon Oath, is no less obliged to release the Promise thus violently obtain'd, than if no Oath had been added to confirm it. Therefore there appears no reason, why Compensation should not be admitted in this Case, in opposition to the claim of the Injurious party; according to the Rules laid down by us, when we treated of the general Subject of Fear. Indeed 'tis the Opinion of Grotius (g) that, if either the Words of the Oath do not respect the Man, by conferring any Right upon him; or if they do respect him, yet so as that somewhat may be opposed to his Claim, then the effect of the Oath shall be this; that the Man shall obtain no Right, but that the Swearer shall nevertheless stand to his Oath, by virtue of his Obligation to Almighty God. And he urgeth as an Instance, the Case of one, who by some Unlawful Fright or Terror, hath forced a Promise from another. But if we would truly settle this Point, we ought to distinguish between the different Kinds and Natures of Oaths. First, for those Words which are directed not to Man, but to God; as if I say either alone, or before Witnesses, I swear to God that I will give Seius thus or thus. (a) Here the Oath hath the Nature of a Vow, by which I promise to God that I will perform somewhat in respect to his Honour; and consequently by which I intended to transfer a Right on God, and not on Man. The Case is quite otherwise in Oaths which are directed to Men, or in which I promise a Man somewhat, calling God to witness. For here the Obligation seems altogether to expire, if it appear that the Person to whom the Promise was made, lay under some Fault which rendered him incapable of receiving it. Thus in a Promise to a Thief, I neither directed the Engagement towards God, nor express'd my self thus, that I would in regard to the Honour and Glory of the Divine Name, pay the Man what was mention'd. And though we should grant never so freely and absolutely, that even such an Oath hath likewise the force of a Vow: Yet since a Vow binds not unless it be accepted by God, how shall I be sure that 'tis consistent with the Divine Pleasure and Approbation, that I an innocent Person, should rob my self of my Goods, to bestow them on an ungodly Villain, only to put him into a way of making some gain of his Wickedness? And then there is no fear that my neglect of my Oath should lessen the Awe and Reverence of God in such a Wretch, who by his very Profession and way of living, shews how much he values God and Religion. Yet if there be any Man who in this Case, to avoid giving Scandal to the Weak, and that he may not seem, now he hath escaped the danger, to treat the Divine Name in a slighting or irreverent manner, which before was the Cause of his Deliverance; if any Man, we say, on these Considerations, is resolv'd to part with the Sum thus promis'd, it seems not only to be more safe and expedient, but likewise more acceptable to God, that he should rather convert it to Pious Uses, than to the maintaining of the Wretch in his Villanous Courses. And this method of proceeding, is the more justifiable and secure, in Governments where all Oaths of this kind are by the Municipal Laws declared void (b) (1). The Examples alledg'd by Grotius to the contrary, will to those who rightly consider things, appear not at all to reach the purpose. 'Tis strange that Matthæus the Civilian (c) should in his Discourse on this Point, commend the Act of Julius Cæsar, Who being taken by Pirates, and made swear to pay his Ransom, sent the Money, but afterwards putting to Sea, took them and brought them to Execution. For Plutarch (2), Velleius (3), Sueton (4), and Polyænus (d), who all tell the Story, do none of them mention a word about any such Oath: And Matthæus seems in this to follow the Notion of those, who fancy that a Person thus compell'd to swear, may satisfy his Oath by paying, just for the present, what he promis'd; yet so as that it shall be lawful for him immediately after to recover what he gave, either by his own Strength, or by calling in the assistance of the Magistrate. Which is indeed but a vain piece of Superstition, it being the same thing not to pay, and immediately to take back what we paid. Tully asserts, (e) That it is no Fraud to withhold from a Robber a Ransom promis'd him for saving our Life, for this Reason, because a Robber is a Common Enemy to all Mankind, to whom no Faith can be engag'd, with whom no Covenant can be transacted. For which he is censured by Grotius, (f) who observes, that although a Robber hath no Title to those Common Rights which the Law of Nations hath establish'd between Enemies, in a Fair and Open War, yet he ought to be admitted to Fellowship and Communion so far as the Law of Nature extends; one Precept of which it is, That Covenants be faithfully observ'd. And yet there are not wanting Arguments which might be urg'd in Tully's defence, As, that since a Robber is a Common Foe to all Men, or such an one as without any precedent Injury or Provocation spoils and murders all that fall into his Hands, and consequently makes it his very Profession to break and disturb that Society which GOD hath ordain'd amongst Men; therefore he ought to receive no benefit from any such Common Bond, (as Oaths are,) invented by Men to knit themselves more firmly together, after the Divine Appointment hath made them Sociable Creatures. And that a way of Life, which declares for Atheism, ought not to be admitted to any Gain or Advantage from Religion. As, on the other side, the Oaths and Protestations of such Villains are little regarded or relied on by Wise Men (g). And we find the Pander in Terence (6), reckoning it amongst the necessary Accomplishments of his Art, to have the knack of Perjury (g).

IX. It is farther requisite in order to the Validity of an Oath, that the Obligation be lawful, which it is added to confirm (7). Therefore a Promise, though sworn to, shall be of no force or effect, if the Subject of it were a Matter either repugnant to the Natural or Divine Law, or to any Human Law, (if the Party lives under Civil Government,) inconsistent with the Natural and Divine. (a) The Example of David (i) is most illustrious in this Case; who having in his Passion sworn to destroy the House and Family of Nabal, for denying him a reasonable Kindness in abusive and slanderous Language, yet being pacified by the Intercession of Abigail, he thanks God, that he hath been thus hindered from a more sinful Performance of a sinful Engagement. And so Alboinus was no doubt in the right, for retracting a Vow which he had made to cut off all the Inhabitants of Pavia, upon their refusing to surrender at his Summons. (b) For 'tis absurd to invoke the Divine Vengeance upon any Action, but such as God himself hath, under a severe Penalty, forbidden. To do otherwise would be to abuse the Awe and Reverence which we owe the Divine Majesty, in making it, as it were, a means of affronting him. And the design of introducing Oaths amongst Men, was, that they might add Strength to good Actions, not that they might afford excuse and protection to bad (c). The very Alcoran (d) forbids Men to swear unlawfully; as suppose, that they will never come near their Wives: and enjoins any Person who hath happen'd to make such an Oath, to set a Slave at liberty by way of Expiation, before he presumes to break it. And here too 'tis made a Question, Whether a Man falling amongst Thieves, and being by them compell'd to swear that he will for ever keep silence, and as far as in him lies, provide for their Security, be bound to stand to his Oath? To which we are inclined to answer in the Negative; in Case his Silence be likely to prove the occasion of exposing many other Persons to danger. For as to his own part he might lawfully enough suffer the Villains to escape with Impunity; but not if their safety was to be follow'd by the murder and ruin of many innocent Men. And we might apply to a Person under these Circumstances the Saying of Tacitus, (e) Sand lentus in suo dolore esset; reipublicæ injurias ne largiretur; So far as he was concern'd himself, or, in regard to his own particular grievance, he might be as merciful as he pleas'd; but he ought not to forgive the Injury done to the Commonwealth.

X. But to go farther, although the thing promis'd be not in it self unlawful, yet the Oath shall be invalid, in case it hinders any greater Moral Good, or if we are by it withheld from discharging any Duty of Humanity or Piety (2). And under this Head we may rank those Oaths by which Men tie themselves up from discovering and communicating to others any Honest Art, tending to the Use and Benefit of Mankind (f). "Unless I or others who are already privy to the Secret, can sufficiently supply the Needs of Men, in this Particular; and upon supposal that my discovery cannot prejudice and endamage the Party who required the Oath from me (g). The Reason of all which is, because we owe all our Proficiency in Good and Useful Things to Almighty God, and are each of us bound to carry our Endeavours to the highest degree that we are capable of attaining: So that 'tis not in our power to abridge our selves of this Liberty, or by our own Acts to absolve our Consciences from a Duty enjoin'd by the Law of God. Oaths of this kind were not uncommon amongst the Jews, which are insisted on at large by other Authors (h). Thus too we judge that Oath to have been invalid, which Narses, in Paulus Diaconus, (i) requir'd of an Old Man who had dug up a quantity of Gold, engaging him never to acquaint any Person with his good Fortune. And the old Man was in the right, when upon the Death of Narses, he discover'd the Treasure to Tiberius the Emperor. And in this respect the Case of a Vow is the same with that of an Oath: For neither is a Vow to be look'd on as good and valid, not only if it be unlawful, but if it be silly and impertinent. The Spartan who had sworn to throw himself headlong down the Promontory Leucate, when he beheld the dreadful height, turn'd back at the prospect; and being reproach'd for his want of Resolution, wisely answer'd (3), I did not consider that my first Vow stood in need of a much greater Vow to bind and confirm it (4).

XI. Lastly, That Oaths do not alter the Nature and Substance of those Promises or Pacts to which they are join'd, is sufficiently evident. Thus an Oath about a thing absolutely impossible, is not obligatory; though the party is guilty of a very heinous Sin, in thus rashly abusing the Divine Name. So an Oath added to a Promise which was before Conditional, doth by no means render it absolute. For the Oath which supposeth such a Condition, doth no less stand and fall with that Condition, than the bare Promise would have done without this Confirmation. Thus too an Oath, as well as any other Promise, ceaseth and expires upon Failure of the Quality which the Person held when he swore, and with regard to which alone the Oath was made. For Instance, a Magistrate, when he leaves his Office, is no longer bound by the Oath which he took at his Admission. And on the other side, the Subjects owe no farther Obedience to a Magistrate, who hath either quitted his Dignity, or been fairly depriv'd of it; though no such Release be expressly, and in formal manner granted them. For thus much is implied in the very Nature of the Affair (a). So likewise, it is no less requisite to Promises confirm'd by Oath, than to others which are not so confirm'd, that they be accepted by the other Party. And he who obtains a Right by any Covenant, may equally release the Performance of it, whether it was sworn to or not. In the same manner we are to judge from the Nature of Covenants, whether an Act undertaken contrary to Oath, be only unlawful, or whether it be likewise void and ineffectual (1). For unless the Swearer did by his Promise divest himself of his Right, and confer it on another, though he afterwards give the thing to a third Person, yet the Act shall be valid. If a Man, for Instance, hath sworn that he will leave such a thing in Legacy to any Party, and afterwards sells it to another Party, the Sale shall not be void, though the Seller is perjurd. Thus, if a Person who in the Life-time of his Parents, hath promis'd them upon Oath, that he will never marry such a particular Woman, shall nevertheless after their Decease, take her for his Wife; the Man indeed will be guilty of Perjury, but the Marriage shall stand good and firm, unless the Municipal Laws ordain the contrary. Farther, an Oath added to a Promise or Pact, shall derive its Force and Efficacy either from Natural, or from Civil Law, according to the Nature of that Promise or Pact. For the Oath hath not in it self a Power of causing that which otherwise produced only a Natural Obligation, to produce likewise a Civil; unless the Municipal Laws interpose particularly in the matter. As neither can it change the Species of an Act: A bare Donation, for Instance, cannot by the Addition of an Oath, be turn'd into a Chargeable Contract, nor vice versa. And here we fall in with the common Question, Whether a Contract confirm'd by Oath, in which the Swearing Party is remarkably prejudiced, may be revers'd, and the Party restor'd in full to what he lost?

Grotius (b) takes the negative part, adding for a Reason, That although, in this Case, we may perhaps owe the Man nothing, or however less than is required, yet we are bound to perform our Oath to God: Which Argument we just now consider'd and reject'd. The Expounders of the Roman Law handle the same Question at large, in their Observations upon Lib. 2. Tit. 27. C. si adversus vendit: and the Authentick subjoin'd; which many Civilians; and especially those of the French Nation, censure as unjust. To the Rescript of Alexander they answer, That it doth by no means contain a general Decision, but was directed wholly to a particular Case. For the matter stood thus; The Emperor was petition'd here by a Soldier; who must consequently be a Man of ripe Judgment, being in his Eighteenth Year; and yet he alledg'd no extraordinary Loss or Damage; but only his Defect of Age. Now the Contract which this Person had made and confirm'd by an Oath, that Religious Prince would on no Account evacuate: and his Pious Caution had no less a Precedent than Hercules himself; who, as the Historian (c) reports, never swore but once in his Life. And then as for the Authentick, they say it was extorted by Force from the Emperor Frederick, by Pope Honorius III. who refus'd to grant him his Imperial Crown on any other Terms: and that Frederick had resolv'd to alter it; but was prevented by Death. The Reason why the Pope should insist on obtaining that Decree, is easy to be discover'd, by all those who are acquainted with the Policy of the Roman Court (d). We, for our Parts, must think it necessary to the clear Determination of the Point, first of all to observe, that those Pacts, in which there appears a very considerable Inequality, those which depend on any Deceit, Fraud, or unjust Fright; and those which are struck without Thought and Deliberation, have all of them a Natural and Intrinsic Defect, and are therefore such as the Law of Nature enjoins should be either revers'd or corrected. But that the Party's being under the Age of Five and Twenty, is not sufficient, of it self, to render the Covenant defective. Though thus much indeed may fairly be presum'd, that the Minor hath suffer'd some Damage in the Transaction, on account of his weak and unexperienc'd Judgment, which lays him open to the Circumvention and Treachery of others. But if there appears no such Damage, no Reason can be given why the Act should be disannull'd. This being premis'd, we affirm, that if a Covenant or Promise made under Oath be in no other Respect faulty, it cannot be revers'd on this bare Score, that it was made by a Minor, provided he was capable of understanding the Business in hand. But if the other Party was guilty of any Deceit; or if, without any such Deceit, the Minor happens to suffer any signal Prejudice, only through Infirmity of Age, the Oath shall not hinder him from petitioning either to have the Bargain revers'd, or at least amended to his Advantage. For in this Case, the Youth who swears to the Contract, supposes it to be free from all Defect, and the other Party pretends as much. This then is, as it were, the Condition on which his Oath is founded, and upon Failure of which it comes to nothing. The Case is different if a Youth, without any Deceit, in the Person with whom he deals, hath knowingly and deliberately given more than the Purchase was worth. For then the Business was a mix'd Act, made up partly of a Contract, and partly of a Donation. It is unnecessary to add, as a general Remark, that a Person subject to the Power and Authority of another, cannot oblige himself farther than he is, by that Authority, allow'd (r). If he exceed these Bounds, the Governor may, if he thinks fit, declare the Business to be Void, whether sworn to or not.

(a) Add. Grot. d. l. f. 18.(1) Vid. Grot. ubi supra, f. 19.(b) d. l.(c) Plutarch Quæst. Rom. 28.(d) That this Law is not observ'd in France, we have the Testimony of Mornay, ad d. l. See likewise August. B. v. ad d. l. Granewegen. de LL. abrogat.

XII. Yet inasmuch as Oaths are made by the Invocation of the Divine Majesty, whom no Man can fraudulently deceive, and whom no Man can securely mock and deride; they ought to be allow'd this Effect; that, on their Account, all Tricks and Cavils shall be excluded from every Business which they are added to confirm. Hence the Roman Censors justly condemn'd the Subtlety of that Captive; who having obtain'd leave to depart from the Enemy's Camp, giving his Oath to return, when he was got a little way, slept back, on the Pretence of having left something behind him, and then fix'd himself at Rome, as if he had fulfill'd what he swore (a). The Fallacy of Dercyllidas deserves a Censure no less severe, who besieging the Tyrant of Scepsis, solemnly swore to him, That if he would come out to a Parly, he should immediately return into the City. The Tyrant coming out on his Promise, Dercyllidas commanded him on Pain of Death, to set open the Gates, and then told him, Now I give you leave to return into the City, and I intend too with my Army, to bear you Company (b). For Fraud, as Tully observes (c), doth not loosen Perjury, but bind it stronger than before. Thus Harry Stephens, in his Preliminary Treatise to his Apology for Herodotus (d), is very pleasant on the common Sophism of the Tradesmen, when they swear they cannot afford a Thing under such or such a Price, unless they design to lose by it; observing that in this Conduct they have always an Eye to the Proverb, A Tradesman

loseth when he doth not get. I know not whether we are to rank under this Head, the Act of the Count de la Fountain, who in the Battle at Rocroy, was carried in a Chair; having bound himself by Oath, Never to fight against the French on Foot, or on Horse back (e). Or that of Pope Alexander the Seventh, who having, at his Admission to the Papal Dignity, sworn that He would never receive his Kinsmen in Rome, (di non ricevere i suoi parenti in Roma) by the Advice of the Jesuits, made Use of this Evasion; he receiv'd his Relations first at the Castle of Gaudolfi, and then brought them with him into the City (f). Or what Tavernier reports (g) of the Dutch Agents of their East-India Company; who before they leave Holland, engage themselves by Oath, never to drive any Trade on their own private account, but to rest satisfy'd with the Salary allow'd them by the Publick. Yet when they once arrive at the Indies, many of them marry, and suffer their Wives to carry on that Forbidden and Clandestine Traffick. 'Tis a Barbarous Story, that which Alian (h) tells of Cleomenes the Spartan, That making Archonides privy to his Design on the Kingdom, he swore to him, If his Enterprize succeeded, πύρα οὐκ ἔτι ἀντὶ κεφαλῆς ἀπέσειεν, that he would do nothing without his Head. But having secured the Government, he cut off his Friend's Head, and kept it in a Vessel of Honey, and before he undertook any Business, turn'd towards the Vessel, and declar'd his Resolutions. Aryandes, in Polyænus (i), treating with the Barcæans, brought their Commissioners to a Trench, which he had contriv'd for that Purpose, lightly cover'd with Earth and Wood, and there swore to them, That he would observe the Articles of Agreement, as long as the Earth continued. And presently after throwing down the Trap, rush'd upon the City, when under no Suspicion of Violence (k). To the same Case belongs the common Instance of Two Rogues, one of which steals a thing, and the other hides it; the former swearing that he hath it not; the latter, that he did not take it; who are both to be judg'd guilty of Perjury. It was a most gross Evasion of the Turkish Emperor Solyman, when having sworn to Ibrahim Bassa, that he would never hurt him while he liv'd, he order'd him to be kill'd in his Sleep, as if he were not then to be reckon'd amongst the Living. On the other hand, the Ancients extol the Constancy of Q. Metellus Numidicus (l), for refusing to swear to the Law propos'd by Saturnius; tho' Marius the Consul and others, endeavour'd to persuade him to a Compliance, by telling him, That the present Necessities of the Com- monwealth would justify him in taking the Oath, and that he might decline the Force of it by this Secret Reserve, That he swore to the Law, provided it were a Law; that is, if it were duly propos'd and enacted. Whereas it would be easy for him afterwards to shew that it was indeed no Law, being made in the time of Thunder, when by the Rites of their Religion, they were forbidden to transact any Business in the Assemblies of the People. Yet that good Man chose rather to go into Banishment, than to make use of this Shift; knowing that when Persons swore to a Law, they must, at least in Pretence and Appearance, acknowledge the manner of its Enactment to be Right and True. But we think Lycurgus to have been over Solicitous, when he order'd his Ashes to be thrown into the Sea, for fear if they should be brought to Sparta, the People should fancy their Oath to expire, by which they had bound themselves not to repeal his Laws till he should return Home. For the bringing back of a dead Body can with no Propriety be look'd on as the Return of the Person to whom it belongs (a).

XIII. Yet on the other side, the interpretation of Oaths is not always to be extended, but sometimes to be made in the closest and narrowest sense, if the Subject Matter seem to require it (1); as suppose we swore to the prejudice of another, and confirm'd in this solemn manner not Promises, but Threats, which are not in themselves capable of conferring any Right on another (2); the Common Instance of which Case is the Example of the Israelites in Judg. XXI; who having sworn not to give their Daughters to the Benjamites, afterwards perswaded them to steal themselves Wives, and interceded for them with the Virgins Fathers. For 'tis one thing to give, and another thing, not to resume, what hath been forcibly taken (3). And there was the more reason for insisting thus closely on the Words of the Oath, because it had been Cruelty to extinguish a whole Tribe, though for the most heinous Offence: and perhaps they had in their Oaths excepted this very Case (b). In Ammianus Marcellinus (c), Athanasius the Gothick Judge and Commissioner for the Treaty of Peace, alledging, that he was bound by a Dreadful Curse, and by the Commands of his Father, 'Never to tread upon the Roman Ground, and no Arguments proving sufficient to move him to the contrary; it being likewise dishonourable for the Emperour to pass over to Him; the Wise Heads found out this Expedient, to have the Emperour and the

'Judge meet in their Boats about the mid'd of the River, (the Danube,) and thence to settle the Articles of Agreement between their People on both sides. So when the Romans, in Livy, (d) requir'd the Achaens to repeal some Decrees which they had made, the latter urg'd in their own Excuse, That they were engaged by Oath not to do it. But Appius the Roman Commissioner in the Affair, telling them, He would by all means advise them to undertake that willingly, which otherwise they would be brought to by compulsion: They were so terrify'd, as only to request, That the Romans would give themselves the trouble of making what Alterations they thought fit, and not bring the Achaens under the Curse of Perjury. Here, we see, they look'd on the Case of not opposing a Formidable Superior in cancelling the Laws, to be different from that of repealing them by their own free Act. Thus Agamemnon in Euripides, (e) refuseth to punish Polymnestor of Thrace, in regard that he was the Friend and Allie of the Grecians; yet he promiseth Hecuba not to hinder her from taking any Revenge on him by her own Force, and on her own Account. (f) Thus the Knaveish Servant in Terence (g), begging the Maid to take the Child which he had in his Arms, and to lay it at his Master's Door, being demanded, Why he could not do't without assistance? answers, Because if my Master makes me swear that I did not lay it here myself, I may do it with a safe Conscience. But Davus was in our Opinion, but a very poor Casuist: it being in this respect the same, to perform a thing by oneself, or by another. The Emperour Aurelian, when He found the Gates of Thyan shut, swore in a rage, that He would not leave in it one Dog alive. (h) (4) Alexander the Great having resolv'd to destroy the City Lampsacus, when Anaximenes came to petition him in the behalf of the City, immediately swore, He would do nothing which Anaximenes should desire. Anaximenes took the advantage of the Oath, and desir'd him to destroy Lampsacus. (i) Antigonus on account of a strange Dream (5) which he had, fully designing to kill Mithridates; and discovering the Matter to his Son Demetrius, after he had forc'd him to swear that He would never speak of it; Demetrius being concern'd for the Life of the Young Prince, took him once aside from the Company, and saying nothing to him, only wrote with his Javelin in the Dust, so as to be observ'd by him, Fly Mithridates (k). To the same Head belongs that Instance which Sueton (l) gives of Cesar's great Clemency of Nature; That having sworn to crucify the Pirates by whom he had been taken, he orders them first to be strangled, and then fastned to the Cross. Of the like kind was David's Oath of Safety to Shimei, 2 Sam. XIX. 23. notwithstanding which, on his Death-Bed, he commands Solomon, to take due care that such a wicked Rebel should not die a peaceable Death; 1 Kings II. 9. For David's Promise of Pardon was made only in his own Name. Nor did he here, properly, enjoin Solomon that he should drag the Man to punishment for his old Crime, but only that he should diligently watch so notorious a Villain, and by no means spare him, if taken in a second Fault. And Solomon acted with great Wisdom (1), in obliging so turbulent and so implacable an Offender to live in the Royal City under his Eye, for fear he should engage in new Treasons, threatening him with Death upon his Disobedience in this particular; which condition Shimei himself gladly approved of, and accepted. Nor did it fall out without the special direction of Providence, that being caught transgressing this Command, he suffer'd the just Reward of his former, as well as of his present Guilt (a). I know not whether we may put in the same Rank the Act of Timoleon recorded by Polyanus; (b) he was engaged in pursuit of Milarchus the Tyrant, an Impious Wretch, who had cheated many Persons out of their Lives, by swearing to preserve them, and afterwards despising his Oath, The Tyrant made an Overture of coming in Person to Syracuse to take his Tryal, provided Timoleon would not be his Accuser: Timoleon swore he would not; and on these Terms Milarchus came to Syracuse: Timoleon bringing him into the open Assembly, addressed him in the following manner, I will not accuse you, for so I covenanted beforehand; but I'll command you instantly to be executed: For he who hath deceiv'd so many to their Ruine, may justly be thus deceiv'd himself.

XIV. In like manner an Oath doth not exclude any tacit Conditions or Limitations properly arising from the Nature of the Subject. As suppose I have given a Person his Option to desire of me whatever he pleas'd; if his Request shall be either unjust, or absurd, I am not tied by my Engagement. For he that makes an indefinite Grant to another, before he knows what he will ask, presupposeth that the other party will petition for what is honest, what is Morally possible, what is not ridiculous, and what is not mischievous either to himself, or to any besides. 'Twas a good Caution of Phæbus to his Rash Son,

Such a Case as this gave occasion to that noted Saying of Hippolytus in Euripides (d), which Tully so much commends, ἡ γλῶσσο' ὀμώμεχ' ἡ δ' ὀρκὴν ἀνὸρω?ε, My Tongue hath sworn, my Mind unsworn remains. For it seems he had sworn to the Nurse, that he would keep secret whatever she discover'd to him. But when she made a Proposal of Adultery and Incest with his Mother-in-Law Phædra, he denies that his Oath oblig'd him to conceal so foul a Villany. Though the Poet makes him so scrupulous as to recede from this Judgment, and to keep close the matter in regard to his Oath, Nicomachus in Q. Curtius (e) makes the same Exception, resolutely denying, that he had given his Oath in confirmation of the Parricide, or that any tye of Religion should be able to hinder him from declaring so barbarous a Treason. For it is indeed one part of the Duty and Obligation of a Subject, not to hide any Designs that he shall observe to be carrying on against the Person or the Government of his Prince (f). And thus too Herod ought not to have sold the Head of John the Baptist to his Daughter-in-Law, for a Dance; because, since there can lie no Obligation to what is unlawful; in such a General Promise, this Condition ought to have been understood, if she desir'd any Thing which he might lawfully perform (g). We find King Solomon not adhering to his indefinite Grant; when his Mother ask'd a Favour which was likely to turn to the prejudice of his Government, 1 Kings II. 20, &c. There is a very remarkable Story in Diodorus Siculus (h) which bears some relation to the Point now under debate: Xerxes being warmly engag'd in prosecuting a new Expedition against Greece, desired Themistocles, who was then in his Court, to be his Guide and Director in the War. Themistocles consented, upon condition the King would swear, never to attack the Grecians without him. A Bull being sacrific'd, and the Oath taken with the usual Solemnity, Themistocles took a Cup of the Blood, and drinking it off, immediately ex-

(2) This passage of Ovid (as Mr. Barbeyrac in His 1st Note upon this Sect. observes) is so far from establishing, that it contradicts our Author's Principles. (d) Hippolyt. v. 6, 12. (e) L. 6. c. 7. n. 7. (f) So Tully (Off. 1.) It may so happen, that the performance of a Promise or an Engagement should be prejudicial to the Party to whom it was made. For if Neptune, as we have it in the Story, had not made good what he Promised to Theseus upon Oath, Theseus had not lost his Son Hippolytus. The Death of his Son being one of the three Wishes, which, in his Passion, he put up to Neptune. (Comp. Euripid. Hippolyt. Coron. v. 315.) 'pired. And by this means diverted Xerxes from his Resolution. But here if Xerxes had no other Reason to alter his Purpose, he need not have been deter'd by his Oath, in which Themistocles's Life was a Condition suppos'd; it being no more than if he had promis'd that Grecian Captain never to undertake any Thing against his Countrymen, whilst he liv'd, without his Counsel and Assistance. So that upon his Death, the force and virtue of the Oath died with him (a).

V. Although the Invocation of the Divine Name in Oaths, is to be adjust'd according to the Perswasion of the Person who swears, yet the whole Proposition shall bear that Sense which he who requires the Oath protesteth to understand it in (1). For 'tis on his account chiefly that the Oath is taken, and not on the Swearer's: And therefore it belongs to him too, to settle the Form of Words, and he ought to do this so plainly and clearly, as both to signify how he understands them himself, and to bring the Swearer to acknowledge that he apprehends his Meaning. And to conclude the Business, the Swearer is to pronounce the same Words openly and distinctly, so as to leave no possible Room for Cavil or Evasion. Therefore, those Wretches whom Tacitus speaks of (b), in vain declined to attempt the Guilt of Perjury, when being conscious to themselves of the Wickedness with which they were charg'd, they trembled and faulter'd in their Oath, changing the Words with much Artifice and Sleight. So Ulysses and Diomedes in Diētis Cretenſis (c), like true Masters of Sophistry and Guile, swear to the Trojans, That they would stand by the Agreement they had settled with Antenor: By which Agreement they meant the Articles for betraying the City, which Antenor and they had adjust'd. As for that Form us'd in administering Oaths amongst the Romans, ex animi sui sententia, according to their Judgment and Opinion, it is not so to be expounded, as if Oaths receiv'd all their Force and Validity from the Notion which Men form'd of them in their Mind; but to shew, those that swore ought to perform so Solemn an Act in the most serious manner, and with the most real Intentions, not in the way of Dissimulation, of Fiction, or of Sport (d). Cicero in his Academical (e) Questions, endeavouring to prove that Human Knowledge can reach no higher than Probabilities, in a very elegant manner alledgeth this and other the like Customs as Proofs of what he asserts. This is evident, says he, in the diligent Caution of our Ancestors, who first required Men to swear only according to the best of their Judgment; and then told the Party who took the Oath, that he should be rendred guilty by it, only, if he knowingly deceiv'd. As likewise, when they order'd a Witness to say no more than that he thought, such or such a matter, tho' perhaps he had seen it with his Eyes; and pronounc'd a Fact which the sworn Judges had examin'd and determin'd, not to be, but only to seem, or to appear thus or thus. 'Tis a Remark of the same Author (f), That what is sworn agreeable to the Mind and Intention of him who requires the Oath, ought strictly to be perform'd; but what is not, may without Perjury be omitted. That is, if a Man happens to misunderstand the Party who puts him to his Oath, so as to swear in a different Sense from what the other conceives, he is not perjurd by Non-performance: For since the other Person had a contrary Meaning, he must be suppos'd not to have accepted of this Proposal made upon Oath by the Juror; and without Acceptance there ariseth no Obligation from a Promise. For it is not, as Tully goes on, always Perjury to swear what is false; that is, to assert by Oath thro' some Mistake what is really otherwise: But you are then perjurd, when you fail in making good what you swore, ex animi tui sententia, (as the Form is in our common Practice,) according to your real Sentiments and Perswasion.

XVI. It hath been a Dispute amongst some of our Modern Casuists, whether an Oath could be taken by Proxy; that is, whether one Man could in the Place and in the Name of another take an Oath which should bind the absent Party? on which Point our Judgment is this: As a Person may in his absence contract an Obligation, since Consent may as well be signify'd in Writing, as viva voce; so there seems no Reason why an Oath likewise may not be express'd in the same manner. Which, after it hath been once solemnly recited, shall as fully oblige, as if the Party were there present, and had taken it by word of Mouth. Yet before it hath been rehears'd in this Solemn manner, it seems allowable to revoke it; so that a Person who retracts an Attestation which he made upon Oath at a distance, before it be convey'd to the place for which it was design'd, ought not to be look'd on as perjurd. But in the common Proceedings of Courts on this Affair, there seems to be somewhat not very proper or convenient, as that the Proctors who read the Instrument, use such a Posture and Ceremony, as if they were to swear in their own Name, and that, for fear they should seem to be themselves obliged, they change the concluding Clause of the Oath after this manner, So help him God.

(a) Add. lib. 2. tit. 8. D. qui satisfacere cogantur, &c. And Homer was not strictly in the right, when he says of Hector, Il. l. 10. v. 332. ἢ ἐπιόρκων ἀπώμοσε, Thus swore he, and forswore himself: Because there was this tacit Contradiction to be understood in what he said, If we take the Town, and if you return home in safety. Unless, we interpret ἐπιόρκων an Oath which a Man doth not find Life or Means to accomplish. (1) See Gror. B. 2. c. 13. f. 3. n. 2.

(b) Hist. 4. c. 41. (c) L. 5. (d) This too was the usual Form of the Questions put by the Censors; as for Instance, ex animi tui sententia habes uxorem? Have you a Wife, answer me according to your real Mind? which a Roman Knight once answering with this Cavilling Jest, I have a Wife, according to my Mind, not according to your Mind, incur'd the Penalty of a Fine for his indiscreet Wit. (e) L. 4. c. 47. sub. fin. & l. 3. c. 29. de Offic.

Whereas it might be sufficient barely to recite the Oath of the absent Party, as it lies in the Writing. However, since it hath been with good Reason, the receiv'd Custom of most Nations, to render Oaths more sacred and august by the Ceremonies of Religion, and by some Sign of Devotion, to set the Awe and Reverence of the Divine Majesty more sensibly before the Eyes of the Juror, as by Sacrifice, by approaching to the Altar, and the like Acts of Worship; therefore we are of Opinion, that if the Matter be of very important Concern, the absent Party ought to be put to his Oath, with the usual Solemnity, in the place where he lives; especially since the Case requires a Corporal Oath; which Name we cannot give to an Oath express'd and convey'd in the manner we before describ'd. For it is much more to invoke God as a Witness, in the midst of those Sacred Rites; which, not without some kind of Pious Horror, signify the Divine Presence; than to write so many Words on Paper, which never blusheth. And 'tis a Material Consideration, that Evidences thus given in Writing at a distance, are by the Lawyers themselves term'd Testimonia cæca (a), Blind Testimonies.

XVII. Lastly, It is a Question usually discuss'd on this Head, Whether or no, and how far an Heir is bound by the Oaths of the Person to whom he succeeds? In which Case this is certain, that if by such an Oath some other Party obtain'd a perfect Right, which ought to be satisfy'd either in whole or in part out of the Goods of the Deceas'd; then the Heir is oblig'd to see it fulfill'd: since this Burthen or Debt inhering in the Possession, passeth to him with it. But when the Oath hath given no one a perfect Right, and the Obligation it self was founded barely in the Piety, Fidelity or Constancy of the Juror, then it's plain that the Heir doth not stand bound, inasmuch as he doth not represent another, as to those Obligations which terminate ultimately and solely in the Person Deceas'd. Thus for Instance, if a Man hath sworn or vow'd with an Oath, That he will fast once every Week; That he will continue in Celibacy five Years; or, That he will undertake a Pilgrimage to the Holy Land; if he die before he hath fulfill'd his Engagement, his Heir shall by no means be tied to perform it. But the Case is different, if a Person hath been Heir expressly under such a Condition. So likewise if a Man hath sworn, to give an Hundred Pounds Yearly to the Poor for ten Years to come; and dies before the time is expir'd, his Heir shall be free from the Obligation; unless the former Grant conferr'd on certain Persons a Right of demanding the said Sum. For he who makes a Promise, and doth not withal give the Party a Right of challenging it as his Due, intends to engage his own word only, and not his Estate; and therefore upon his Decease, the Obligation shall not in the least affect his Possessions or his Heir, unless an especial Injunction to their Purpose were added in the Will. Grotius (b) observes farther, That if such a Promise confirm'd by Oath was in some respect faulty, so as to produce a Right, not in regard of Man, but of God only, then the Heir shall not be charg'd with the Performance. Which we allow, if it be suppos'd that the Party who swore, resolv'd either out of a Point of Honour, or a Scruple of Conscience, to fulfil such a defective Oath, which he might, if he pleas'd, have utterly evacuated, by alledging some Deceit, or some Fear unlawfully caus'd. For otherwise the Question is insignificant; we having above shewn that the Juror himself is not in this Case effectually oblig'd. But what if the Heir neglects to perform a Promise or Covenant under Oath made by the Deceas'd, doth he hereby contract the Guilt of Perjury? It seems Reasonable to answer in the Negative. For that which in strict Speech we call an Oath, or the Invocation of the Divine Vengeance superadded to a Common Engagement, passeth no farther than the Person of him who swears. Since we cannot say that the Heir put a Slight on the Reverence due to the Divine Majesty, because it was not he who call'd God to Witness: And therefore he shall be Chargeable only with Breach of Trust. It alters the Matter, if the Oath were taken by a whole People: It being the Judgment of many, That a People whilst they remain such, are by their publick Oaths put under perpetual Obligation. Which Opinion nevertheless seems to us not altogether Clear and Decisive. For an Oath and the Breach of it affects only the Natural Will, or the Will of particular Men, and reacheth the Compound Body, or Moral Person, only by Communication from each Individual. The People therefore, as a Moral Person, cannot invoke the Wrath of God upon themselves; but this is done by those single Natural Persons, of whom the Community was made up. And consequently upon the Violation of a Promise or Pact made by Oath in the Name of the State, those Persons only shall be guilty of Perjury who Corporally swore to the Business, if they are now consenting to the Omission of it; but the rest shall be only branded with the Mark of ordinary Perfidiousness. And for this Reason we should be unwilling to accuse the Spartans of Perjury, in receding, after so many Ages, from Lycurgus's Institutions: or, the Romans, in case they had invested the Cæsars with the Title of Kings, notwithstanding the Oath which Brutus, of old, impos'd on the People to the contrary. Which will appear yet more evidently, if we consider, that this Oath conferr'd a Right on no Person; but the Design of the Romans in it was only to lay a Restraint on the Liberty of their Will, that they might not think of restoring that Form of Government which had prov'd so Unfor-fortunate to them. By which means they might indeed bind themselves, never to set up a Monarchy in Rome; At least, so long as the publick Safety could be preserv'd without it. For in this Case the very Persons who took the Oath, must be suppos'd to be releas'd from it; because then the Necessities of the State, which is conceiv'd incapable of subsisting without a single Governor, render the Matter or Subject of the Oath Unlawful. But their Posterity, unless they repeated the Oath, could not be tied by it: as well because their Ancestors had no Authority thus to impose arbitrarily upon them; as because the Consent of Posterity was wanting, as at present we suppose. Nor is it any Argument to the contrary to urge, that a Nation is reckon'd the same, tho' the particular Members who compos'd it are all chang'd. And that therefore the Acts of pass'd Generations seem Justly enough to be attributed to the present. For the Acts of former Ages can then only be imputed to the latter, when some other Party obtain'd any Right as the necessary Consequence of those Acts. But in such things as result to the whole Body from the Actions of particular Members, the Descendants in a People do not always represent the Progenitors. As tho' a People have been heretofore eminent for Martial Glory, yet their lazy and degenerate Race can claim no Share in their Triumph, or in their Fame. Yet still the Case would be quite otherwise, if such an Oath as we are speaking of hath been solemnly renewed by Posterity, each particular Man engaging for himself. But in regard to these publick Obligations, Sophocles's Advice (a) might pass for a general Rule;

*Let nothing thus be sworn beyond recall;
For Men are frail, and Human Thoughts will

And 'tis no trivial Remark that which Joan. Labardé makes in his History of France (b), That the Leagues of Monarchs are more firm and sacred, than those made by Republicks, or Popular Governments: Because when one Person only engageth his Faith, he is struck with a more Religious Concern for the Observation of it, than can affect each Man in a Multitude, where every one considers that but a little of the Publick Faith, if any at all, comes to his share: By which Means all are easily induc'd to recede from the common Engagement.

XVIII. The Two Principal Eyes to which Oaths may be, and commonly are applied, are, either to strengthen and confirm a Promise by such a Solemn Act of Religion; or to open a way to the clearing some Fact, which is at present doubtful and cannot be conveniently made out any other way. And 'tis in this Sense we ought to interpret Aristotle's Definition of an Oath, when he styles it, an undenonstrable Assertion made with an Appeal to the Divinity (c); that is, an Affeuration, not demonstrated by any Arguments, but credited purely on Account of the Piety and Religion of the Swearer. For when the matter may be prov'd by Evident and Convincing Reasons, 'tis not fair or regular to have recourse to Oaths. On the other hand, when Oaths are to decide a Cause, no search is made after other Proofs. Why Oaths are admitted only in determining matters of Fact, not matters of Law or Right, is very obvious. For we cannot swear whether a Thing be done well or ill, but barely whether it were done or not done. Which being once known; the Court may proceed upon the Points of Right and Law, by infallible Evidences and Rules. As for the Oath which the Judges themselves take, it is not Assertory but Promissory; for they engage by it, that they will give Sentence in the Case before them, as Justice and Equity shall direct. And this Division of Oaths into Promissory and Assertory, may comprehend them all, with regard to the two Ends or Uses but now mention'd.

XIX. It hath been generally the Custom to make use of Promissory Oaths in publick as well as in private Causes, and perhaps more frequently than was necessary (1). Concerning which, Authors have observ'd, that some of them are taken to introduce an Obligation, and are call'd Promissory in Specie: others are added to confirm some Act already in Being. Which Distinction is not to be understood as if every Oath were not accessory to another Obligation; but because some Promises include an Oath in the Compass of the same Proposition; as when one says, I swear to do so or so on your account: Whereas many times the principal Business is express'd in a different Sentence from the Oath which confirms it. Now 'tis rightly observ'd by the Expositors of the Roman Law, and 'tis no more than we have already prov'd, That all Oaths are void which Men apply to strengthen any Business in it self unlawful or vicious, and which tends either to the impairing of the publick Good, or to the Prejudice of a Third Person, though at the same time there are some sort of Transactions which are, of themselves, in Civil Cognisance, Invalid, and yet are rendred good and effectual by the Addition of an Oath. The Reason of which is, because they are not defective in their own Nature, but only capable of being Easily turn'd to the Harm of the Party, who thus by swearing to them shews his full Consent and Approbation. For since any Man may waive a Privilege or Favour not design'd for his Benefit, he who thus refuseth to lay hold on the Invalidity of the Affair, and peremptorily proceeds to the confirming it by an Oath, is presum'd to have consider'd very seriously whether it make for his Interest, or not.

XX. Assertory Oaths or such as are applied to the Decision of Controversies, not to be terminated by other Proofs, are taken either by the Party concern'd in the Business, or by a Third Man: Those who swear to the Facts of others, are term'd Witnesses (1); whose Honesty and Fidelity, unless by some probable Token render'd suspicious, are with Justice allow'd a very great Weight and Sway; it being well suppos'd, that no Man of any Religion or Goodness will expose himself to the Divine Vengeance, for the Affair of another Person: Yet is it a wise Constitution in most Civil Governments, not lightly to admit Persons to give Evidence in the Cause of others, engag'd to them by nearness of Birth; which is so strong a Motive to Affection and Love: It being consider'd that such Persons might easily suffer their Passion to gain the Ascendent of their Religion (a). Nor was it altogether without reason, that the Romans of old requir'd Witnesses of Wealth and Substance, especially in difficult and important causes.

XXI. But a Man may likewise in his own Business, when 'tis his Interest to do so, solve the Dispute by Oath, and this either by Agreement of the Parties, or by order of the Judge (b): For when a Controversy ariseth concerning some Due demanded by one Man, and denied by another, the Claimant may challenge the other Party to his Oath, promising to let fall the Suit, if he swears the Thing not to be owing which is requir'd (c): And if the Person thus challeng'd be doubtful whether he can swear clearly and peremptorily to the Matter, as suppose the Debt was transferr'd to him from another, then he may return the Oath to the Claimant, engaging to pay if he shall swear it is his Due (2): And this giving and returning of the Oath between the Parties, may be made either in Court, or out of Court; yet with this difference, that out of Court I am not necessarily oblig'd to take the Oath when offer'd me, because it implies a Contract; by means of which I shall, upon my refusing, become a Debtor: But now no Person, who is not invest'd with an Authority over me, can compel me to a Contract or Agreement which shall be Burthensome to me. Whereas, in Court, when the Oath is offer'd by one Party, the other shall not decline it, unless upon very weighty Reasons; but shall either take it himself, or return it to his Adversary. That is when the Judge conceives the Claim not to be Groundless, and yet there is no full Evidence of the Matter ready at hand; then if one of the Parties thinks fit to refer the Business to the Conscience of the other, the Judge may fairly look on him as Convict; who neither dares in this Religious manner to deny the Debt, nor yet, in Return, challenge the other to affirm it with the like Solemnity. For this starting and boggling can be attributed to nothing but to his inward Consciousness of the Debt; because if he pretend to fear that Men should think he swears only on the account of Gain, 'tis easy for him to avoid this Suspicion, by returning the Oath to the Claimant. If he is afraid that the other will be perjurd, why doth not he swear himself? Yet Plato in his Laws (d) admits of an Oath, only in such Cases where, according to the Judgment of Men, no Advantage can be got by forswearing; but where any Profit may be reap'd from the Perjury, there he orders that the Process shall be manag'd without Oaths.

XXII. And lastly, In some Cases, when other Proofs are not sufficient (3), the Judge may put the Party to his Oath, though he do not desire it; and this either that he may possess himself of some Right, or clear himself from the suspicion of some Fact. But here it must be observ'd, that 'tis never the Custom to offer these Oaths, when either Capital Punishment, or any grievous Inconvenience, must be the consequence of confessing the Truth. For, besides, that it looks very hard to bring a Man into so dangerous a Necessity, on the account of an uncertain Fact, as that he must either deeply wound his Conscience, or incur some very considerable Damage; little trust is to be given to an Oath thus exacted, the Minds of Men being always ready to entertain this Hope, That God Almighty may again be appeas'd, whose Mercy even the Perjur'd Sinner is not forbidden to implore! 'Tis a good Remark of Libanius (e), He who despairs of all other Means, and hath but one Remedy left, which is not to be obtain'd otherwise than by Lying; will certainly dare to change one Danger for another; knowing the present Mischief which is before his Eyes to be unavoidable; but, as for the Future Evil, often flattering himself, that he shall be able, by Worship, Sacrifices, Gifts and Oblations, to bribe Heaven into a Pardon. But for an account of these several kinds of Oaths, the Writers on the Civil Law are to be consulted at large (f).

XXIII. In relation to the Breach of Oaths, this Question still remains to be resolv'd, since it is usual in Civil Governments to bind Men by Oaths to the faithful discharge of their respective Trusts and Employments, whether he is always to be deem'd guilty of Perjury, who hath neglected any one part of his Duty? Where the Controversy is not about those Oaths which regard some peculiar Act; as, when a Man gives his Evidence, denies a Trust, forsakes a particular Promise, and the like:

(For he who violates these, ought, no doubt, to be branded as forsworn) But about such in which the party binds himself to many Things together: as when Persons are admitted to any Office, to be discharg'd by different Performances. And here there seems to be no reason why we should scruple to take the Affirmative side, in case the Breach was made against Knowledge, and with deliberate Wickedness. Only, that there are different degrees of Perjury, as well as of other Crimes. For as he is reckon'd less guilty, who hath transgress'd a Law or two, than he who hath at once renounc'd all Civil Government, or hath committed Treason against his Prince; so he who hath violated the whole sum of his Duty, contracts a more heinous and aggravating Perjury, than he who hath broken only a part (a). Nor ought we to give any heed to those Authors, who are of opinion, that Persons in these Circumstances, may be absolv'd from the Sin of Perjury, by submitting to the Penalty of the Law. For unless when the Obligation was first entred upon, it was expressly left to the choice of the Person, either to perform what he promis'd, or at a certain price to purchase the liberty of doing the contrary (b), the punishment shall by no means render him clear from the Crime; as we shall make out more at large hereafter. Thus he who hath suffer'd a Whipping for Thievery, is no less a Rogue, than if he had never felt the Lash.

XXIV. What is usually canvass'd amongst Authors about the dispensations, and relaxations of Oaths and of Vows, may be wholly determin'd by the fixing two Principles or Rules. The first, that a Person, who in regard both to his Actions and his Possessions, is under the Government of another, can dispose of nothing to his Governor's prejudice; and if any such disposal be made, it shall be lawful for the Governor to revoke it. The other is, that he who is invest'd with such Authority over any Person, may, as he shall think convenient, retrench and confine any Rights, which the Party under his direction hath already obtain'd; and much more those which he shall obtain hereafter. Whence it appears, that the Acts of Superiors are not of sufficient force to hinder the performance of an Oath, so far as it was truly obligatory: That is, an Oath not defective in it self, and made about a Thing which the Juror may dispose of at his pleasure, cannot be disannull'd by a Superior. (1) Thus the Roman Senate could not revoke the Oath which Regulus made to the Carthaginians, engaging him to return: Though indeed in this Particular Case, there was another Reason; inasmuch as Regulus was now in the condition of Slavery under his Conquerors, and therefore the Romans had lost all their Power and Authority over him. But when the Subject of the Oath is any Thing or Action falling under the Direction of the Superior, it shall then borrow all its force from the Superior's consent, either Tacit or Express; and he may, if it displease him, declare it Null and Void. Nor is there the least danger of Perjury to be fear'd, when an Oath is thus revers'd. Since the Person under Government ought to have presupposed his Governor's approbation as a necessary Condition. Nor doth the Superior sin in thus cancelling what the other hath sworn; because he only exerciseth his Right in hindring the Inferior from acting in prejudice of his Just Prerogative. And 'tis the same thing as to the nullity of the Oath, whether the Superior prohibits all Oaths on such certain Subjects beforehand, or whether when they have been already made, he forbids their performance. Though, in the former Case the Inferior incurs a very heinous Guilt, in thus rashly presuming to swear against the Prohibition. The Father, by the Jewish Law, Num. XXX. 4, &c. was allow'd to revoke the Sworn Vows of his Daughter, whilst under his Direction; the Husband of his Wife, the Master of his Servant, if they thought convenient: For otherwise, the Parties here who were to live in obedience, might by swearing and vowing have rendred the power of their Governors wholly useles. Nay, Leo Mutinensis (c) reports, That if any person had entred on an Oath or Vow of what kind soever, and afterwards upon good Reasons repented of it, and if it did not lead to the prejudice of a third party, the reason of his retracting having been produc'd and approv'd, he might by one Rabbin, or three other Men, be absolv'd. Another way there is by which the effect of an Inferior's Oath may be made depend on the pleasure of his Superior; namely, if the Superior so constitute and ordain, that what the Inferior shall swear in such a particular case, shall not be valid till it hath receiv'd his Approbation. And thus in the Civil Law, under the Head of Oaths, (d) it is insert'd as a necessary Caution, That the Right of Superiors is always excepted in the Case of Swearing: or, that all Oaths are to be construed with a Salvo to that Right. Now it is evident in all these Instances, that the relaxation of an Oath can only be made by him who is invest'd with Authority over the Swearer, and with such Authority, as implies in it this degree of Power. And therefore it was of old very properly claim'd and executed by the Roman Emperors: As appears from l. ult. D. ad municipalem, where Antoninus and Verus dispense with a certain Person's Oath, who having sworn never to come into the Assemblies of his Order, was afterwards created Duumvir: Because a Subject cannot by any Oath of his, withhold his Service, when requir'd by the Commonwealth. And so Tiberius, in Sueton (e), granted a Roman Knight the power of being divorced from his Lady, whom he had taken in Adultery with his Son-in-Law, though he had before sworn never to put her away. The Emperor declaring, That the Oath could not be so far extended, as to reach the present Case, where the Wife by so Infamous a Crime had rendred her self unworthy of cohabiting any longer with her Husband. Afterwards the Christian Emperors very frequently delegated the Bishops to preside and to determine in the Affair of Dispensations; that if any Scruple should happen to arise, the opinion of their Sanctity and Goodness might satisfy the Minds of less Intelligent Judges. Yet it is too notorious how extravagantly some Ecclesiasticks, and especially he who pretends to be the Chief of that Order, the Bishop of Rome, have stretch'd this Privilege, and what a Flood of Mischiefs hath overspread the Christian World, from its Abuse. And indeed, since we are to proceed by the Principles of Law in determining what kinds of Oaths may be releas'd, and for what reasons, I know not why the Clergy should assume more Authority in this Point, than the Men of the other Profession.

And farther, sometimes when an Oath cannot be made void on the side of the Swearer, the force and efficacy of it may yet be stop'd by the Superior of the party towards whom the Oath is directed, and who obtains a Right upon it; either by taking this Right from him, or by forbidding him to make use of it in receiving what the other hath sworn to pay. And this may be done either in the way of Punishment, or on account of the Publick Advantage, by virtue of the Superior's Prerogative. In which Case the Swearer is free from all danger of Perjury, because he is not the occasion of the non-performance; and he is releas'd from all necessity of fulfilling his Oath by the Party, who either in a direct, or in a more eminent and extraordinary manner acquir'd a Right by Virtue of it (a). To conclude, a Prince, who upon just Reasons dispenseth with an Oath, doth not commit the least Sin, in thus hindring an Act which was solemnly undertaken with the Invocation of the Divine Majesty, from producing its Regular Effect: tho' the Subject may sometimes incur a Guilt, by rashly using the Name of God to confirm an Act, which he ought to have known was prejudicial to the Right of his Superior.

C H A P. III.

Of the Power of Mankind over Things.

SUCH is the Constitution of Man, that it cannot be preserved by its own Internal Substance, but needs continually to take in the assistance of certain Things from without, as well for its nourishment and support, as for its defence against those many Enemies which seek to ruin and dissolve its Frame. Again, a great part of what the World affords, turns another way to the Service of Mankind, in rendering Life more commodious and more easy (a). (1) Now with regard to these Matters, a multitude of Business and Transactions pass betwixt Men, and large Occasion is administered to Controversies and Strifes: And lest the Common Peace of Mankind should be disturb'd by such Disputes, as the Law of Nature hath with due caution provided, so the Civil Ordinances of most Nations are in this respect found most careful and solicitous. For the full illustration of which Subject, we ought first of all to enquire, by what Right it is that Human Race claim the disposal of other Creatures, whether Animate or Inanimate; for their Use, their Conveniency, or their Pleasure; as likewise on what Principle this power is founded, in respect both of the Creator, and of the Creatures themselves, which Man not only useth, but very often perverts, embezils, and destroys.

II. It is therefore beyond dispute, that Almighty God, inasmuch as he is the Maker and the Preserver of all Things, doth likewise hold, as it were, an Originary and Super-eminent Property over all, and they belong so strictly to Him, as that no one can pretend to the least Right in them, without his permission or consent (b). Yet because he himself stands in need of no Foreign Succour, and because it is not possible for any thing besides to make an Addition to his Happiness; therefore this Goodness inclin'd him to be bountiful and gracious to his Creatures, and to give them the privilege of using each other for their mutual Benefit. But Man especially hath in so extraordinary a manner tasted of the Divine Favour, that all other Creatures are by a Common Strain of Speech, said to have been at first made for his Use and Service. Though this Right of God over all Things is very different from the Right of Men to the same Possessions. So that the Reasoning of Diogenes the Cynick (c) was false and vain, when he thus argued, All Things belong to the Gods ; Wise Men are the Friends of the Gods ; all Things are common amongst Friends ; therefore all Things belong to Wise Men. Yet it is too bold and arrogant a Pretension in some Authors, whilst they tell us, That should any thing fail of turning to the advantage of Mankind, it must follow, that such a Thing was created in vain ; and that 'tis hence apparent, that the whole World is the Common Possession of Human Race, and what they may (if thus taken as a General Body.) not unjustly term their own. This was Aristotle's Mistake ; If then, says he, (a) Nature makes nothing imperfectly, and nothing in vain, she must, of necessity, have made all these Things for the sake of Men. Lucian (b) delivers himself to the same purpose ; Had not Men been created, the consequence of the Omission had been no less than this, That all the Grace and Beauty of the rest of the World, had shone without a Witness or Beholder ; and that the Gods themselves had despis'd their own Wealth, as not worth the enjoying. But certainly the great Frame of the Universe might, in all appearance, have been more compendiously erected and adorn'd, had it been the Intention of its Author, to make nothing but what should in some respect or other serve the Occasions of Men (1). And it was not ill said of Seneca, (c) Nimis nos suspicimus si digni nobis videmur, propter quos tanta moveantur : We are too much taken with the admiration of our own Nature, if we fancy our selves worthy to have all these Glorious Works move only on our account. Yet let this be as it will, thus much is evident ; That Man makes his advantage of other Creatures, by the Grant and Licence of Heaven : As we may apprehend from this easy Argument, That without the use of those Things, Human Life could not be preserv'd ; for which Service, some of them do, as it were, freely deliver themselves up into our Hands. Since then God Almighty hath conferr'd on Man the Priviledge of Life, he is at the same time suppos'd to have allow'd him the use of every thing necessary for the keeping and maintaining of that his Gift. (d) The same Truth is confirm'd by the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, which expressly mention God's investing Man with Power and Dominion, not only over Vegetables, but over every Living Thing, produced either in the Air, in the Earth, or in the Sea (e) (2). Yet this Concession hath not the force of a Command, but only the Allowance or Indulgence of a Priviledge ; which any Person may use so far as he thinks fit, but is not bound to exercise it at all times, and upon all occasions. For otherwise Man would offend against the Divine Law, should he let any Animal go free, or should he neglect any opportunity of bringing the same Creature again under his Subjection ; which no Man in his Wits will affirm. But still this Power of Man over Brute Creatures is of a different Nature from that Dominion or Sovereignty which is exercis'd over Men : Because Brutes are not capable of any Correspondent Obedience, arising from the Obligation ; and because this is a much more absolute Sway, than that with which Men govern each other. The Divine Prohibition to the Jews from feeding on some certain Animals, doth by no means retrench or impair the Right of Men over Beasts ; the Reason of that Injunction seeming to have been taken from Physick (3). Mr. Selden (f) reports it, as the Opinion of the Ancient Rabbins, That Adam was forbidden to eat any manner of Flesh, (God having commanded him to feed on the Herbs of the Field (4) ; but that Noah afterwards was dispens'd with in this Particular, by the Grant in Gen. IX. 3. yet so as to be still under an Obligation to abstain from Blood, and from any Joint or Limb of any Creature taken from it whilst alive (g). The same Author adds, That the Blood of Fishes was excepted from the Prohibition ; nay, that they might eat these Creatures alive, as Oysters, &c. or such of them as died by Chance ; neither of which it was lawful for them to do, with regard to Terrestrial Animals.

III. If in the next place, we consider this Power of Mankind, with respect to the Things themselves, whether Animate or Inanimate, which Men use, and waste, and destroy, that no Injury is hereby offer'd to those Creatures, may clearly be evinc'd, as well from the Nature of Man, as from the Grant and Allowance of God. For it can on no account seem probable, that a Maker of Infinite Goodness, and of Infinite Wisdom, would impose such a Necessity on Man, the Principal of Earthly Creatures, or that he should not be able to preserve himself without injuring others, and consequently without the perpetual Commission of Sin. To which, if we add the express License of God, that must remove all Doubt and Scruple which might otherwise have risen, especially about the Slaughter of Animals. And if there appear any Cruelty or Barbarity in such a Practice, it is sufficiently taken off, by this one Consideration, That their Divine Author hath appointed these his Creatures to such a Condition, and to such a Service in the World ; and hath granted to Men such an Authority over them, which if they exercise (whether by the Deputation, or only by the Permission of God,) they certainly do no Injury. Now as for Vegetables, and other things destitute of Sense, there seems with regard to them, to be no manner of Difficulty in this Point; it being impossible to discover that they suffer any hard Treatment, or unjust Hurt, when they are consum'd by Men; especially, since they must necessarily perish, and be destroy'd, either by Beasts or by the speedy Turn of the Year, and the Change of the Seasons; and farther, since many of them had never been produc'd without Human Pains and Endeavours. The Superstition of the Egyptians in abstaining from certain Pot-herbs, is not of weight enough to give us any stop in the present Determination (a).

IV. But then, as to living Creatures, which are endued with a Sense of their own Being, and cannot leave it without Pain and Trouble, the Point appears in some measure dubious, to many who have consider'd the Liberty of Men against Brutes, only on the Principles of Reason. For, from God's allowing the first Man to have Dominion over other Animals, it doth not presently flow as an evident Consequence, that he was at the same time invest'd with so wide Commission, so infinite a License, as that he might slay them even for unnecessary Uses (b): For Man hath Dominion too over Man, and yet cannot in the least pretend to any such License as this against his Fellows. Nor could Men have complain'd, that the Divine Goodness was sparing towards them, or had made an ill Provision for their Necessities, though they should have been denied a Power over the Life of Animals; at least of such as did not threaten any Hurt or Danger to the Life of Men: inasmuch as the Work of those Creatures in cultivating the Earth, together with what comes from them otherwise, as Milk, Eggs, (such as are not Necessary for the Propagation of the Species,) Wool, and the like, might have been sufficient to sustain Men in a tolerable way of Living. Nor did God by commanding Men to sacrifice them, as a Token of Divine Worship, confer any Power or Privilege of turning them at pleasure into Food. For such things as are lawful to Mankind only by some peculiar Command of God, may still remain unlawful, except in that particular Case. Hence it was that many of the ancient Philosophers utterly disapprov'd of this Practice. For, why should Man on the bare account of superfluous Pleasure, rob an harmless Animal of that Life which it enjoys by the Gift of the same Common Creator? Especially, since even the Example of the fiercest Wild-beasts, of Lyons, Wolves, and other Devourers of Flesh, will do them no Service, if urg'd in their Excuse. For these are so fram'd by Nature, as not to be able to support Life, without feasting on Blood, and to loath and reject that common Provision afforded by the Earth. Whereas Men are not under the like Case of Necessity; receiving very commodious Nourishment from other Food, and being oblig'd to prepare Flesh by dressing or seasoning it, before they can make it agreeable to their Digestion. We hear indeed of some Barbarous Nations, which make use of no Flesh or Fish but what is raw, and support themselves with that; as Rocheport (c) reports of the Coasts on Davis's Streights. But the same Author tells us (d) of the Inhabitants of the Province of Pasto in Peru, That they eat no manner of Flesh; and that if desired but only to taste any, their Answer is, They are not Dogs.

Others have observ'd, in relation to the present Enquiry, that whereas those Animals which Naturally feed on Flesh, have their Fore-teeth oblong, sharp, and divided from each other, that so by closing them with a deeper stroke, they may grind and separate the Prey; Man's Teeth are short, join'd one to the other, and spreading round, after the manner of those Animals which live on Herbs and Fruits: And that on this account we are necessitated to make use of Knives for dividing the Flesh we eat; whilst the Creatures which eat this as their Natural Food, stand in no need of such Assurances or Inventions: That thus we see Children by the bare impulse of Nature, loving Fruit beyond all other Provisions, and preferring Apples, Cherries, and Nuts, to the most exquisite Dainties of Flesh; because in them Nature is not yet corrupted, nor their Appetites debauch'd by ill Customs of Eating (e). It is farther evident, that the fierceness and cruelty of Men, having been first excited, encourag'd and harden'd by the Slaughters of Beasts, afterwards broke out against their own Kind; and those who had taken a delight in destroying the Harmless Race of Dumb Creatures, made it their next step to murder weak and defenceless Men. (f) Diogenes Laertius in his Life of Pythagoras (g) reports that Philosopher to have forbid the killing of Animals, κοινὸν δίκαιον ἡμῖν ἐστὶν ἔσθαι ζῴων, As enjoying the same Common Right of Life and Soul with our selves. This indeed (as the Historian goes on,) was his Pretence: But the true reason of his commanding his Followers to abstain from all Living Creatures, was, that he might exercise and train Men up in a more easy method of Food, by means of which they might always have ready at hand a large provision of Meat, requiring no Fire to dress it; and as much Drink as they had plain Water. For this way of Sustainance he thought most proper to produce Health of

Body, and Quickness of Mind (a). Porphyry (b) is very prolix in attempting to shew, that abstinence from Flesh is in the highest manner the Duty of Philosophers, who place all their Happiness in God, and in the Imitation of the Divine Nature. Amongst a great number of Arguments, the Substance of which hath been for the most part already deliver'd, he endeavours to demonstrate, That all Souls endued with Sense and Memory, are likewise partakers of Reason; and that since we may discover thus much in other Animals, we ought to extend our Justice to them, which consists principally in offering no hurt without due Cause: And that we have a convincing Evidence of the Reason of Brutes, in their being capable of Madness and Distraction. To this time, the Benjans in Cambay, believing the Souls of Men to remove, at Death, into the Bodies of Beasts, never harm any Living Creature, nor dare to turn them into Food: Nay, they have Hospitals erected on purpose, for the reception of diseas'd and maim'd Birds (c). Phil. Baldaeus in his description of the Island Ceylon (d), reports, That the Bramines, even when converted to Christianity, keep their old Method of living; and that if they be encounter'd with that Text of Scripture, To the Clean all things are clean; they reply in another, that, The Kingdom of God is not in Meat and Drink: that they have been ever accusom'd to their light and easy Diet, and find themselves very well upon it. Thus the whole Nation of the Apalchitæ, of old, never tasted Flesh or Fish, 'til they learnt this Custom from the Europeans (e).

V. But, though in these Arguments and Authorities so much ought justly to be commended, as makes for the Encouragement of Temperance and Frugality, and for the hindering the Finer Spirits from being obstructed, and as it were mix'd up with too gross Feeding; yet, that the killing and the eating of Animate Creatures is really not Sinful, may be sufficiently made out on the bare strength of Reason: And the main Evidence seems to be this, That no mutual Right or Obligation passeth between Men and Brutes, nor ought to pass by the Direction of Nature (1). For we neither find

(a) Though Lucian (in somnio seu Gallo) p. 174. tit. 2. bringing him in under the Shape of a Cock, makes him give this Reason of his Opinion: I consider, says he, that if the Precepts I set on foot were common, and such as many had deliver'd before, I should not be able to prevail with the World, to look upon me as any extraordinary Person; but the more strange and unusual the Doctrine should be which I offer'd, the more new and surprizing I should appear, and gain the more Admiration. Add. Jo. Scheffer. de Philosoph. Etal. c. 14.

Plutarch in Grill. Man, with a craving Appetite, drawing all things to himself, trying all things, tasting all things, as being still ignorant of his own Nature, of what is agreeable to it, is the only Creature in the World that lives in general upon every thing which comes to his hands. First, He useth Flesh, without the Excuse of Want or Necessity, when he might at any time gather other Food from the Seeds and Plants, with an inexhaustible and never failing Store. But through Luxury and Disdain of his proper and necessary Provision, he follows strange and polluted Diet, in the Slaughter of Beasts, exceeding the most Savage Creatures in Fierceness and Cruelty: For Blood, and Slaughter, and Flesh are the proper Sustenance of the Kite, the Wolf, and the Dragon, as Fish and Spoon-meat are of Men. The same Author in his Second Oration about the eating of Flesh, among many other things, offers what follows: At first they fed, perhaps, on some wild or hurtful Animal; then on Birds and Fish; 'till their Appetite thus taught and accusom'd, proceeded to the Ox that labours in our Service; to the Sheep that cloaths and adorns us; to the watchful Cock that guards our House. Hence, by degrees, adding Strength and Force to their insatiable Desires, they broke out into the Murder of their Brethren, and the Miseries of Blood and War.

Nicol. Damascenus reports of the Phrygians, That it was a Capital Crime amongst them to kill a labouring Ox, or to steal any Instrument of Agriculture. So Aloys Cadamust in His Voyages, C. 57. 60. tells us, That the People of the Kingdom of Calecut shew the like sacred Veneration to Oxen. And the Nomades, as Diodor. Sic. relates, lib. 3. cap. 32. pag. 165. Ed. Rhodom. gave the Bull and the Cow, as likewise the Ram and the Ewe, the Name of Parents, as affording the daily Support of Life. Strabo l. 15. p. 490. observes of the Brachmans, that they eat the Flesh of those Creatures only, which do not assist Mankind in their Works. Varenius, Descript. Japon. c. 23. reports much the same of the Japones; who are said likewise to profess an Aversion to Blood, and no less to Milk, which they take to be nothing else but white Blood.

We may here likewise by the way, remark, what is urg'd in Plutarch's Symposiac. l. 4. c. 4. to prove that Fish are the most proper Diet. For, says he, as to the Creatures which live with us upon the Earth, supposing them to have no other Common Rights with Mankind, yet at least they receive the same Nourishment, they breath, and wash, and drink as we do; and when we kill them, their piteous Cries make us blush for our Cruelty: Besides that the greatest part of them are made familiar to us, by dwelling and feeding so near. Whereas on the contrary, the Race of Sea-Animals is utterly strange to us, is born, and bred, and lives as 'twere in another World; nor are we restrain'd from killing those Creatures by their Cry, by their Aspect, or by any Service that they can do us. For they can indeed be no way useful in our Business, not being able so much as to live in our Element. Our Earth is a kind of Hell to them; they die almost as soon as they touch it. On the other side, the Pythagoreans, were more averse to eating Fish than any other Animals; the Grounds of which Opinion are examin'd at large by the same Author, Sympos. l. 8. c. 8. So likewise Xiphilin reports, That the Caledonians never tasted Fish; nay, though they had them in great plenty, Epit. Dion. Sever. One of the Reasons there given is this, That other Animals deserve their Death at our hands, by some way or other doing us Mischief; whereas the Fish neither hurt us, nor are able to hurt us. That amongst other Animals, some ought Necessarily to be kill'd, lest by multiplying too fast, they should rob Men of their Sustenance, as Cunnies and Hens. Whereas (again) the Fish, being born, as it were, in another World, give us no Occasion to hurt them: But we are set against them only because our extravagant Greediness and Luxury is supplied by their Destruction. that that the Law of Nature by Virtue of its absolute Authority, commands us to maintain Friendship and Society with Brutes; nor are they capable of sustaining any Obligation towards Men arising from Covenant. From which Defect of all Common Right, there follows, as it were, a State of War, betwixt those, who both are able to hurt each other, and are upon very probable Grounds suppos'd to be willing. And in this State each Party hath Liberty to do to the other, with whom he thus engag'd in Hostility, whatsoever he thinks conducive to his own Interest and Convenience. Yet such a state of War, in which Men stand towards Brutes is very different from that which sometimes ariseth from Men's Clashing amongst themselves: Inasmuch that the Latter is neither universal, nor perpetual, nor extends it self promiscuously to all manner of License against each other. As for the Fiercer Animals, they give evident Proofs of their being plac'd in this Hostile State, whilst upon every Advantage and Opportunity they are ready to exercise their Violence against Men; and he that would have us spare these, doth at the same time require us to put them under fiercer Circumstances, and a more secure Condition than our selves. And then the more mild and gentle Creatures do not offer themselves to the Service of Men, by Virtue of any Obligation, but as they are either bribed by Food, or constrain'd by Force; upon Removal of which Inducements, they will return to their Natural Liberty, and some of them will be so hardy as to assault and encounter Man. Again, others increase so prodigiously, that 'tis necessary for us to retrench their Number, lest we should be our selves reduc'd to a narrow and inconvenient Dwelling (a). 'Tis to no purpose denied by some, that the Lawfulness of hurting and of eating Brute Creatures, may be inferr'd from this Defect of common Right between them and Men: Because (say these Authors) though no Injury be done to the Brutes, yet we injure the Creator of them, (unless we are sure of his Consent) as likewise their Owners or Proprietors. But this Objection is vain and idle: For that very Consideration, that the Divine Creator hath not establish'd a Right common to Men with Brutes, is a sufficient Evidence that He sustains no Injury, when they are hurt by Men; because he himself was pleas'd to ordain this State and Condition between the former and the latter. And, as to the other part of the Objection, 'tis a different Question, Whether Man can do any Injury to a Brute? and whether by the Intervention or Occasion of a Brute, he may injure another Man? The first is only denied by what we are now asserting, and not the second: nor will it be impertinent to the Argument in hand, to add this farther Remark, That since the Tame and Harmless Beasts would be otherwise expos'd an easy Prey to the Violence and to the Hunger of the Wild and Ravenous, their Condition is rather better'd than impair'd by that high degree of Power, which Men exercise over them; which in affording them a constant Provision of Food, doth, as it were, pay them the price of their Life, and likewise protects them against the Assaults of their Savage Enemies (1). Now, what hath been here suppos'd, That there is no Common Right uniting and equally affecting Men and Brutes, others have long since demonstrated (2). Which too is the Reason, (as we may here add by the way,) why Property obtains its Force and Effect only against other Men, and not in like manner against Brutes; inasmuch as they, when they devour what we possess, cannot be said to do us an Injury. Thus God, in the Language of Scripture, (b) Feeds the Birds, even when they consume the Corn produc'd by our Toil and Labour. Yet the Owner of Beasts may sometimes do us Injury or Damage, when they break in and destroy our Harvest; for not keeping them with a stricter care. In one respect indeed, and in a very wide sense, the Beasts themselves may be said to have the same Right with us; when, by the same Right (as it were) by which they invade our Possessions, by the same we drive them from thence.

VII. Yet that the Abuse of this Power, and especially such as is attended with foolish Cruelty and Barbarity, deserves to come under censure is beyond dispute. For, as it is the Interest of particular States, that no Person squander away, or waste and spoil his Possessions; so it turns to the prejudice of the Universal Society of Mankind, and to the Dishonour of GOD, the Giver of so great Gifts, to consume them idly and wantonly, without promoting any Benefit or Advantage of Life. Thus GOD was pleas'd especially to command the Jews, To allow their Cattle a Rest from all Work, on the Seventh-Day (c). Plutarch (d) tells us, The Athenians inflicted a Penalty on a certain Person who had strip'd a Ram of his

CHAP. IV.

Of the Origin of Dominion or Property.

THAT this Power of Mankind over Things ever began to take effect in relation to other Men; (for no Human Property ought to be oppos'd to the Transcendent Right of GOD;) (a) (1) or, that this Indefinite Right was converted into Dominion, by virtue of which ſuch or ſuch a Thing belongs to one Perſon, and to none elſe, is all owing to another Principle: (2) Of which, before we proceed to treat, it ſeems neceſſary to premiſe, that Property and *Communio*n are Moral Qualities, which do not affect the Things themſelves, as to their intrinſick Nature, but only produce a Moral Effect with regard to other perſons: and that theſe Qualities, as all others of the ſame Kind, derive their Birth from Impoſition. And therefore 'tis an idle Queſtion, Whether the Property of Things ariſe from Nature or from Inſtitution? Since we have plain evidence that it proceeds from the Impoſition of Men; and that the Natural Substance of Things ſuffers no alteration, whether Property be added to them, or taken from them.

II. In the next place we ought with due accuracy to weigh and examine what *Communio*n is, and what Property or *Dominio*n. The Term *Communio*n is taken either negatively or poſitively. In the former manner Things are ſaid to be Common, as conſider'd before any Human Act or Agreement had declared them to belong to one rather than to another. In the ſame ſenſe, Things thus conſider'd, are ſaid to be No Body's, rather negatively than privative-ly, i. e. that they are not yet aſſign'd to any particular perſon, not that they are incapable of being ſo aſſign'd. They are likewiſe term'd res in medio quibusvis expoſitæ, Things that lie free for any Taker. But in the poſitive Signification of the Word, Common Things differ from Appropriated only in this reſpect, That the latter belong to one perſon only, the former to many Perſons together, though in the very ſame manner. To proceed, Property or *Dominio*n, is a Right by which the very Substance, as it were of a Thing, ſo belongs to one Perſon, that it doth not, in whole, belong, after the ſame manner, to any other. For we take *Dominio*n and Property to be the very ſame. Though ſome affirm the Right as ſeparated from the Uſe and Profit to be Property, and as join'd with the Uſe and Profit to be *Dominio*n; which nevertheleſs is a difference that doth not perpetually hold. Some again are over-nice, whiſt by Property they underſtand the Thing it ſelf under that Quality by which it belongs to me, and to none beſides; and by *Dominio*n a Right to diſpoſe of the ſaid Thing as I pleaſe, which flows from Property in the manner of an Effect; ſo that the *Dominio*n ſhall be lodg'd in the Perſon, but the Property ſhall ſeem rather to inhere in the Thing (b). In which Diſtinction it is falſly ſuppos'd, that *Dominio*n is as it were the Effect of Property; whereas if a Man thinks it at all neceſſary thus to divide them, the reverſe of this is rather true. For the Right, ſtrictly ſpeaking, inheres in the Perſon, from which the Things themſelves derive ſome kind of Extrinsic Denomination. And this appears ſufficiently evident from hence; that the Right dying with the Perſon, the Things ceaſe to be appropriated, without any change in their Substance, or in other Natural Qualities and Affections.

Now the force of Property is ſuch, that we may at our pleaſure diſpoſe of the Things which we hold by this Right, and may keep any other Person from the use of them; unless he hath obtain'd from us, by Covenant, a particular Right to this purpose: and that therefore whilst they continue ours, they cannot after the same manner, and in whole, be others. I say, after the same manner; for, neither as there is no reason to the contrary, so Custom informs us, that the same Thing may belong to several Persons at once, according to their different ways of holding or owning it. Thus the Commonwealth, the Landlord and the Tenant, by Copy or Lease, may be said each of them to have the Property of the same piece of Ground; the first an Eminent Property (1); the second a Direct (2); and the last an Useful (3). It was added likewise, in whole (4); for many Persons may even in the same way, hold the same thing, yet not in whole, but each according to his determinate share. As is the Case in those Goods which are, without division, possess'd by many together, who all happen to have the same kind of Property with regard to the same thing.

Sometimes we conceive Property to be divided into several parts; or, (if any one likes this Expression better) to admit of several Degrees. For thus 'tis frequently distinguish'd into Plenary and Diminutive. The former is either join'd with what they call Eminent Property, in which manner Civil States, or the Heads and Governors of them possess their Goods; or else disjoin'd from it, and term'd Vulgar; by which a private Man enjoys a full Power of disposing of his Goods, except so far that the Use of them be not under the Direction of the Municipal Laws. Diminution of Property may be made several ways, as that the bare Exercise or Administration of it shall be restrain'd; or that the Profit and Advantage of it shall be lessen'd: Or lastly, that somewhat shall be cut off from the very Property it self. The first happens, when by Covenant, or by Testament, or by the Command and Authority of Law, on account either of the Condition of the Persons, or of the Quality of the Things, or for some other Just Causes, the Alienation of Possessions is either prohibited, or confin'd within certain Limits, yet so as that no Right to the said Possessions, is hereby deriv'd upon others (a). The Advantage of Property is lessen'd, if either the full Use and Enjoyment of my Goods is in the Hands of another, without Loan or Hire; or otherwise if I am bound to allow another some particular Use of them, by way of Service. Lastly, the Property it self is then retrench'd, when we grant to another, besides the full Right of using and enjoying what is ours, a Right likewise of alienating it after a certain manner; and such a right too as is in some sort perpetual. In which Case, he who retains the Property, tho' thus abridg'd and holds a superior Power over the Possession, is said to have a Direct Property; and he who, together with the Right of using and enjoying, partakes likewise of the Property in the manner before describ'd, is said to have an Useful Property in the Possession thus granted to him (b). Where we may observe, by the way, what Limitation ought to be added to that common Rule with the Lawyers, What is already a Man's own, can't become more his own (c). Whence they conclude, that (6) no Pawn, no Charge, no Bargain of Buying, or of letting to Hire can possibly stand, when made to him who is already the Proprietor of the thing thus dispos'd of. As likewise if a Testator happens to bequeath to the Legatee what was his own before, the Act is void and fruitless (7). And so too, that no one (8) can, to any purpose, stipulate or bargain for a thing that will be his own without any such Conditions; with other the like Cases. All which are true, unless it so happen, that a Diminutive Property should, by any of these means, be advanc'd to a greater degree of Plenitude (c).

Farther, since the same Thing may be possess'd either in whole by one, or else by many, without falling under a Division; so that each Person according to his Determinate Share, shall have an equal Right in it; hence it comes to pass that things are, in this respect, distinguish'd into Proper and Common, as the Word Common is taken in its latter Signification; implying that the same thing is by the same kind of Dominion held by several Men, without being divided, or parcell'd out amongst them. And this Communio differs from Property, strictly so called, only with regard to the Subject in which it is terminated and lodg'd, a proper or appropriated thing belonging to one Person alone, a common thing to several, but not with regard to the manner or the vertue of the Dominion; for many Persons have the same Right over a common thing, as a single Person hath over a proper thing; and as the Propriety of a thing appertaining to One only, excludes all others from an equal Right in the same thing, so a common thing excludes all others but those to whom it is said to be common. Now since neither of these Commoners hath a Right extending it self to the whole Thing, but only to a part of it, tho' suppos'd to remain undivided; it is manifest that no one Person can, by his own Right, dispose of the thing entirely, but only according to his fixt Proportion: and that if any Resolution is to be taken, any Bargain to be made about the whole, the Consent and Act of each Commoner is necessarily required. Ziegler (a), Felden (b), and Bœcler (c), in their Observations on Grotius, have all confounded Negative Communion with Positive: on account of which Mistake, many Arguments have been thrown away to no purpose, in discussing this Point; as will appear hereafter. What Seneca hath deliver'd about the several kinds of Communion, may not be impertinent to our present Subject (d). I hold all things, says he, in common with a Friend, not as I do with a Sharer, so that one part should be mine, and another part his; but as Children are common to their Father and Mother, who, supposing the Children to be two, are not said to have each one, but each both. The Knight's Seats belong to all that Order, yet in them, by taking Possession of a place, I appropriate it to my self. And if I resign this place to another Person, though he had an equal Right to it, yet it seems to be my Gift. Some things belong to some Men under a certain Condition. Thus, again, I have a place in the Knight's Seats, not to sell, not to let out, not to make my Home, but barely to sit in whilst I am a Spectator. It will be no Falsity then, if I should say, I have a place in the Knight's Seats; yet if they happen to be full when I come into the Theatre, I both have a place there by Right, because I am allow'd to use them; and I have not a place, because it is already possess'd by those who had a common Right to it with my self.

III. From what hath been offer'd, 'tis Evident that as well positive Communion, as Propriety, doth imply the Exclusion of others from the Thing thus said to be either common or proper, and consequently doth presuppose more Persons in the World than one. As then, if there were but a single Man upon Earth, it could by no means be said, that things were appropriated to him: so those things, from the use of which no Person is excluded, or which belong no more to any one, than to another, are to be stiled common, in the former, not in the latter sense of the Word. And thus it appears in what respect we may attribute the Dominion of things to Adam, whilst he yet stood alone in the World. Namely, although by reason of the vast Extent of the Earth, and his small Occasions, he needed to apply to his Service but a very inconsiderable Portion of things; yet supposing him to have had Inclination, and likewise Ability and Convenience, to turn all that God had given him to his own use, there was no Right of others to oppose or hinder him. Therefore the Right of Adam over things, was of a different kind from that Dominion which is now settled amongst Men: We may call it an indefinite Dominion, not formally possess'd, but absolutely allow'd; not Actual, but Potential (1). It had indeed the same Effect which Dominion now obtains; that is, the using things at pleasure; yet was it not Dominion, strictly speaking, by reason that there was no other Person against whom this Effect might prevail; but 'twas capable of passing into Dominion, when the Number of Mankind should afterwards increase. And thus on the whole, whilst Adam was the only Man, things in respect of him were neither proper nor common. For Community suppoeth a Partner in the Possession; and Propriety denotes an Exclusion of the Right of others to the thing enjoy'd: so that neither of them can be understood, 'till the World was furnish'd with more than one Inhabitant.

IV. But farther, it ought no less carefully to be observ'd, that the Grant of Almighty God, by which he gave Mankind the use of Earthly Provisions, was not the immediate Cause of Dominion, as this is directed towards other Men, and with relation to them takes Effect: (which is evident likewise from hence, that even Brutes, by the Divine Permission, use and consume the Fruits of the Earth, and yet they are certainly incapable of Dominion:) But that Dominion necessarily presupposeth some Human Act, and some Covenant either Tacit or Express. GOD indeed authoriz'd Mankind to apply to their Service and Convenience the Earth, with the Product of it, and the Living Creatures upon it; or, he gave Man an indefinite Right to all these Possessions: But still it was left to their own Choice and Disposal what Manner, what Degree, what Extent they would fix to this Power: That is, whether they would circumscribe it with certain Bounds, or leave it unconfind; as likewise whether they would allow each Person a Right to all things, or only to one and the same determinate part of things; or whether they would assign to every particular Man his own Portion, with which he should rest contented, and pretend no Right or Claim to any thing besides (e). 'Tis in vain therefore to dispute whether God conferr'd the Dominion

(1) Mr. Barbeyrac in his Translation expresses himself more clearly, by saying Adam's Right over things was rather the Foundation of Property, than actually Property it self. (e) Ambros. Off. l. 1. c. 28. Nature pour'd out all things in common to all Men: For so God commanded the whole Stock of Things to be produced, that Men should have a general Supply of Sustenance, and should hold the Earth as a general Seat. Common Right therefore was the Work of Nature; Private and Peculiar Right, the Work of long Use and Possession. Add. Selden. de J. N. & G. Sec. Heb. l. 6. c. 1.

over things on our first Parents, as the Representatives of all Human Race (1); or whether he gave it them as their own Peculiar, and so as to terminate in their single Persons; that they by their own proper Right, should hold the Lordship of the whole World, and that all other Mortals should owe their private Dominion to their Bounty and Favour. For that Divine Grant only confirm'd Men in a fuller Assurance of the Goodness of their Maker towards them, and satisfy'd them that 'twas his pleasure, they should dispose of other Creatures for their own Use and Service. But it was left to the Reason of Men to determine what Measures should be taken to prevent any Discord that might arise amongst them from the Exercise of this Right. But we can by no means say, That there was any universal Rule and Manner of Possessing prescrib'd by God himself, which all Men should be oblig'd to observe. Therefore things were rendred neither proper nor common (that is, in a positive Communion,) by the express Command of God: but this Matter was afterwards adjusted by the Disposal of Men, according as the Peace of Human Society seem'd to require. Whence, those Authors must needs be under a Mistake, who deliver themselves in so gross Terms as these: The Division of things belongs to the Law of Nature; that is, it doth not only receive its Rise and Foundation from Nature, so as afterwards to be turn'd into Law by the Consent of Mankind; but Nature herself frames and compleats this Law by her own Act and Authority. And again, The Division of things is one Command of the Decalogue; that is, one Head of the Law of Nature. For he that said, Thou shalt not steal, in effect said, Let there be a Property and Distinction of things; let every one hold what is his own, and not covet what is anothers (a). For there is no Precept of Natural Law to be discover'd, by which Men are enjoin'd to make such an Appropriation of things, as that each Man should be allotted his particular Portion, divided from the Shares of others. Though the Law of Nature doth indeed sufficiently advise the introducing of separate Assignments, as Men should appoint, according to the Use and Exigencies of Human Society; yet so as to refer it to their Judgment, whether they would appropriate only some particular things, or whether they would possess some things without bringing them to a Division, and leave the rest as they found them, only forbidding any particular Man to challenge them to himself alone. Hence too, the Law of Nature is suppos'd to approve and confirm all Agreements made by Men about the Possession of things, provided they neither imply a Contradiction, nor tend to the Disturbance of Society. Therefore the Property of things flow'd immediately from the Compact of Men, whether tacit or express. For although after the Donation of God, nothing was wanting but for Men to take Possession; yet that one Man's seizing on a thing should be understood to exclude the Right of all others to the same thing, could not proceed but from Mutual Agreement (2). And though Right Reason mov'd and perswaded Men to introduce distinct Properties, yet this doth not hinder, but that they might derive their Rise and Original from Human Covenant.

V. Thus much being premis'd, it is manifest, that antecedently to any Act or Agreement of Men, there was a Communion of all Things in the World; not such as we have before term'd Positive, but a Negative Communion: that is, all Things lay free to any that would use them, and did not belong to one more than to another. But since Things could afford no Service to Men, were we not allow'd to lay hands at least on Fruits and Products of them, and since this would be to no purpose if others might lawfully take from us, what we had before actually mark'd out for our own Use: Hence we apprehend the first Agreement that Men made about this Point, to have been, that what any Person had seiz'd out of the Common Store of Things, or out of the Fruits of them, with design to apply to his Private Occasions, none else should rob him of. (b) This may be illustrated by the Case of Beasts, amongst which none can claim a peculiar Right to any thing above others; but each satisfies his Appetite with what he first meets with in his way: And if any of them hath been so provident as to lay up a Stock for future use, the rest are under no obligation to forbear invading and plundering it: inasmuch as no Agreement can have pass'd amongst them, which might lodge the Chief Right to any Thing in the first Taker.

The Author of the Treatise de Principiis justitiae & decori (c) hath advanc'd somewhat on this Subject, which may serve to set it in a fuller Light. He supposeth beforehand, that Man may lawfully possess and use Creatures void of Reason; and thence infers, that since Men are by Nature Equal, all must have an Equal Right to the Creatures (3); there being in respect of the Creatures themselves no Rule assigning one part to me, and another to my Neighbour: What remains then, but that the distinction and division of Goods must be deduc'd from Compact? But forasmuch as all Human Institutions and Ordinances are made with the exception of extreme Necessity, therefore when so desperate a Case happens, the Primitive Right to all things

(1) Sr. Robert Filmer maintains this with some Warmth, and makes use of it to prove the absolute Power of Sovereigns, which, as he says, comes by Succession from the Sovereign Authority of Adam. See Mr. Barbeyrac's First Note upon this Sect. (a) Vid. Bæcler. ad Grov. in præfat. p. 9. (2) Mr. Barbeyrac in his Second Note upon this Sect. confutes at large this our Author's Notion. revives : because in the Common Agreement for the Division of Things, every one is suppos'd to have renounc'd his Right to those Things which were allotted to others with this reserve and restriction, Unless I am unable otherwise to compass my own preservation. My Calamity doth not give me a Right to those Things to which I had none before ; but the extremity of my danger makes that Condition cease, under which I gave up my first Right. For the same Reason, it is lawful in War to seize the Goods of the Enemy : because all Compacts being dissolv'd, the Original Right returns. He adds, p. 110. That before the settling of Covenants, first Occupancy did not by its own force confer any Right. Because first, in whatever Neccessitous Condition I was plac'd, I could then have no Right to recall these Goods to my own use ; this privilege taking place only in Goods which I voluntarily resign'd to my Neighbour : but there are not many persons to be met with, who would allow such a Prerogative to things thus acquired.

If First Occupancy of it self conferr'd a Right exclusive of all others, it would follow, that even in a Case of necessity, Goods thus attain'd, could not be made use of by any other Person than the Possessor : Because the Right of Necessity follows from an Exception added to the first Compact about the division of Goods ; but we before suppos'd that no such Compact had pass'd about Things which came into Mens possession by these means. It being then absurd and unreasonable, that a Person reduc'd to Extremity, should not be allowed to use what another hath by Occupancy made his own ; it follows, that the Right by virtue of which Occupancy fixeth a Property, is likewise owing to Covenant. Though this Argument is at the best but very feeble (1).

He proceeds Secondly to affirm, That there is in Nature no more reason why Men should desire a Right from the first Occupancy of Things, than from the first discovery of them with the Eye. Therefore the difference must arise from the Institution of Men, ordaining, that the Right to a piece of Land, for instance, should be in him who first took possession of it, not in him who saw it before others. Thirdly, he says, Let us suppose Two Men, one swift, and one slow of Foot, 'tis evident what an ill match'd Couple we have here, as to the Business of acquiring Property ; and, by consequence, that the Right by which he who first seizeth the Thing, in this Case, should be the true Owner of it, is not borrow'd from Nature, but from Implicit Covenant or Agreement. He might have said more briefly, upon supposition that all Men had originally an equal power over Things, we cannot apprehend how a bare Corporal Act, such as Seizure is, should be able to prejudice the Right and Power of others (2), unless their Consent be added to confirm it : that is, unless a Covenant intervene. What the same Author disputes farther, (a)

That in the Primitive State one Man might have brought the whole World under his subjection ; is vain and idle, and is confuted by Mr. Hobbes himself ( b ).

VI. To proceed, Men left this Original Negative Communion, and by Covenant settled distinct Properties, not at the same time, and by one single Act, but by successive degrees, according as either the Condition of Things, or the Number and the Genius of Men seem'd to require. Thus the Scythians of old appropriated only their Cattle, and the Furniture of their Houses ; leaving their Land in its Primitive Communion ( c ). Indeed the Peace and Tranquillity of Mankind, for which the Law of Nature appears especially concern'd, gave no obscure Intimation, what would be most convenient for Men to appoint in this Affair. For that each Man should retain an equal power over all Things, or that the Universal Provision should be laid in Common, ready for the promiscuous use of every Person, was not consistent with the safety and quiet of Human Race ; especially after they were multiplied into considerable Numbers, and had cultivated and improv'd the Method of Living. (3) Because there could not but arise almost Infinite Clashings, (4) from the desire of many Persons to the same Thing, which was not able to satisfy them all at once ; it being the Nature of the greatest part of what the World affords, to be incapable of serving more than one Man at the same time. As for the precise Order, and the particular Causes of Things passing into Properties, I conceive we may thus come to an apprehension of them. Most Things of immediate use to Men, and which are applied to the ends of Nourishment and Cloathing, are not by bare unassisted Nature produc'd every where in so great abundance, as to yield a plentiful supply to All. As often therefore as two or more should want the same Thing which could not content them all together ; and should endeavour to seize and secure it for themselves, so often there must arise a most probable occasion of Quarrels and Hostilities. Again, many Things stand in need of Human Labour and Culture, either for their Production, or to fit and prepare them for Use. But here, it was very inconvenient that a Person who had taken no pains about a Thing should have an equal Right to it with another, by whose Industry it was either first rais'd, or exactly wrought and fram'd, to render it of farther service. It was highly conducive then to the Common Peace, that immediately upon the multiplication of Mankind, Properties should be appointed in Movable Things, especially such as require the Labour and Improvement of Men ; and in those Immoveables which are of immediate and necessary use, as Houses, for Instance ; so that the Substance of them should belong either separately to particular Persons, or to such a number of Men as had by peculiar Covenant agreed to hold them in the way of Positive Communion. Farther, although there appears some reason in these Things, why they should rather belong to some than to others, yet the Dominion or Property of them, such as implies the exclusion of all Persons besides, was to be confirm'd at least by tacit Compact (1): and this tacit Compact involv'd a tacit Cession of the rest of Mankind; intimating, that whatever had been assign'd for any ones private share, they would never challenge any Right or Title to, upon pretence of its receiving its matter, or its nourishment from the Earth, the Common Habitation of Men. As for those Immoveables which Nature produc'd, without the concurrence of Human Industry, that is, Lands, since they were so widely extended, as abundantly to satisfy the small number of the first Men; so much of them was from the Beginning taken into Possession, as Men thought convenient for their present Occasions; the rest being left in its Natural and Negative Communion, to be possess'd by any Person that should afterwards think fit to use it. Here therefore we must conceive a Covenant to have pass'd to this Effect; that those Lands which had been assign'd to particular Men by the express Agreement of the rest, or such as the rest were suppos'd to have resign'd all their Title to, by permitting a single Person quietly to enjoy, and by taking to themselves other Lands in the same manner, should belong to the Manurers and Improvers of them: and that what remain'd should pass into the Property of those who would afterwards fix upon it (a).

VII. That the settling distinct Properties turn'd to the real Benefit and Advantage of Men, when grown more numerous, may be illustrated from the same Arguments which Aristotle (b) brings to overthrow the Platonick Communion of Goods. Though indeed his Design was to refute a positive Communion; whereas our Enquiry proceeds about the Reasons inclining Men to quit that Communion which we have already shewn to be Negative (c). If, says he, Men labour'd in common, and laid up all they got in one Heap, out of which they were freely to take for their Support, 'tis *impossible but that Heats and Quarrels should arise from the Inequality which must be observ'd between some Men's Getting and Spending. In general (as he well remarks) the living together, and upon the same Stock and Maintenance, is grievous and uneasy. Which is the Reason that we are never so highly displeas'd with other Persons, as with our Servants and family Dependants, who are continually under our Eye. But now upon the introducing of Property, all these Complaints are silenc'd; every one grows more Industrious in improving his peculiar Portion; and Matter and Occasion is supplied for the Exercise of Liberality and Beneficence towards others. It were better therefore that Goods should be made proper as to the Possession, and should be Common only in the Use. Again, To consider a thing as our own, raiseth the Pleasure we take in enjoying it (d). To gratify and assist a Friend, a Guest, or a Companion, fills us with sensible Satisfaction and Delight; and this we cannot do, unless we have a separate Share of Good things to our selves. Besides, since there are few things which can be made use of by all Men at once, when many Persons should happen to set their Mind on the same Object, which could not suffice them together, they must of Necessity fall out; were not the desired Object already assign'd to a particular Owner. It must be confess'd, these Reasons did not weigh so much with Sir Tho. Moor and Campanella, as to hinder them from setting up a Communion of Goods, the former in his Utopia; the latter in his Realm of the Sun: It being much more easy to fancy perfect Men than to find them (2). But farther, we may hence too discover the Falsity of that Vulgar Saying, Meum and Tuum are the Cause of all the Wars and Quarrels in the World. For on the contrary the Distinction of Meum and Tuum was rather introduc'd to prevent all Contention (e). But that infinite Field of Hostilities and Strifes, ariseth only from hence, That the Avarice of Men is ever aiming to break through those Bounds of Meum and Tuum, which have been by Law or Covenant establish'd (f).*

VIII. Though what hath been here deliver'd seems plain and evident, yet we think it not impertinent to examine more largely the Opinions of some Ancient and some Modern Writers on this Subject. Amongst the former, Diodorus Siculus (a) reports, That the first Earth-born Men led a wild and irregular Life, went out in Herds to seek their Food, which consisted of the most juicy Herbs, together with such Fruits as the Trees spontaneously produc'd: But not knowing how to bring their Provision together, and to lay up a Store for future use, many perish'd during the Winter, purely through the Inclemency of the Air, and partly through want of Sustenance; 'till by degrees gaining Instruction from Experience, they began to retire into Caves in the Cold Season, and to reserve a sufficient Stock of such Fruits as were fit for keeping: Some new Advantage or Improvement being every day added to Life (b). This Hypothesis concerning the Origin of Mankind, tho' false, being taken for granted, it follows, that Men in the Beginning liv'd upon the Supplies of Nature, in common; afterwards settling by Covenant the Property of Houses, and of Fruits treasur'd up for future Service, till by slow Advances the Appropriation of Land was likewise introduc'd. To the same purpose is frequently alledg'd what Justin (c) relates of Saturn, King of the Aborigines, who, he tells us, was so remarkable for exact Justice, As that no Person under his Reign, liv'd in a Condition of Slavery, or held any private Possession; but all things, like one universal Patrimony, lay undivided, and in common to all. That is, God Almighty gave the World in common to Men, that they should live freely together, not that furious Avarice should claim the whole Store to it self, or that any one should want what was produc'd for the sake of all. This Saying of the Poet we ought not to take so strictly, as to imagine that in those Times there was no private Possession; but in a Figurative Sense, so usual in those Compositions; giving us to understand, that Men were so generous and liberal, as not to shut up to themselves the Fruits of the Earth, or to lie hovering over a conceal'd and separate Store; but that they admitted their poorer Neighbours to the common Enjoyment of what they had gotten by their own Pains. But indeed as no sensible Person will let the Poet persuade him, that these primitive Mortals had omnia in medium quaesita, or a positive Communion of Goods; so the Reason which Lactantius assigns to those Expressions, doth not in our Judgment appear satisfactory: For as on the one side, Men were not then perhaps greatly inclin'd to Covetousness, being yet ignorant of Wealth, and finding an easy Supply of Food from Nature's Store, whilst they remain'd Strangers to Delicacies and Excess; so, on the other side, we do not see what matter they could have for Bounty, when there was no Occasion to scrape up Treasure. 'Tis a good Consideration that some recommend to us, in order to a right Understanding of the whole Fable of the Golden Age; that the Dispositions of Rustick and Barbarous People make them almost Natural Friends to Ease and Laziness, and Enemies to Labour. That the more rude and simple way of Life any Persons are engag'd in, the less inclinable they would be to Plenty and Luxury, to Magnificence and Splendor; which commonly require much Industry and Pains (a). And that lastly, 'tis the general Vice of Old Persons, to commend the Times of their Young and Flourishing Days, to despise, for the most part, present things, and what they see before them; extolling whatever comes mark'd with the Advantages of Age: And that therefore it seems very probable, those rude and ignorant Men, when the Legislators compell'd them to a Life of Manners and of Industry (1), might be very uneasy under the Change, and frequently send out a Wish for their Acorns and their Idleness. From which Complaints of their Old Sires, Posterity might frame their Dreams about the Golden Age. This Conjecture is strengthen'd by the Character which Salust (b) gives of the Aborigines, the People of those primitive Times; They were, says he, a Clownish Race of Men, without Laws or Government, tied up to no Order or Rule. And Ovid himself placeth the Happiness of the Golden Days chiefly in this; That Men obey'd Faith and Honesty without Law; and fear'd no Punishment, because no Civil Societies were yet establish'd.

'Tis the part of Justice to distinguish between Things Common and Particular, and to use them accordingly. Now nothing is private by Nature, but as it becomes so, either by Ancient Possession, as appropriated by the first Occupant, or by Conquest, upon the Right of Arms; or else by Law, Agreement, Condition, or Lot. Hence come the Names of the Arpinate and the Tusculan Lands.
And in like manner are Private Possessions settled and describ'd. Since therefore the Things which Nature made common, have by this means been his Lot: Whoever covets more than this, shall be deem'd to have violated the Law of Human

The same Author hath told us as much in Prose: Nature, saith he, hath made us Lords and Proprietors of nothing; but obtaining by Law and Succession the use of Things, for an uncertain Period, we pass for the ἀνεργόνοιο δαωόται, the Temporary Masters or Possessors of them; and when the appointed Term is over, then another receives them from our Hands, and enjoys the same Name and Title. But indeed these kind of Speeches refer rather to the Instability of Fortune and of Human Possessions, than to the Original of Property (a).

IX. We proceed to examine Grotius's Opinion; (b) in which we shall pass over what he delivers contrary to the receiv'd Doctrine of the Church, as sufficiently refuted by other Hands. He tells us then, That God conferr'd on Mankind a Right in General to Things of this inferior Nature, both immediately upon Creation of the World, and again upon the repairing of it after the Flood. This we allow in the following Sense, that God empower'd Mankind to use these Earthly Things, in a General Manner; that is, without determining whether they ought to possess, either under Division, or in Common, all, or only some Things; but leaving this whole Matter to the Judgment and the Choice of Men, to settle it according as they should think most convenient for the publick peace and welfare. But we ought by no means to suppose, that any positive Communion was at the beginning instituted by Divine Appointment; from which Men afterwards departed by their own Decree; for, on the contrary, with regard to Almighty God, Things were rather laid, as a Free Stock, to be us'd in any Service that Men should apply them to. Amongst whom, so long as the very Substances of Things were not assign'd to particular Persons, we must conceive this Tacit Compact to have prevailed, that every Man should take for his Occasions whatever he pleas'd, especially of the Fruits, and should consume what was in its Nature consumable. And such a Universal Use of Things supplied, in some sort, the room of Property; and what any Person had thus taken for himself, none could deprive him of, without Injustice. Now as the Simile borrow'd from the Theatre, which Grotius produceth, fitly enough illustrates this Matter (c), (1) so his other Instance of the Aborigines is not applicable, as Justin describes them (2). For the Historian's Words represent some positive Communion, quite different from the Primitive; as if that whole Country was indeed the possession of the People, but not yet divided into private Estates; whilst Men rested satisfied with the Fruits produced without their Assistance, such as the vast extent of the Lands and Woods afforded them in great abundance, their Number being as yet inconsiderable: But that they gathered these Fruits into a Common Store doth not seem probable. Thus far Grotius (3) is in the right, that were the first Negative Communion to continue, without disturbing the general peace, Men must live with great plainness and simplicity, contented to feed on what they found, to dwell in Caves, and either to go naked, or to cover their Bodies with the Barks of Trees, and the Skins of Beasts: Whereas, if they grew more inclined to a Life of Elegance and Refinement, the Conveniencies of which must be acquir'd by Diligence; there was a necessity of introducing distinct Properties. But when he adds, That this Communion might have lasted, had Men liv'd under the Influence of an Eminent Charity and Friendship towards each other; He confounds Negative Communion with Positive; such as was observed by the Essenes of old, (d) by the Primitive Christians inhabiting Jerusalem, and by those who now follow an Ascetick Life (e): For this can neither be constituted nor kept up, except amongst a few Persons, and those endued with singular Modesty and Goodness. When Men are scattered into different places, and fixed at a distance from each other, 'twould be a foolish Labour to gather all the Provision into one heap, and to distribute it out of the Common Mass. And where-ever there is a great multitude of People, many must of necessity be found, who through Injustice and Avarice, will refuse to maintain a due Equality, either in the Labour required for the getting of the Fruit, or afterwards in the Consumption of them. Plato insinuates as much as this (f), when he makes only Deities, and the Sons of Deities, Members of the Republick where he would have this Communion absolutely obtain. But 'tis idle to believe, that when Men were divided into numerous Families, they either actually established, or had any design to establish such a Communion (a). Lastly, It's a true Remark of Grotius, (1) That Things were at first turn'd into Property, not by the bare Act of the Mind, or by Thought and Inward Inclination. For neither could others know what any Person intended to keep for his own, to direct them in abstaining from it; and besides, 'twas very possible that many should be Competitors for the same Thing. There was need therefore of some External Act, or of formal Seisin, which that it might be capable of producing a Moral Effect, or an Obligation in others to forbear what each Man had thus taken for his peculiar, must necessarily have depended on the force of some precedent Covenant: When Things which lay together in Common were to be parted amongst many, then the Business was transacted by Express Covenant. But a Tacit Covenant was sufficient, when Men fix'd a property in Things which the first Dividers had left for waste. For we must suppose them to have agreed, that whatever in the Primary Partition had not been assigned to any particular Owner, should belong to him who first took possession of it.

X. Amongst the other Moderns, many, as to the Origin of Property, establish a quite contrary Notion. Let us take the pains to see what strength their Arguments afford. They acknowledge then a double Sense of the Term Communion, so as to import either that which being undivided, and having its Property fix'd in many together, affords a Common Service to each Person; or that which being in no manner appropriated, lies free for the promiscuous Use of all. But then they exclude from the Primitive State of Things, not only the former Communion, (which is no more than we have done,) but likewise the latter; and so deny that Things were in the beginning expos'd as a general Store, void of Property in every kind; and therefore (which is the consequence of this) that Properties sprung originally from Division, and from first Possession. The Reason they lay down is to this purpose; Whatever Right that was, which either in Kind or Degree the first Man enjoy'd over other Creatures, he receiv'd it all in that very manner from his Creator. If therefore he receiv'd a bare Power of using, without any settled Property, his Descendants could not afterwards usurp a Property, without incurring the Guilt of unlawful and covetous Desire, and of arrogating that to themselves, which their Maker had forbid them to assume. The Answer to this is easy, from what hath been formerly advanced: Man receiv'd indeed, by the Divine Donation, a Right to Things; but such a Right as was Indefinite, General, and Indifferent, neither restrain'd to Property, nor to Communion; and such as Men might reduce, as it were, into any particular Form, according as Reason or Necessity should advise. Whence it is also clear, that the Primitive

Communion did not denote a bare Usus fructus, but Men were at their liberty to quit it by Agreement, and to establish either Property or Positive Communion in its stead. Nor is this any consequence; the First Man did not receive or assume a Right to Things in the Formal Nature of Property, therefore his Posterity could not exercise it, under that Formality. Neither doth that Divine Grant express'd in Holy Scripture, describe any determinate manner of Property, but only an indefinite Right of applying Things to such Uses as should be agreeable to the Wisdom, and to the Occasions of Men; which Right may be exercis'd full as well in a Negative Communion, as in a Positive. Besides, 'tis not fair thus to conclude; Men receiv'd a Right to Things from the Donation of God, therefore Property did not first arise from Occupancy and Division. For this Donation of God only gave Men full security and satisfaction that 'twas consistent with the Divine Will they should consume on their Necessities, the Works of their Common Maker. But Property, strictly so called, ought to have produc'd this Effect, in relation to other Men, that none else should invade what had been adjudg'd to one particular Possessor. And here certainly there was need of some Human Act and Agreement, that others might know what belong'd to every distinct Person, so as to quit all Pretensions to it, when thus appropriated before. A Theatre is erected by the State for the Common Use of the Subjects: But that in the time of the Show, this or that Person should obtain a particular Seat, of which others ought not to deprive him, is owing to some Corporal Act, that is, to his first seizing upon it. Nay, each Person, may with the consent of the Publick, acquire a Seat which he shall hold by a perpetual Right. Thus, before any Human Act had pass'd capable of introducing Property, every Thing must be conceiv'd to have lain free and Common (in a Negative Sense) to all; that is, not to have appertained to one rather than to another. But when Divisions were establish'd by Express, or Possessions confirm'd by Tacit Covenant, then Things pass'd out of this Negative Communion, into settled Properties.

If any will come so low as to assert, That by the Dominion which God conferr'd on Men antecedently to any Acts of theirs, is meant only a Potential Dominion, or a Power of taking and possessing; and consequently no more than a Dominion, in actu primo; from which they pass'd on to Possession, and from Possession to Dominion, in actu secundo: These Men differ from our Opinion in Words only, not in Sense. Yet in this respect they are not sufficiently accurate, that call the Power of entring upon Things, Dominion in actu primo; and the Right which follows Possession, Dominion in actu secundo. For the Power of acquiring any Right, and the Right it self now habitually inhering, yet without Operation or Exercise, are different things. As 'tis quite another case to be a Musician Potentially, and not to use the Art, when the Habit of it hath been fully attain'd. Nor is their Potential Dominion very aptly illustrated by the Example they bring of Inheritances; the Dominion of which, upon the Testator's Death, passeth out of the Habit, or Power, directly and immediately upon the Heir, without the Formality of taking possession. For, besides that to pass, out of a Habit, or, out of Power, is by no means the same thing; there is always a Fiction of Civil Law conceiv'd to interpose in the Case which they alledge. 'Tis the Rule of Nature, that in the transferring of Dominion from one to another, it shall be requisite for the former Person to tender what is thus convey'd, and for the latter to accept and receive it. But inasmuch as the Laws have consented, that the Will of the Testator shall remain uncertain and changeable 'till his last Breath, and shall be accounted secret 'till after his decease; they therefore hold, as 'twere in suspense, the Will of the Deceas'd Person importing the conveyance of Goods on his Heir, 'till such time as the Heir shall have signified his Acceptance; or, (as some may chuse to express it) they bring back the Heir's Acceptance to the Moment in which the Testator expired, his Will being then properly fix'd and settled; so that from that time the Goods are conceiv'd to pass immediately to the Heir, as deliver'd to Him. This Fiction produceth so far the Effect of Dominion in the Heir, as that he may challenge the Inheritance, even before he is actually possess'd of it ( 1 ). And without such a Fiction, the Dominion would no more be long to a Man in an Inheritance before Actual Entrance, than it doth in a Donation before Acceptance. And hence too, amongst Persons who live only under the direction of the Law of Nature, which is for the most part unacquainted with these Fictions introduced by Civil Constitutions, there will be no admittance given to any Potestative Possession as oppos'd to Actual; nor will the bare Right and Power of acquiring Possession, obtain the Name of Possession it self ( 2 ).

XI. Many have thought fit to appeal to the Authority of Scripture in this Point; whence they have suppos'd that it may be made evident, that there never was any such Communion as we have asserted, in the World. They tell us, That the Universal Mass of Things pass'd immediately to Adam, by virtue of the Divine Donation, so that he held it as his own proper and entire Possession. The force of which Propriety was such, that it not only excluded all others from the Universal Possession which he enjoy'd, but likewise from the Right of taking to themselves any one particular thing. Insomuch that even his Children could claim no Property, so long as they continued in the Family of their Father, unless he convey'd somewhat to them in the manner of a peculium, or Separate Stock: That they became Proprietors, first, by possessing that share which he assigned them, when dismis'd from under his Tuition; and afterwards, upon his Death, by dividing his Store amongst themselves (a). They explain their Notion in this manner: *The Form of God's Grant conferr'd a Right only on the Primitive Pair, before they had Children. Therefore either the Property of Things was given to Adam and Eve originally, so that their Descendants were to derive from them all their Title to any Possession; or else the whole World was, in the Person of Adam, bestow'd in common on all Mankind. The latter of these as it implies several difficulties, so it is particularly repugnant to the Right of Occupancy, which obtains only in Things void of a Possessor. For if the Entire Mass was given to all Mankind, it doth not appear, how a particular person could by seizing any thing to himself, convert it into his distinct Property, exclusive of Human Race in general, or, so as to hinder Men from making any Pretensions to it by vertue of their Common Right. For such is the Nature of Things which lie in Common, and which admit only of undivided shares, that every single Atom of their Substance is no less common, and no less undivided, than the whole; so that if any private Man apply it to himself alone, he is an Injurious Robber of the Community. But now, they who defend a Primitive Communion, confess that the first Occupants of Things did by that Act acquire such a distinct Right over those Things, as excluded the Right of all others to the same. What Reply may be made to all this, is evident from the Assertions already confirm'd. The Divine Donation confer'd on Man a Right of applying other Creatures to his use; which Right was indifferent to Positive Communion, or to Property; being of necessity to be turn'd into one of these before it could take any Effect with relation to other Men. And therefore when others add further, That the Common or Publick Dominion of Mankind over Things was given by God, under Condition, that they should parcel it out, and constitute it private; for which reason, it neither can, nor ought to be conceiv'd without a respect and tendency towards Private Dominion, so to be established as was agreeable to a Rational and a Social Nature: This we may without any inconvenience interpret on our side. That is, God by his first Grant plac'd Things in a Negative Communion: But since that was unable to procure the safety and peace of Society, when Human Race was multiplied, and Life began, by the Arts of Industry, to be polish'd and improved, Men easily apprehended that 'twas the Divine Pleasure they should introduce Distinct Properties. In order to the Actual settlement of which, it was requisite that some Transactions and Agreements of Men should precede. For that a Thing should be appointed by the Will of God, and yet should not be introduced but by some antecedent Compact of*

Men, ought not to be look'd on as an inconsistency: As it is certainly none, that God would have Mankind propagated by Marriage, not by uncertain Lust; and yet Marriage is not actually contracted between particular Persons without some Covenant passing before. Farther, since positive Communion and Property both imply a relation to other Men, it can with no manner of accuracy be said, That all created Things were proper to Adam; but only thus, That he held the Dominion of all Things, not Formally, but Permissively; inasmuch as there was then no Right of any Person else to interfere with his, and to hinder him from converting every thing to his own Use, had there been occasion. When God was pleas'd to give him a Dear Partner and Companion, they agreed to hold this Indefinite Right over Things without dividing it; as being united to each other in the strictest Band of Society: For which Reason, many Nations at this Day observe a Communion of Goods between the Husband and the Wife. Nor was there any need of separate Properties, so long as Adam's Children being yet in their Minority, were to be maintained by their Father, and made but one House. For though in the use of things, they were at that time obliged to conform to their Father's pleasure, yet this proceeded not from his Dominion (strictly speaking) over the Things, but from his Paternal Power and Authority over the Persons. Therefore the Property of things came then to be distinct, when by Consent of the Father the Sons fell into separate Families; which Separation was undoubtedly owing to the Emulation between Brothers; and to another good Reason, that every one's own Industry might be his own Advantage; as the Idleness of others might be a Punishment only to themselves. Nor must we believe that the whole World was presently shar'd out amongst that small Number of Persons; or that all things were turn'd into Property by one Act, and at one time. But it was sufficient at first to fix a Property in those things, which either afford an immediate use, not capable of being divided amongst many; as Cloaths, Cottages, and Stores of Provision already gather'd by particular Men; or which require Industry and Improvement to make them fit for Service; as Household-Goods and Instruments, Cattle, and Fields (1). By degrees, what remain'd was brought under the same Condition; according as either the Inclination, or the number of Men directed and advis'd. Thus the Pasturage continued a great while in its First and Common state; till upon the abundant Increase of Cattle, Quarrels arising, the Division of this likewise was made necessary to Peace and Concord. As for that part of the Argument, That the Right of Occupancy cannot be admitted, where Possession belongs to a General Body; this will hold good against those who pretend any positive Communion to have been the primitive

State of things; in which indeed no private Person can take any thing to himself, exclusive of the whole Society. But the primitive Condition in which we have plac'd things, is equally distant from positive Communion, and from Propriety in the strict sense of the word: and we assert, that before Occupancy can produce Dominion, it is necessary that some Compact, (a tacit one at least) should have been first settled to that Effect.

XII. Others form their Scripture Account of the Origin of Dominion in this manner: That God gave our first Parents that Common Dominion which he design'd for all Men in general, to be held undivided; inasmuch as the Primitive Pair represented the Person of all human Race: In which sense it may still rightly enough be said, That the Dominion of the World, or of the Things in the World, as they are capable of passing into Property, belongs to Mankind. But this Common Dominion doth not exclude Private; since we neither can nor ought to conceive it without a respect and tendency to private Dominion, so to be constituted as should be agreeable to a Rational and a Social Nature. But in Adam the latter of these Dominions met in Conjunction with the former, excluding his Children without any previous Cession or Surrendry (a). Now, as to this Account, we will make no Quarrel about words; that is, we allow the Name of common Dominion to what we ourselves have rather chose to call a Right of using the Creatures, inherent in Men by virtue of the Divine Concession; provided this common Dominion consider'd by it self, be suppos'd to obtain no Effect between Man and Man. On which Point we have before affirm'd, that Men might have rested satisfy'd with that Right of using things as they lay in common; and that 'twas not necessary separate Dominions should immediately be introduc'd, so long as Men were yet few in number, and follow'd a simple unimprov'd way of living; but when their Race was considerably multiplied, and when Industry had advanc'd the Conveniencies of Life, then the necessary Regard to the Preservation of Society recommended the Distinction of Properties; yet so as that things did not pass all at once into this Condition, but successively, according as the Occasional Methods of Peace and Agreement seem'd to demand. But that Adam held a private Dominion over all Things, before his Sons had left him, to set up Families of their own, is a very negligent Assertion.

For First, Private Dominion always takes its Rise from some Human Act; therefore, Adam could not have such a Dominion over those things, which he was so far from having taken Possession of, that they did not so much as fall under his Knowledge.

That place of the Civil-Law, L. 3. §. 1. D. de adquir. possess. (2), is very unfitly applied to the present Business; as if Adam by setting his Feet on one part of the Earth, should be suppos'd to have taken Possession of the whole World. If any one persists in giving the Name of Property to that Right of using things which Men receiv'd by the Grant of their Creator, then we might admit what these Authors lay down, That Property was the Cause of Occupancy and Division; or that it was therefore Lawful for Men to challenge things to themselves by laying hands upon them, and by parting them into separate Shares, because God had given them a general Commission to apply other Creatures to their own Use. But if we take the word Property in its strict and general Sense, as it denotes the Exclusion of all Others from a particular thing already assign'd to One; then 'tis altogether true, that Division and Occupancy are the Causes of Property. Farther, Adam's Children, whilst they yet continued part of their Father's Family, were bound indeed to obey his Pleasure in regard to their Use of things; yet this, as was before observ'd, proceeded not from the Force of any private Dominion in Adam, but from the force of his paternal Power. For whilst they were young and helpless, he was oblig'd to maintain them. And when they were Capable of doing some Service, still the same paternal Authority required both that in using the common Store they should be guided by their Father's Directions, lest they should incur any Mischief by Intemperance; and likewise that such things as they had either gather'd from a spontaneous Growth, or had produc'd by their own Industry, they should deliver into the hands of their Father, to be given out as he should think fit: And he, so long as he enjoy'd this Right, was bound to provide Necessaries for his Children, even after they were arriv'd at Maturity, as time and occasion should require. And hence, if any one of his Sons should, for instance, contrary to his Prohibition have privately feasted with too much Greediness on some particular Fruit, the Youth had been by no means guilty of Theft, but of Disobedience to his Father's Command. Or, if Adam had order'd one that was grown up to gather Provision for the Sustainance of a young Brother, and the Party thus employ'd had either devour'd it himself, or laid it up secretly for his future use, he deserv'd Correction, not for Theft, but for violating the Charge which his Father laid upon him. During this Period therefore, neither Adam nor his Children had any private Dominion: The Right of primitive Communion was sufficient for his turn; and as for them, they in the Exercise of the same Right, depended on his Care and Guidance. So that Adam's private Dominion then began when he dismissed his Sons from under his Tuition, and gave them leave to erect separate Families for themselves.

XIII. Let us consider too the Arguments of those who maintain that this primitive Communion was impossible (a). They say, That such a Communion neither could have been, nor ought to have been, in the State of Innocence; because as every Order and Method, conformable to right Reason; so the most comely Order of possessing those things, the Dominion of which God had granted to Mankind, agreed in an especial manner to that state in which the Vertue of abstaining from what was anothers, deserv'd to bear an honourable Name. Whence the Decalogue as it establisheth the Duty of forbearing the Goods of others, so it secures every one in the Enjoyment of a certain and separate Possession. To this we answer,

First, That we can have no such clear Evidence what kind of Life (with respect to these External things,) Men would have led, had they continued in their first Sinless Condition; and consequently whether the Community, or the Propriety, of things would have been most suitable to that state.

But farther; We may venture to make it a Question, Whether it be not a higher Degree, a greater Perfection of Vertue to enjoy quietly a common Provision, and to desire no particular Advantage above the rest who have the same Title to it, than to abstain from the distinct Portion of others?

Lastly, Whatever we are to say as to the Eternity of the Law of Nature, thus much is certain; That there's no Necessity every Object of that Law should have always existed; many of them proceeding, in the course of time, from the Agreements and Institution of Men: Thus the Law against Murder had no Object, whilst Adam was the only Person in the World; nor the Law against Adultery, whilst none of his Sons were arriv'd to Man's Estate; nor the Law against Theft, before the Division of things; nor the Law against bearing False-witness, before the Judicial Processes were introduc'd; nor the Law against coveting the House, the Man-servant, or Maid-servant of others, whilst they lodg'd in Caves, and e'er Servitude was establish'd; nor lastly, the Law of honouring Parents, before Eve was a Mother (b). They proceed to tell us, That neither was such a Community possible in the state of Men after the Fall: First, Because we can't so much as form any Notion of it in our Mind: For Grotius so describes its Laws and Rules, as that every Person might immediately seize for his use what he pleas'd, and might consume any thing that was consumable. But such an Exercise of the General Right serv'd then instead of Property: For what any one had thus seized, none else could take from him without Injury. Therefore this Notion establisheth a Property in Community, and consequently implies a Contradiction; the only End and Effect of Property being this, that one Person should not rob and plunder another. But here they vainly pretend a Difficulty where there is none: For antecedently to any Human Act, and to the Use of any thing in the World, when the bare Case is thus, That each thing belongs no more to one Man than to another, and consequently belongs alike to neither; the Primitive Communion bears a different Aspect from what it hath after Men begin to lay hands upon the General Store, and to employ it in their Service: Since in the latter Case, by virtue of a previous Covenant, whatever any Man hath seized for his private use, becomes his Property. Otherwise Men must altogether abstain from the use of things. Hence in this Qualified Communion, as we may call it, the Substances of things belong to none, but their Fruits become matter of Property, when gather'd. This Notion of Community temper'd with such a degree of Property, may we think be easily apprehended by Persons of no very Nice or Philosophical Heads. To give a plain Instance: the Acorns were his that took the Pains of getting them, but the Oak had no particular Owner. Thus much being laid down, the way is the better clear'd towards answering what they farther object. They pretend that such a Communion could not possibly last one Moment of time, that it was contrary to the Human or Rational Nature, Savage and Unsociable; and consequently is capable of affording no other use than that from it, as a feign'd Hypothesis, may be shewn the Necessity of a distinct or private Dominion in a Civil State.

It's true, this Communion consider'd, precisely in it self, and before any Application and Exercise of it, could not subsist, unless Men could have always walk'd naked, and liv'd without eating. Yet why it should not subsist when thus qualified with a mixture of Property, there was nothing to hinder; whilst the number of Men was yet few, and their Life plain and unrefined. It is certain however, that the more Mankind was multiplied, and the more Life was improv'd, the greater Necessity there was of appropriating more things than before. Hence those People lead but a rude and barbarous life, who make the nearest Approach to the Primitive Communion; those, suppose, who live on Herbs, Roots, Fruits of chance growth, and what they take in hunting and in fishing, and who claim no other Estate and Wealth than a Cave with its wretched Furniture. Farther, when we assert that all things were, by Nature, negatively Common, we don't mean that the Law of Nature commands Men perpetually to preserve such a State; but that things if consider'd antecedently to any Act of Men, were so dispos'd, as that no one Person could claim them rather than another. On the other side, in affirming that Men left this Communion upon the Advice and Direction of Reason, we pretend not that it was necessary all things should be appropriated in the same Moment; but according as the Temper or Condition of Men, the Nature of the things themselves, and the Difference of place required; and as was judg'd most convenient for the cutting off all manner of Quarrel or Dissention. And therefore, neither are we who are utterly banished the primitive Communion, nor those Barbarous Nations which still retain many Foot-steps of it, guilty, in this respect, of a Breach of the Law of Nature. Thus too, what they add hath little Difficulty: After the Fall, say they, Men could not live without Law, and yet maintain a Social Life; therefore, neither without the Distinction of Properties; since the Communion of things is Inconsistent with Law, which is wont to assign and distribute particular Possessions. But since all Laws do not presuppose separate Dominion, why might not those others be observ'd so as to keep up a Life of Society under that qualified Communion? Tho' it must be confess'd, that before the Division of Properties, a very few Heads of Law might have been sufficient for the Government of Mankind. Therefore when Servius in his Observations on Virgil (1), reports it as the Reason why Ceres was by the Ancients call'd Legifera, and her Rites Theismophoria, Because she is said to have been the Foundress of Laws; inasmuch before the Invention of Corn, Men wandred about without Law or Government; which wild Condition was taken off after Corn came into use, and after Laws had been instituted upon the Division of Land (2): This Account ought not to be admitted without some Limitation. Indeed a more pompous Train of Laws became needful after Proprieties were fixed, Men being ruled before by a small number of Ordinances; yet Communion consider'd by it self, doth not render Life altogether lawless and unsociable, but only more simple and unpolish'd; and as it were, not well settled and compacted. As for platonical Community, it hath nothing to do with the Case before us; it being profess'dly positive, and extended not only to Goods, but to Wives and Children.

XIV. We may hence discover in what sense we are to take that Assertion laid down by some Authors, That Property and Dominion belongs to the Law of Nature, strictly so called, and which is written in the Minds of Men. Where 'tis to be observ'd, that this Expression, such or such a thing belongs to, or is of, the Law of Nature, hath a different Meaning, according as it's spoke either of any express or immediate Command, or else of some Custom or Institution establish'd in Human Life. In the first sense it imports, that the Law of Nature enjoins the doing, or the not doing of such a matter: in the second, That sound Reason adviseth the Reception and Settlement of such a thing amongst Men, from the general Consideration of a social Life. For as for those Customs or Regulations which are introduc'd for the particular Advantage of separate Commonwealths, such are said to proceed from Civil or Positive Law. When therefore 'tis demanded whether or no Property owes its Original to the Law of Nature, the latter Sense of the Word is to be regarded, and not the former. That is, inasmuch as a social Life is the very Foundation of Natural Law, and since it is at the same time sufficiently evident from the Temper and Genius of Mankind, that in a great Multitude, where all join their Endeavours towards improving Life with various Inventions, the Peace and Beauty of Society could not be kept up without distinct Dominions of things; such Dominions were therefore settled; and this very rightly and agreeable to the Aim of Nature's Laws, Human Affairs plainly requiring it to be done. And after this Establishment, the same Law commands the Observance of every thing that may conduce to the End for which these private Dominions were erected: Yet was there no express and determinate Command of the Law of Nature, by virtue of which all things ought to be brought under Property, immediately upon the Origin of Mankind, or in all places alike; but Property was gradually introduced, according as it appear'd requisite to the Common Peace. But the Precept of Nature about abstaining from what is another's, then first began to exert its Force; when at length, Men by mutual Agreement had mark'd out, and appointed what should belong to others, and what each Person should claim as his own. Before this time it lay conceal'd, (as it were virtually or potentially,) in that general Precept which enjoins us to stand to our Covenants, and not to injure the Right of our Neighbour. Nor is it any Absurdity to affirm, that the Obligation we lie under, not to invade the Goods of others, is Coeval with Human Race; and yet that Distinction of meum and tuum was afterwards ordained. Thus we are often bound to yield Obedience before we know what will be enjoin'd: As when we have an Obligation in general to follow the Directions of some certain Person in all things that he shall hereafter require us to perform; or when we may suppose several particular Commands to be implied in some general Rule.

(1) Æn. 4. 58.

(2) See the Historical Explication of the Fable of Ceres in the Sixth Tome of Biblioth.

XV. 'Tis needful in this place to add a word or two concerning the Subject of Property; on which Head the principal Question is, Whether those are Capable of being Proprietors, who have not the use of Reason, as Infants and delirious Persons? Now here it is certain, that neither of these can originally acquire the Property of any thing, or make it their own by taking immediate Possession of it. The Reason is, because in this Method of acquiring Property, the Intention of the Acquisitor is necessary, signifying that he will for the future hold such a thing as his own; and he should at the same time be able to understand, that such an Act is effectual towards the creating a Right in him. But this cannot be supposed in the Persons of whom we speak. Yet as to the obtaining the Property of such things as are derived upon them from others, the Case is different. For though here likewise, to make a thing pass to me from another, 'tis in the common and regular course requir'd, that I have an Understanding able to judge of what is done, and to shew by Signs proceeding from Real Intention, that I am willing to receive such a thing, and to keep it to my self; yet 'tis the receiv'd Practice of all Civiliz'd Nations, to permit Children in their most tender Age, and even before their Birth (a), to receive and to retain a Property descending to them. And this is no more than what Natural Reason and Equity advis'd; inasmuch as the things which Men usually appropriate, belong to the Use and Service of Life, and are no less necessary for Infants than for grown Persons; nay indeed somewhat more necessary for the former; who by reason of their Weakness in Body and Mind, cannot so well provide for their own Occasions. In Infants therefore a presumed Consent is judg'd equivalent to a formal Acceptance, it being taken for granted, that no one will refuse what conduceth to his Benefit: Yet on Account of their Immaturity of Judgment, the Possession only, and not the Exercise, of this Right could be conferr'd upon them. The general Customs of Nations in their Favour, might allow them to hold, but not to use any thing by their own Disposal (b). However lest their Right should by this means come to nothing, Humanity farther required, that Persons of Years and Discretion should act as their Representatives, in the Management of their Goods, till they are Capable of understanding it themselves. This Management is either committed to a certain Person by him who transfers the Goods upon them; or, in Civil States, the Matter is settled by Direction of the Laws, and of the Magistrates; or, where both these Provisions are wanting, nearness of Blood, or of Habitation, or the bare Law of general Kindness, recommends the good Office to fit Hands (c). But all Edit. Robinson.) which assigns the Goods of Minors to the Care of the Kindred by the Father's side, but their Persons and the Business of their Education, to the Kindred by the Mother. Judging it probable, that the latter, to whom the Inheritance could not descend, would make no Attempt on the Life and Safety of their Wards; and that the former would have no Opportunity for any Design against their Persons; and yet at the same time would be very diligent in managing their Fortunes, because after their Death, whether Natural or Casual, the Estate would fall to themselves.

all Persons who have engag'd themselves in this Case, by what means soever they came to be intrusted with it, are oblig'd to discharge it with the utmost Fidelity; in regard to that tender Age, insufficient for its own Guidance and Defence. Therefore Hesiod ranks in the same Class of Sinners, him that hath hurt a Stranger, or one that sued to him for Protection; him that hath defil'd his Brother's Bed; him that hath us'd rigorous Treatment toward an Ancient Parent;

CHAP. V.

Of the Object of Property.

WE are in the next place to enquire into the Object of Property, or to examine what Things are capable of coming under that condition. Now to give a Thing this Capacity, we judge these two Qualifications to be necessary. First, That it be able to afford some Use to Men, mediately or immediately; by it self, or by its connexion with somewhat else: And Secondly, That it be some way or other so far under the power of Men, as that they may fasten on it, and keep it for their Occasions. And farther, since Property implies a Right of excluding others from your Possession, which Right would be altogether insignificant, if it could not be effectually exercised; 'twould be in vain for you to claim that as your own, which you can by no means hinder others from sharing with you.

II. Yet some Things there are, which tho' very beneficial to Mankind, yet by reason of their vast Extent, are inexhaustible, so that all may enjoy them together, and yet no Man suffer in his particular use. To appropriate Things of this Nature, would be malicious and inhuman: And on this account 'tis usual to attribute an exemption from Property, to the Light and Heat of the Sun, to the Air, to the running Water, and the like (a) (1). Although since Nature by denying Men Wings, hath made the use of the Earth necessary to their using the Light; hence it comes to pass that some Persons may be utterly debarr'd from the latter; as Criminals, for instance, in their Dungeon. In like manner, since the Air is in some places more clear and pure than in others, in this respect the value of a place may be inanced. As we see Men who allow pleasure any share in their choice, very highly regard the prospect of Buildings, or of Lands, and especially of the former: For which reason those Services have been introduc'd, (2) of not raising a Building higher; of Lights, and of not hindring Lights; of Prospects, and of not hindring Prospects. So though on other accounts no one will pretend to fix a Property in the Wind, yet we may appoint a Service or Duty of not intercepting the Wind to the prejudice of our Mills.

III. We are likewise to observe, that as the Substances of those Things which Men have Dominion over are compos'd of different kinds of matter, so each Thing is taken and possess'd in that way which the condition of its Nature admits: For the more closely any thing can be confin'd, and as it were shut up, the more easily will it produce the effects of Property against the Claims of others. And consequently the more capable a thing is of being guarded

(a) Petron. Is there any one of the most excellent Works of Nature, which she hath not made common to all the World? The Sun shines with an Universal Influence. The Moon, attended with her numberless train of Stars, lights the very Beasts to their Food. What is there in Nature more bright and beautiful than the Waters? Yet they flow for publick use. Latoana thus pleads in Ovid: (Metam. l. 6. 349.)

Nec solem proprium natura, nec aera fecit.
Nec terras undas; ad publica munera veni.*

from Unjust Invaders, the greater Security we promise our selves in the Property of it. Yet, as we are not immediately to conclude a Thing exempt from Property, because it cannot without some trouble be kept from other Hands; so in case a thing be in so wide a manner spread and diffus'd, as that either 'tis morally impossible it should fall under any method of keeping, or that it cannot be kept without much greater charges than the Fruits and Advantages of it would countervail, it is not to be supposed that any Person desires to fix a Property which can bring him nothing but burthen and expence in defending it. Though to render a Thing capable of being appropriated, it is not strictly necessary that we should inclose it, or be able to inclose it within artificial Bounds, or such as are different from its own Substance; 'tis sufficient if the compass and extent of it can be any way determin'd. And therefore Grotius hath given himself a needless Trouble, when to prove Rivers capable of Property, he useth this Argument, (a) That although they are bounded by the Land at neither end, but united to other Rivers, or the Sea, yet 'tis enough that the greater part of them, that is, their Sides are inclosed.

IV. Lastly, we farther discover, that the use of some Things is confin'd, as it were, within narrow limits, and cannot admit of Shares; the appropriation of which was highly expedient to the peace of Mankind.

Again, There are Things, which as they afford us different Uses, may in regard to some Uses be spent and exhausted, and yet in regard to other Uses yield a neverfailing Abundance. Now, as on the one side, there is no reason why such Things as those should not be brought under Property; so on the other side, the Law of Kindness and Humanity forbids us to deny the inexhaustible Use of them to any Person that in a friendly and peaceable manner desires it. But if any thing could be found inexhaustible in all its Uses, 'twould be absurd not to leave that in its Primitive Community. Indeed in a positive Communion, if the Object be sufficient to serve all, when divided, nothing hinders but that we may divide it; if it would not be thus sufficient, 'tis best to possess it still without division: But that a Thing lying in common to Mankind, and sufficient for the promiscuous Use of all, should be shared out into distinct parts, is certainly repugnant to Reason. The Earth is of such a magnitude as to serve the Occasions of all People in all Uses to which they can apply it, yet it would not thus serve them, were it possess'd without Division, by so vast Bodies of Inhabitants as it now contains: Because it could never afford them Sustenance, unless manur'd and improv'd. Therefore there is plainly this particular Reason why the Extent of the Earth should not hinder its being divided; and yet the same reason would make the division of the Ocean appear a ridiculous absurdity (b).

V. Indeed all other Things have little difficulty in this point; but as to the Sea, whether or no that be capable of Property, hath been disputed by the greatest Genius's of the present Age. On which Controversy 'tis easy to remark, that many of the Writers engaged in it, were more guided by their Affection to their Country, than by their regard to Truth. Yet by these, and by others who have shewn themselves more dis-interested and impartial, the whole Subject hath been so fully discuss'd, that 'tis hard to say any thing that others have not already offer'd. We may therefore be allow'd to use more brevity on the Question before us; the Authors (1) who have thoroughly canvass'd it, being so universally read. This then is manifest, that the same Divine Grant which first gave Man a Right of assuming the Sovereignty of the Earth, included likewise the Sea. The Commission as well runs, have Dominion over the Fishes of the Sea, as over the Beasts of the Land (2). And we cannot conceive any Supremacy and Rule over Animals, without a Right of using the Element which they inhabit, according as the Nature of it will allow. Indeed mention is likewise made of the Fowls of the Air, yet since we cannot move and support our selves in that Element alone, therefore we are unable to exercise Dominion over the Air any farther than we can reach while we stand upon the Earth. But on the Sea we stretch our Empire much farther, by the means of Ships, now brought to their highest perfection; which are not only serviceable in transporting Burthens, but likewise carry Mars through the Kingdoms of Neptune in a far more dreadful Array than he is attended with when he rageth by Land. No one is now so superstitious as to join in the Poet's Scruple:

*Nequicquam Deus abscedit
Prudens Oceano dissociabili
Terras, si tamen impie
Non tangenda rates transfiliunt vada.*

In vain did Nature's Wife Command,
Divide the Waters from the Land,
If daring Ships, and Men profane,
Invade th' inviolable Main. L. 1. Od. 3. 21. &c.
Mr. Dryden.

Nor doth the Sea appear to have any privilege above the Earth, by virtue of which Men ought less to apply it to their Occasions and Use. However, since the Donation of God doth not immediately constitute such Dominion as shall take effect against the Claims of others; therefore it was left to the choice of Men, whether they would appropriate the Sea likewise, as they had done the greatest part of the Land; or whether they would let it remain in its Primitive State, belonging no more to one Person than to any besides.

VI. The Question is, therefore, Whether any thing particular may be discover'd in the Sea, which should hinder it from being an Object of Property? This some have undertaken to affirm, partly upon Natural, and partly upon Moral Reasons. Amongst the former they have alledg'd the Fluidity of the Sea; that, according to the Common Nature of all Liquid Bodies, the parts of it are held together by no proper Bands; whereas Possession can take place only in things that are fix'd and terminated. To which others make answer, That Fluidity consider'd in it self is no Bar against Property: And besides, that the Sea is not without its Limits, being surrounded by the Shore; and that it is a Work of no such great difficulty to confine the several parts and tracts of it within stricter Bounds. It may be added, that as Rivers are not the less capable of Property, because they pass away in a perpetual Stream; so neither is the Sea, on account of its being driven about by the force of the Winds and Tide. The River is one thing, and the Stream or Current another: And in the same manner the Sea is consider'd distinctly from the Waters which it contains. The vast extent of the Sea doth by no means render it impossible to be kept, and therefore doth not altogether hinder it from coming under Property. For we may abridge others of the use of the Sea, either by Forts upon the Shore, where it toucheth our Territories in narrow Creeks, and Streights; or by Ships of War, which are able to perform the same Service on the Water, as Castles and Forts on the Land. Though it cannot be denied, but that for one People to keep the whole Ocean, is morally impossible: Nor would it be worth their while to maintain Fleets in all parts, for the defence of it against all others who should desire to share with them in the use. Now 'tis great folly to covet what one can't keep; especially when by such a pursuit we do not aim at the Necessities of Life, but at the Gratification of vain Ambition, and of needless Avarice. For though otherwise the Defect of Natural Ability doth not presently extinguish a Moral Capacity, yet inasmuch as the latter, by reason of the Corruption of Mankind, is almost insignificant, Prudence adviseth us, to grasp at no more than we can well secure our selves in the enjoyment of. Grotius's limitation on this point seems superfluous, when he remarks (a). That Rivers or part of the Sea may be appropriated upon supposition that either the former or the latter are but inconsiderable in respect of the Land; or however, are not so large, but that when compared with the Land, they may only seem to have the proportion of a part to the whole. For let us consider a People feating themselves on the side of a vast River, on a long and narrow slip of Land; here the River will by no means be inconsiderable in comparison with the Land; and yet we don't imagine that this would hinder it from a capacity of Appropriation. Thus there are Kingdoms, which in extent are far exceeded by their Provinces and Appendages.

The Moral Reason which these Authors urge to prove the Sea incapable of becoming Property, is taken from this consideration, that the use of it is inexhaustible, and therefore sufficient for the promiscuous service of all. So that 'twould be vain and impertinent to attempt the division of it into separate portions and shares. Which Argument we would indeed acknowledge to be the strongest that can be produced in the present Case, were it once made appear that the Sea, is with respect to all its Uses, sufficient for all Men in all parts. Because the appropriation of Things was introduced on no other account but to preserve the Peace of Human Society. And since one effect of it is this, That he who against his will invades and usurps my Peculiar, really doth an Injury to me, which I might justly revenge in a hostile manner; therefore those who should have desired to turn a thing into Property, which whilst expos'd to Common Use, was not likely to breed any Quarrel amongst Men, ought to have been look'd upon not as promoters of the Peace of Mankind, but as Persons who brought in new occasions of breaking and disturbing it. But whether the Sea be thus inexhaustible in all its parts, with respect to every Use, will be made more evident, if we examine more distinctly the particular Services which it affords.

VII. The use of Washing and of drawing Water is indeed inexhaustible; but then this is of no great consequence, and extends no farther than to the Inhabitants of the Shore. The Sea-water is likewise serviceable for the making of Salt: But this advantage as well as the former is confin'd to those who dwell on the Coasts. Farther, as to the convenience of Navigation, the Sea is inexhaustible, and suffers no damage from being thus employ'd (b) (1). But then besides these, there are other Uses, part of which are not altogether inexhaustible; and part may prove an occasion of damage to Maritime Countries, whose Interest will not admit that the Sea should every where lie promiscuously free to all. Of the former kind is Fishing, as likewise the gathering of any thing which grows in the Water. As for Fishing, though it hath much more abundant Subject in the Sea, than in Lakes or Rivers; yet 'tis manifest that it may in part be exhausted; and that if all Nations should desire such a Right and Liberty near the Coasts of any particular Country, that Country must be very much prejudic'd in this respect; especially since 'tis very usual that some particular kind of Fish, or perhaps some more precious Commodity; as Pearls, Coral, Amber, or the like, are to be found only in one part of the Sea, and that of no considerable extent. In this Case there is no reason why the Borderers should not rather challenge to themselves this Happiness of a wealthy Shore or Sea, than those who are seated at a distance from it: And other Nations can with no more Justice grudge or envy them such an Advantage, than they can be angry that,

An Use of the latter kind it is, that the Maritime Countries are guarded and defended by their Situation. Hence the Duke of Somerset, Protector of England, under Edward the Sixth, in an Epistle to the Scots, which we find in Sleidan's Commentaries, (b) tells them, Oceano claudimur undique tanquam mœnibus & vallo firmissimo: We are on all sides enclosed with the Ocean, as with the strongest Wall and Bulwark. And we may with much more Justice bestow on the Sea that Name of ἀθάνατος τείχος, an Immortal Wall, with which Isocrates (c) complemented the River Nile. Yet this Defence is not altogether certain and secure. It hinders indeed any Expedition on Foot, but lies open to the approach of Vessels. For which Reason it must needs be a disadvantage to any People, thus seated, that other Nations should have free access to their Shore with Ships of War, without asking their leave, or without giving security for their peaceful and inoffensive Passage. But we cannot, with any Accuracy, determine in general how large a space of the Sea ought to be allow'd for such a defence, in respect of which it may be for the Safety and Interest of the Borderers to claim a distinct Dominion over it. Yet certainly it would urge a very unreasonable Fear and Jealousie, should any Kingdom barely on this account desire to extend their Sovereignty over the Sea for some hundreds of Leagues together (d). However we see by what hath been offer'd, that there may be very weighty Reasons for a People so far to appropriate to themselves some part of the Sea, as to oblige all others to acknowledge the use of the same part, as a permission from them, and an Act of Bounty and Favour.

VIII. But since all Dominion capable of producing any Effect against the Claims of others, takes its rise from some Act of Men; therefore how far the Bounds of any People ought to reach on the Sea, is to be discover'd either from their own Right of Possession, or from their Treaties with their Neighbours (e). Yet supposing the Matter to be dubious, and that there are no clear Memorials to be found of such Acts as might prove the Occupancy to be real which is alledg'd; what presumptions are to be made in this Case we may understand from the following Remarks. In the Beginning then whilst we were yet ignorant of Navigation, it is not probable that the People which had taken possession of any Territories, extended their Dominion farther than to the Neighbouring Shore. For inasmuch as the Fishing Trade was yet but poor and barren, for want of Boats, and the utmost advantage they could make was to pick up the Shell-Fish which were left by the Tide, or to Angle from the Rocks; there was no fear that they should in this respect suffer from their Neighbours; who being necessitated to make their approaches by Land, might be repuls'd with little difficulty. Nay, after the Invention of Shipping, most Nations for a considerable time, left each other at full liberty to fish where they pleas'd: because they imagin'd that an Employment of so great labour and hardship would not engage such a numerous Train of Followers, as that any publick Disturbance should be apprehended from their Disputes and Contentions. And whilst Hostile Heats were yet unknown, the Sea was a sufficient Defence without other assistances. And afterwards when they began to build Ships of War, Men were contented a long while to appropriate only the Havens and Bays, leaving the other parts of the Sea in their Primitive Community. This moderation embolden'd the Pirates to carry on their Profession with greater liberty; whilst they were of Opinion, That 'twas a less heinous breach of the General Peace, to commit these Outrages in places subject to no Jurisdiction. At length, when they had found out the benefit of Merchandise, and the conveniency of so short a passage by Water for Goods and Traffick, some Governments seated near the Streights or Narrow Seas, challeng'd to themselves a Property in them, that by requiring Toll and Custom, they might come in for a share in the Gain, or that their Towns might be frequented by the Trading part of the World. After this, other parts of the Sea were likewise brought under subjection, either on account of their great plenty of Fish, or because this was a necessary

(c) Encom. Busir. (d) What Cæsar reports of the Germans may serve to illustrate this: The particular Communities look on it as the highest Honour to make a vast extent of Desert round about them, wasting all the Confines of their Neighbours: this they reckon the surest mark of an extraordinary Valour, that the former Borderers have retired, and been driven to a greater distance, and that none dare fear themselves in so formidable a Neighbourhood. And then besides, they thought themselves the safer by this Policy, having taken away all fear of sudden Incurfions, de B. G. l. 6.

(e) Thus Isocrates (in His Panegy. p. 111. Ed. Paris.) boasts that the Athenians by their Articles of Peace with the King of Persia, had obliged him not to come beyond Phaselis with his Ships of War.

Expedient for the security of the bordering Provinces.

Yet in these times they scarce exercised any other Right of Sovereignty, besides the giving out Injunctions, that all who pass'd within such Bounds should abstain from all Harm and Violence, that no Piracies should be there committed, and no Vessels of War enter without Permission. Thus when the Lacedemonians, in Thucydides (a), had convey'd Forces to Epidaurus, by Sea, the Argives in an Embassy to the Athenians complain'd, that they having promis'd by League not to grant the Enemies of Argos Passage through their Dominions, had nevertheless suffer'd them to sail by unmolested. And accordingly the Athenians interpreted this Act of the Lacedemonians as a Breach of Peace. We see it is now the receiv'd Custom, in order to the Acknowledgment of this Sovereignty, that Foreign Vessels, as they pass by any Fort on the Shore, or any Ship of War belonging to the Prince, who at present carries himself as Lord of the Sea, shall pay some Mark of Respect.

It doth not seem necessary that particular Nations should make out the precise time when they obtain'd the Dominions of such or such parts of the Sea, by taking Possession of it: but, inasmuch as the Exercise of this Dominion may not at all times be of Use and Advantage, 'tis enough if they then perform'd any Act of Sovereignty, when the Interest of the Commonwealth seem'd to require it: nay, in our Judgment, it might be no Absurdity to affirm, that when Naval Forces are once brought into common use, the parts of the Sea, so far as they serve only for a Defence or an Appendage, do without any special corporal Act, pass immediately under the Dominion of that People whose Shores they wash. (b) For in this respect the Sea is to be look'd on as an Increment of the Land, as the adjoining Moors and Fens are reckon'd the Increment of a City. Now, as in the Occupancy, or the taking Possession of Immovables, it is not necessary that our Body should touch each part, but the touching of one Part only is conceiv'd to create a Property over the whole; so when a People have seiz'd on one particular Region inclosed within settled Bounds, still under the Notion of taking all the void space about that they shall afterwards have Occasion for, though at first they have no Design to enlarge, or exercise their Dominion farther than those Bounds, as not thinking what lies beyond to be of use or service to them; yet when they come at length to find, that there is a Necessity of adding such a void space to their present Possessions, their bare Intention and Resolution should seem sufficient to extend their Sovereignty over it, as a Part or Appendage of their Empire. Especially when it once appear'd that other Nations had thus stretch'd their Command over the Void Sea: Whence 'tis a fair Presumption, that the rest of the World pretend not that they should be behind with them in this Advantage (1). From which Considerations it is manifest, that in these times, when Shipping is brought to its highest Perfection, it is presum'd, that every Maritime People at all acquainted with Navigation, are Lords of the Sea, where it toucheth their own Shore, so far as it may be counted a Defence, especially in Ports and other places where there is Convenience of Landing (c). In like manner the Gulphs and Channels, or Arms of the Sea, are, according to the regular course, supposed to belong to the People with whose Lands they are encompassed. But in case different Nations border on the same Channel, the Sovereignty of each shall be conceiv'd to reach into the middle of the Water, from every part of their respective Shore: unless either all the States have agreed by Covenant to use the whole Water promiscuously amongst themselves, and to exercise a general undivided Sovereignty over it, against Foreigners: Or else, if one particular People have obtain'd a Dominion over the whole by Pact, or by the Tacit Concession of the rest, or by the Right of Conquest, or because they first fix'd their Station near it, and immediately took it into full Possession, exercising Acts of Sovereignty against the People of the opposite Shore. In which latter Case, nevertheless, the other Neighbouring States, their Fellow-Borderers shall be supposed to be Lords of each of their particular Ports, and of so much of the Sea, as the convenient Access to the Shore requires (d).

IX. But what shall we say of the main Ocean, which spreads it self between those vast Continents of Europe, Africa, America, and the unknown Southern Coasts? Was this ever brought under Property, or doth it still remain in its primitive State, free and common to all the World? As for the prodigious extent of it, this however doth not absolutely render it incapable of being appropriated. Yet we must confess, the Dominion of it would not be only unprofitable, but unjust; should either any one Nation challenge it all to themselves, or several States divide it into so many Shares, excluding all the rest of Mankind. Navigation, or the Convenience of Water-passage, is a thing which suffers no Damage by being enjoy'd; on the bare Account of which, the Appropriation of the Sea is needless and superfluous, since Men may sail no less commodiously, were the Sea common to all Nations, than if it were peculiarly subject to one. The Fishing Trade is of no very great Consequence in the main Ocean; and since you do but vainly call a thing, Your own, when 'tis morally impossible to hinder others from using it promiscuously with your self; we cannot think any State would find it tantamount, to maintain Fleets in all parts of the Sea, only to secure the Fishing against Interlopers. But what if a particular Nation, either through Ambition and the Vanity of being stiled Lords of the Ocean; or prompted by Avarice, and the hopes of drawing to themselves all the Advantages of Navigation and Trade, should claim the Ocean as their peculiar Possession? Especially if they urged by way of Title, That they were the first who entred upon the use of it with Sails and Shipping, and that they possess Lands in every Continent round it: And that, since the Sea was originally a void space, he who before the rest attempted to fix a Use and Occupancy in it, might thereby acquire a Property exclusive of all others. To this we answer, That Men have indeed a Privilege of making Wastepieces their own, by first seizing upon them: But then they are always to remember, that God gave the World not to this nor to that Man, but to human Race in general; as likewise that all Men are by Nature equal. Wherefore, that Tacit Covenant between the first Introducers of Property, assigning the Right of those things which did not fall under their prime Division, to the Persons who should first take Possession of them, can by no means be extended to such an Object, which if one should hold alone, he might oppress all others with most unjust Slavery, or might intercept some most Important Advantages, which would otherwise accrue to all Nations in common. Inasmuch as such a Case as this could not enter into the Imagination of those primitive Divisors. As then no one would deserve Censure for taking out of a common Store whatever is Necessary for his own Occasions, though in order to future use; So he is not to be endur'd, who out of a vain and senseless Greediness, should lay Claim to more than he could ever spend; and should desire infinitely to enlarge his own Dominion, for no other Reason, but to debar others from the use of those good things which Nature affords. There can then no probable Ground or Colour be alledged why any one People should pretend to the Dominion of the whole Ocean, so as by virtue of this Right to aim at excluding all others from sailing there. Not one of those Reasons which first moved Men to the Settlement of Property, doth affect the main Sea. To make it fit for Navigation, there is no need (in regard to the Sea it self,) of the Pains and Industry of Men. The Winds labour no more to drive all the Fleets in the World, than a single Vessel. Nor do those Tracts which the Keels plough up, make the way rougher to those that follow them. As for the Passage to the other Continent, this is not rendered less convenient to one Nation, though another useth the same Road. And to have been the first Travellers thro' any place, doth by no means give a People the Dominion of it, or prohibit others from turning it to the same Advantage. It is a most imprudent Plea to urge, That any one State by intercepting the Naval Affairs of all others, may be able to draw to it self the whole Profit of a Sea trade, which Interest all Persons ought industriously to pursue. As if all the rest of Mankind ought to be oppress'd by a most unjust Monopoly, to gratify the insatiable Avarice of a single Government: or, as if all others must voluntarily turn Slaves, because the wicked Ambition of one Prince or State lusts after the Sovereignty of the whole World. Such hath been the Bounty of Providence towards Mankind, as to give an abundant Supply of all things useful to their Necessities. But as to the manner of possessing these things, Reason enjoins Men to use such Moderation in it, as to rest contented with the Acquisition of so much as is likely to suffice for the Service of themselves and of their Dependants. Nor doth the same Principle forbid them to be concern'd for the future, provided they do not, either by Envy or Avarice hinder others from gaining a Needful Maintenance and Relief. If any one carries his Pursuits further, and scrapes up superfluous Stores, to the Injury and Oppression of others, it can be no Fault in the rest, if, when Opportunity serves, they engage in a timely Enterprize of reducing him to Reason.

To which we may add, by the way, what Dr. Chamberlain takes notice of in his Present State of England, pag. 1. c. 4. That Persons born under Shipboard upon Seas which are subject to the English Dominion, are accounted Natives of England, and have no need of Naturalization, as others born without the Realm.

X. From what we have observ'd, it is clear, that to sail the Ocean in a peaceful manner, both is and ought to be the free Privilege of all Nations: It is, because no one People have attain'd such a Right over the Ocean, as will justify them in shutting out all others from the same Benefit: And it ought to be, because the Law of general Kindness and Humanity requires it. Whence it follows, that no Sovereign can hinder the Nations which border on the main Sea, and are not under his Government, from maintaining a Trade with each other; unless he have by Covenant obtain'd such a Right, as either that some particular State is bound, on his account, to exclude some certain People from all Commerce with them; (of which kind was the Contract between the Dutch East-India-Company, and the Emperour of Ceylon) (a); or that some whole Nation have surrendred up to him their

Right of Sailing to another. For since I may, at my pleasure, either retain or alienate my Goods, especially such as regard rather the Superfluities of Pleasure than the Necessities of Life, there is no reason but that I may on some certain Considerations oblige my self to dispose of them to one Person, and to none besides. And this indeed is one proper effect of Liberty, that Men may by Covenant give up their Rights between themselves; though no such Covenant shall be allowed, if really prejudicial to a Third Person. Hence likewise, as a Prince may justly ordain, that no Goods, of the Growth or the Manufacture of his Dominions, shall be exported by Foreigners, unless by such as have obtain'd this Privilege, either upon Covenant, or by free Grant; (tho' the Law of Nature doth not at all oblige him to strike such a Covenant, or to make such a Grant, unless some Nation abroad be reduced to such Extremity, as that without this Liberty of Commerce, they must necessarily perish:) So if a People of Europe, for Instance, have appropriated any Country in Africk, or the Indies, by such means, and in such manner as the Custom of Nations makes Effectual towards the acquiring Dominion; they may with like Justice, if they think fit, cut off from others all Passage thither on account of Traffick, or not allow it, but under certain Conditions, or some settled Burthens and Duties. And this we now see in every Day's Practice: Nor doth it appear to be in any respect repugnant to Natural Reason. For that Liberty of Commerce, on which some ground such high Pretensions, doth not hinder but that a State may allow more Favour to its own Subjects, than to Strangers.

CHAPTER VI.

Of Occupancy.

IT follows in course, that we consider the several ways of acquiring Dominion, which, after Grotius's Judgment (a), may conveniently be divided into Originary and Derivative. The former are those by which the Property of any thing was first introduced: The latter those by which a Property already settled passeth from one Man to another.

Again, The Originary way of acquiring Property (1) is either simple and absolute, as when we obtain a Dominion over the Substance and Body of a thing: Or only primitive and with respect, as when we add to a thing already our own, some further Improvement and Increase.

II. We have sufficiently made it appear in our former Remarks (2), that after Men came to a Resolution of quitting the Primitive Communion (3), upon the Strength of a previous Contract, they assign'd to each Person his share out of the general Stock, either by the Authority of Parents, or by universal Consent, or by Lot, or sometimes by the free Choice and Opinion of the Party receiving. Now 'twas at the same time agreed, that whatever did not come under this grand Division, should pass to the first Occupant (4); that is, to him who, before others, took Bodily Possession of it (5), with Intention to keep it as his own.

Hence, when Grotius (6) affirms, That Original Acquisition, anciently whilst 'twas possible for all Mankind to meet in one place, might be made by Division also, whereas now it can be made only by Occupancy: The words ought to be explain'd in the following sense. When Mankind first began to separate into many Families, distinct Dominions were settled by Division: After this Division, he is said originally to acquire a thing lying void and without a Possessor, who happens to be the most early Occupant of it; i. e. he who lays hold on such a thing before others, or gets the start of them in putting in his Claim to it (b).

III. In Relation to the Occupancy of Immovables (7), especially of Lands, we are carefully to observe and distinguish, whether it be made by one Person only, or by many in Conjunction. One Man is then adjudg'd to be the Occupant of Land, when he tills and manures it, or when he encloseth it with settled Boundaries and Limits: Yet still with this Proviso, that he grasp at no more than what upon a fair account, seems tenable by one Family, however enlarg'd and multiplied. Should one Man (for Instance) be, with his Wife, cast upon a desert Island, sufficient to maintain Myriads of People; he could not without intolerable Arrogance challenge the whole Island to himself upon the Right of Occupancy, and endeavour to repulse those who should land on a different part of the Shore.

But when any number of Men jointly possess themselves of a Tract of Land, this Occupancy is wont to be made either by the Whole, or by Parcels (1).

The former happens, when Men in an united Body seize on some desolate Region, encompass'd with certain Bounds, either by Nature or by human Appointment. The several Parcels of which Region are either granted to the particular Members of the Community, to take and to hold as each shall think fit; (a Method but rarely practis'd;) or what seems more convenient for the Prevention of Quarrels and Disputes, are allotted to every Person by publick Designation. For that a promiscuous Occupancy is apt to breed Confusion, we may observe from that Description which (a) Livy gives us of Rome, Forma urbis erat occupata magis quam divisa similis; Such was the Appearance of the City, as if it had been first possess'd rather by Occupancy than by a regular Division. Tacitus and Cæsar will furnish us with Instances. The former reports of the Ancient Germans, to this purpose (b); Such a number of Men dwelling together, (for Grotius reads Vicos, not Vices) occupy or possess such a Portion of Land, which they afterwards parcel out into private Shares, according to the Worth and Esteem of particular Persons; the vast extent of the Country making these Partitions easy and practicable. They change their Arable Ground every Year, and are never at a loss on this account. So likewise Cæsar tells us of the Suevi (c), They have an hundred Cantons, from each of which they draw every Year a Thousand Men for the Camp-service; the rest keep at home, and till the Ground for themselves, and for their absent Friends. The next Year they relieve each other; those who serv'd in the Army return to take care of the Land; and those who tarried behind list themselves for the War. Thus, they never interrupt either the Business of Husbandry, or the use and Discipline of Arms. But there is no such thing as separate or private Fields known among them; nor are they allowed to inhabit any one place longer than the space of a year. And again (d) speaking of the German Nations in common; No Person, says he, hath any certain Quantity of Land, any settled or proper Boun-

But the Princes and Magistrates every Year assign the several Tribes their Residents, in what place, and to what extent they judge convenient; and, the Year after, force them to remove to a new Seat.* The Design of which Institution was, no doubt, to preserve the Ancient Simplicity of Life, so unacquainted with Avarice and with Luxury. We find Horace alluding to this Custom. Lib. 3. Od. 24. L. 9, &c.

IV. As for this Occupancy in general, or by the whole, we are farther to observe, that it confers on the Community, as such, a Dominion over all things contain'd within the Tract which they thus possess, not only Immoveable, but likewise Movable Goods and Animals; at least it gives them such a Right of taking the latter kind, as excludes all others from the same Privilege. And such an universal Dominion as is here describ'd, is so very different from the Dominion of private Men, that the latter may be transferr'd to a Stranger or Alien, whilst the former remains safe in the Hands of the Community (f) (2). Nor is it necessary that all things which are first occupied in this General way, should be afterwards divided amongst particular and distinct Proprietors. Therefore if in a Region thus possessed, anything should be found which is not ascertain'd to a private Owner, it must not presently be look'd on as void and waste, so that any one Person may seize it as his Peculiar; but we must suppose it to belong to the whole People (1). And the same Rule may (in our Judgment) be extended to such desolate Islands as lie in any Sea under the Dominion of a particular Common-wealth (2); or such as though they do not now appear, yet happen to rise afterwards in the same place; of which we find several Examples recorded by Pliny. Now in the disposal of such things as these, the People take different Methods: Sometimes the profits of them are laid up in a publick Stock, to be taken out again for publick uses; sometimes all the Subjects, sometimes those only of a certain Order or Degree; and sometimes Foreigners too are allow'd to hold and enjoy them, as Tenants of the State. Yet in all Cases, whatever Right private Persons obtain over these things, depends on the Appointment of the whole Community. But there is some difference, as to this point, between Immovables and Movables. The former, in regard that they lie in open view, and cannot be forc'd out of their place, are by virtue of that Universal or General Occupancy immediately suppos'd to belong to the People, so far as concerns the Body and Substance of them. But now as to Movable things, some of these are so framed or dispos'd, as that the Region may indeed be the Seat of their production; and yet there is need either of labour in finding or gathering them, as Metals in the Bowels of the Earth, Jewels, Pearls and the like, scatter'd about the Shores and other places: Or else of particular care in taking and securing them, that they may not afterwards get out of our Hands; as Beasts, Fish, and Fowl. Men having no Power over these things, so as to use them at their pleasure, before they are found or taken; it follows, that a People by themselves in this General possessing manner of the Seat where they are to be met with, do not properly acquire a Dominion over them, but only a Right of obtaining such a Dominion hereafter, by particularly taking and securing them. Hence, for Instance, we cannot rightly say, That the Wild Beasts of any Country, which still remain in their Natural Freedom, are the Property of the Prince: But the Prince alone hath the Right of taking them, inasmuch as he is Lord of the Soil where they run; and he may communicate this Right to others in what degree and under what restraints he pleaseth. Therefore he who is Sovereign of the respective Lands or Waters, may grant a Right of taking and appropriating things of this Nature, either promiscuously to all Persons, or to none but his own Subjects; or still only to his Subjects of such a Quality: Or, lastly, he may, if he thinks fit, reserve the privilege wholly to himself. For though the things themselves be not yet, in strict Speech, under Dominion, yet forasmuch as the Act of appropriating them cannot be accomplished without using some other things which are subject to Dominion; as suppose the Earth, or the Water; it follows, that he who hath the Sovereignty of the latter things, may by a Decree to this purpose, prohibit others from using them, as means of acquiring the former (a).

V. Hence it is apparent, that it depends on the Will of the Sovereign, and not on any Natural and Necessary Law, what Right the private Members of a State shall enjoy, as to the gathering of Movables not yet possess'd, as to Hunting, Hawking, Fishing, and the like. Nay, and as to the Occupancy of desolate Regions; which the Supreme Governors may hinder any of their Subjects from entering upon. Such a Prohibition cannot indeed prejudice Foreigners, who by taking possession of those Regions may make them their own: But it will be a stop to the Subjects of the respective Governors, so that none of them shall acquire the said things, but those only who have obtain'd a Grant and Commission so to do. For in some places private Men are allow'd more of these Advantages, and in some less, according as the Rulers in every State have judg'd convenient. By the Jewish Custom, as Mr. Selden (b) informs us, Whatever was found in desolate places, or in such as were void of the Dominion and Culture of private Persons, became the Property of the Occupant; as Grass, Fruit, Wood, and the like. Also the Fish, whether in Salt or Fresh Water, and the Wild Beasts and Birds: Yet no one was permitted to Hunt or to Hawk in another Man's Ground: Though even there, if he had once taken any Game, it was his own. But to rob the Parks and Ponds was utterly unlawful. The Roman Lawyers talk much to the same purpose. For thus Gaius (c), All Animals taken on the Land, on the Sea, or in the Air, that is, Wild Beasts, Birds, and Fish, belong to those who take them: For what is yet no Body's, Natural Reason assigns to the first Occupant. (d) On these and the like places the Expositors of the Civil-Law observe, that under the Term Feræ, are comprehended all Living Creatures, which Nature hath endued with an unlimited Power of straying up and down about their proper Elements; So as to take in those likewise which have been tamed by the Use and Company of Men. Though perhaps the distinction between Wild and Tame Creatures might be thus better express'd; that the former are more averse to Human Society, take greater delight in enjoying their boundless Liberty, and cannot, without great difficulty, be accustomed to live

(d) Concerning Fish there is an elegant passage in Plautus Ruden, Act. 4. Scen. 3. v. 32, &c. Ecquem esse dices, &c. Can you say that any one of the Fish belongs to me, whilst in its own Element? Yet those which I catch are my own, and I reckon them amongst my proper Goods: No one lays hands on them to challenge them from me; no one claims a share in the Booty. I sell them all fairly in the open Market as my Honest Store. Though the Fisherman was somewhat out when he applied this Argument to the Bag of Money.

with us; nor may we, after all, depend very safely on their Fidelity: Whereas the latter are quite different in each of these respects. Yet 'tis a Saying of Grotius (a), That the Reason why some Creatures fly and avoid us, is not the want of Mildness and Gentleness on their side, but on ours: Which he grounds on the observation of Travellers; that in the most remote parts, where Men had scarce ever, or very rarely came before, Birds have been found, which offer'd themselves freely to be taken. Some may rather chuse to form the distinction by saying, That Wild Creatures have Naturally a more intractable, a more rough and stubborn disposition than the Tame.

We may here remark by the way, that in one place of the Institutions, (b) and another of the Digests, (c) Pigeons and Peacocks are falsely reckon'd amongst those Fowls which we term Wild. The Mistake about the Peacocks hath been already noted by Godofredus, on that Passage of the Institutions: And as for Pigeons, the reason which in the very next Section is there given to prove Hens and Geese to be tame (r), will reach them likewise, there being other Pigeons expressly denominated wild. And therefore, by the Jewish Customs, none might take them, unless at thirty Furlongs distance from the Dove-House (d).

Yet Bees (2) are no doubt wild by Nature, since their Custom of returning to their Hive, doth not proceed from their familiarity with Mankind, but from their own secret Instinct: they being in all other respects utterly unteachable. It is nevertheless one of Plato's Laws, (e) Whoever shall pursue the Swarms which belong to others, and by striking on the Brass shall draw them with the delightful Sound to fix near himself, let him make Restitution for the Damage. Where he seems to presuppose, that the Owner of the Bees did not follow them when they left his Hives (f). Pliny (g) will have the Bees to be neither Wild nor Tame: Others divide them into both those kinds. (h) But that, so long as they return to our Hives they are properly our own, and cannot be hurt without our loss and damage, is very laboriously proved in that Declamation of Quintilian, entituled, The Poor Man's Bees (i).

According to the Roman Laws, (3) 'tis the same thing whether a Man takes Game in his own Land, or in those of others: Because Wild Creatures in whatsoever place they are found, are no Body's Property whilst they retain their Natural Freedom. Yet the Owner of Land may hinder (4) others from coming there to follow their Sport. But still what another hath taken with his Dogs or his Hawks, though against the express prohibition of the Lord of the Soil, he thereby makes his own. Indeed, as to this last particular, Cujacius (k) is of a different Opinion; grounding his Exception on a Law of the Digests (l).

VI. But in most places, the privilege of Hunting is left wholly to the Governors of the Commonwealths; who in some Countries admit their principal Subjects to be Shareers with them: Only Beasts of Prey are almost every where allow'd to be killed by all Persons without distinction. Many Reasons may be assign'd for this General Custom. It did not seem convenient that Country-Men and Labourers should be permitted to quit their Work, that they might ramble about the Woods; which Indulgence might have drawn them on by degrees to the practice of Robbery and Plunder (m). Sometimes too, it is reckon'd unsafe, to trust the Common People with Arms. Tully (n) mentions one Lucius Domitius, who executed a Slave only for striking a large Boar with a Hunting-Spear, when after the Servile War in Sicily, an Order had pass'd, forbidding any Slave to appear with a Weapon. On the other side, for the Princes and Nobles, on whose Arms the safety of the Commonwealth was to depend, Hunting was esteem'd a most agreeable Exercise, as a Representation of War, and very proper to inure them in bearing the Hardships and Labours of the Field. On which account what a high value the Parthians, Medes and Persians set on this Manly Sport, we may learn from Xenophon (5) and other Authors (o). Bajazet the Turk is said to have maintain'd seven thousand Men only for the care and management of his Hawks; and to have had six thousand Dogs for the Chase. When he was taken Prisoner by Tamerlane, and upbraided with this Fancy by a Present of Hawks and Dogs from the Conqueror, he fiercely replied, For me who owe my Birth and Education to Amurath the Son of Orchan, both Sovereign Princes, Hounds and Hawks are proper Diversion: Not for you a rambling Free-booter of Scythia, bred up to Thieving and Rapine: (p) And indeed it was but equitable to allow this Manly Recreation to Princes and Chief Men, by whose Toys and Cares the Publick Welfare is secur'd. But should the same Favour in great and flourishing Countries, be granted promiscuously to all Persons, it would be of very little benefit and advantage to any one in particular (q).—

These were the Arts and Exercises in which their future Generals were train'd for their Country's Service: to contend with the swifter Beasts in Speed, with the boldest in Strength, with the more cunning in Policy and Craft: Nor was it look'd on as an inconsiderable Ornament and Triumph of Peace, to remove from the Field the Inroads of the Savage Herd, and to deliver, as it were, from a Siege the Labours of the Countrymen.

For these, therefore; and the like Reasons, a Sovereign, if he thinks it for the Interest of the Kingdom, may against the consent of the Common People abridge them of the liberty of Hunting, without any Injustice. For he doth not hereby take from them what was their own, but barely forbids them to use a certain means of acquiring things, which the meer Law of Nature, if it obtain'd without any Civil Constitutions, would allow them. For as to what some ignorant Persons have urged, that the prohibition of Hunting is therefore unlawful, because God Almighty invested Men in general with the Dominion over Beasts, the poorest Subjects being no less Men than their Superiors: or, as to that common Assertion of the Roman Lawyers, that Hunting is free to all by the Law of Nature and of Nations; Learned Men have long since put an end to these Doubts, by distinguishing between the Preceptive and the Permissive Law of Nature, and by explaining the different acceptations of those Terms Jus Gentium, or the Law of Nations (a).

But further, it is very probable, that in many places this Right was conferr'd on Princes by the Voluntary Motion and Act of the People. (1) For since there was a necessity of affigning them some advantages for the supporting their Dignity with a sufficient Train and Splendor; it was wisely consider'd, that 'twould be most convenient to allot them such things as might be given without the damage or prejudice of any Man: and of this kind are all those in which no other Person can yet claim a Property (b).

VII. But such Laws as these, did not, strictly speaking, confer on Princes the Dominion over Wild-beasts, (2) but only a Right, by virtue of which they alone should afterwards make them their Property, by seizing and possessing them. Which Right, nevertheless, had this effect in common with Dominion, that in case any other Person had illegally taken the said Beasts, they might be challeng'd at his hands. For it doth not seem reasonable to admit the Opinion of some, who tell us, that even before Actual Occupancy, the Law might fix the Dominion of these things, nothing more being required towards the producing of Dominion than a Legal Appointment. Thus much indeed the Law of any Country may effect, that a Dominion already established over things shall pass from one Subject to another, without any antecedent Act of the Parties. But the Law alone is not sufficient to introduce originally a Dominion over such things as have not yet been actually brought under the power of Men: but there is requir'd farther some Corporal Action; especially as to the possession of Living Creatures. But now the first constituting Dominion, and the preserving it after it hath been once constituted, are different things.

Some again there are who assert, that Prohibitions of this Nature by Civil Ordinances, only stop the Right of taking Game, not of keeping what hath been already taken. For two things, they say, there were which the Law of Nations allowed with reference to Wild Beasts. First, That all Men should enjoy the liberty of Hunting: And Secondly, That the Dominion of these Beasts should be acquired by the way of Occupancy. The former of which Privileges seems in this case to be restrain'd, but by no means the latter. Whence if a Person who was forbidden to Hunt, shall nevertheless have follow'd the Chase, and succeeded in it, any Game found upon him may be forced away; not because he had not made it his own, but in way of Punishment he was unworthy to possess it. In the same manner altogether, as Nets, Spears, and other Hunting Instruments are seized in such Mens Hands; though none can deny these to be their real Property. For which Reason, if Game thus taken contrary to Law, be given in charge to another as a matter of Honest Trust, it may not be forcibly challeng'd from him by the Magistrate: as it might be, were it indeed stolen, some other Person being the just Owner of it. But the Prince cannot be call'd the Owner of these Beasts before he hath actually caught them; and therefore he who Hunts contrary to the Royal Prohibition, doth not commit Theft, nor take away the Goods of another; but only acquires a thing which another had a Privative or Exclusive Right of acquiring; and therefore he may be punished; but as for the thing which he thus got into his possession, it ought not to be look'd on as a matter of Theft, or to be challeng'd accordingly (c) (3). But indeed 'tis very simple to imagine, that a Man is by any Natural Necessity made Proprietor of the things which he first lays his Hands on; we having already shewn that this Right is grounded on the strength of a Previous Covenant. (4) Therefore if a Prince shall forbid his Subjects to use this Method of Acquisition, in regard to some particular things; their being the first Takers shall avail them nothing in order to the obtaining of Dominion over them. And that Law of the Prince hath so far the effect of Property, as that after it, the Subject ought not to lay hands on the said Beasts; or if he doth so, he cannot thereby make them his own. Nor doth it follow, that because 'tis not usual in these Cases to challenge the Flesh, especially from a third Person, when perhaps it is ready to corrupt; therefore the Unlawful Hunter was the Just Proprietor of it. Again, Taking must not presently be construed Acquiring: the former being a bare Natural Action, whereas the latter includes a Moral Effect. It may rather be said, that the Position of these Men is a plain Contradiction; for thus it runs, The Right of Hunting belongs to Princes alone, and if any Private Person takes Game, he thereby acquires the Dominion of it. That is, Princes alone may use that means by which the Lawful Dominion over Wild Beasts is gain'd and establish'd; and yet another Person may acquire the same Dominion, whilst he cannot lawfully apply the same means.

Ziegler upon Grotius, (l. 2. c. 2. f. 5. speaks much to the same purpose: That a Law may indeed hinder the taking of Game, but that no Law can hinder it, when taken, from immediately passing into Property, as acquired. For that the Right of prohibiting is consistent enough with this Right of Acquisition. That, whether a Man by taking Game acquires it as his Property, and whether a Man ought to make use of this way of acquiring, are two different Questions. That, as to the former, the Sovereign hath no Authority to interpose: Because, as he cannot make those things become some Body's which are no Body's, or these to be possessed which are not possess'd (l. 3. f. 14. D. de acquif. poss.) so neither can he hinder these Questions, the Sovereign is free to enact what he pleaseth. (3) Vid. D. Lib. 41. t. 2. De acquif. vel amittend. poss. ff. (4) C. 4. l. 4. See Mr. Barbeyrac's 2d Note upon this Section.

But what if it should be demanded, Who then is the Proprietor of Game thus taken contrary to Law? We have absolutely denied the Taker himself to be so; and as for the Prince, how could he fix a Property in the Game, when he was not concern'd in the Sport? It seems reasonable in this Case to affirm, that here the Hunter, tho' in a very unacceptable way of Service, labours for the Prince; and consequently, by taking the Game, he makes it the Prince's, in the same manner as other Huntsmen, who act by a Royal Commission and Deputation (1).

It is, moreover, certain, that a Stranger likewise is bound by such Constitutions as these; though perhaps in his own Country, the Liberty of Hunting may be universally allow'd. Forasmuch as this is a necessary Law of all States, without which their Inward Peace and Tranquillity cannot be secured, that he who enters upon the Territories of another Prince, though only for a time, ought so long to conform to the Customs and Orders of the Place; at least to all those the Reason of which will hold good against him as well as against others, and from which the Legislator hath not peculiarly exempted Foreigners (a). But, on the whole, 'tis the Admonition of Wise Men, that Statutes of this kind ought with great Moderation to be put in force; unless some particular aggravation in the Offender, deserves a greater severity of proceedings (b).

VIII. We are then said to have occupied any thing, when we actually take possession of it; and this commenceth at our joining body to body, either immediately, or by a Proper Instrument. The Regular Course therefore is, that the Occupancy of Movable be made with the Hands; the Occupancy of Soil with the Feet, together with an Intention of manuring it, and the Action of setting Boundaries to it, whether exactly, or with a wider Liberty. But the bare seeing a thing, or the knowing where it is, is not judg'd a sufficient Title of Possession (c).

Whether Possession of an Immovable thing may be taken by an Instrument, we may understand from the famous Story which Plutarch (d) relates to this purpose. The People of Andros and Chalcis made a Progress together into Thrace, to find out new Seats where they might fix and inhabit; and soon after their arrival, the City Sana was by Treachery put into their Hands: After this, being informed that the Barbarians had deserted the City Acanthus, they sent two Spies to discover the Truth of the Intelligence. These, as they drew near, and saw the place to be really forsaken, the Chalcidian Spy ran with all his force to take possession of it in the Name of his People; but the Andrian seeing himself outrun, threw the Spear which he had in his Hand, at the City Gate, and as it stuck there, cried out, That by this cast of his Spear he had taken the prior Possession in behalf of his Countrymen. A Dispute arising hereupon, the Eretrians, the Samians, and the Parians were chosen Umpires; of whom the two former gave judgment for those of Chalcis, and the last for those of Andros. The disappointed Party were so enraged at the Arbitrators, as to engage themselves by Oath, never to make or to allow any Marriages with them. Indeed a Spear seems a very Improper Instrument for the Occupancy of Immovables, since we may strike many things with such a Weapon which we can never approach so near as to touch with our Body (2).

IX. It is the general Opinion, that moving Things cannot be made our own but by bodily Seizure; and this we are to use in such manner, as to take them from the place where they were found, into our Lordship, or at least into our safe Custody (3). Thus a Nest of Birds, though I lay my hands upon them, yet are not my own unless I carry them home. If I find a Litter of young Beasts of Prey, I then fix a Property in them, when I either remove them, as Prisoners, to my own Quarters; or for some time set a Guard over them where they lie, to hinder their Escape. Now this Seizure is made not only with our Hands, but with Instruments; as suppose, Snares, Gins, Traps, Nets, Wheels, Hooks, and the like (4): provided the Instruments be, as they term it, in nostra potestate, under our power: That is, set in a place where we have a Right of following the Game; and not yet broken by the Prey, but holding them fast, at least till such time as we might probably come up. And hence we may decide the noted Case of the Boar in the Toil, proposed in the Digests (a). For, if the Beast were so entangled that he could not possibly break thro', and the Snare were laid either in your peculiar Lordship, or in a publick place where you had a Right of Hunting, then he was certainly your own; and I, if I had loos'd him, and restor'd him to his natural Liberty, should have been bound to make full Satisfaction, whatever name such an Action at Law might bear, or under what Head soever it might be ranked. But if the Snare were set on my Ground, as I might at first have hindred your Entrance thither, so if I afterwards break what you placed there without my Leave, you have no Reason to think your self injured.

X. It hath likewise been disputed, Whether by giving a Beast a Wound in Hunting, we presently make him our own (b)? Trebatius long since declar'd on the Affirmative side; but then he supposeth us to pursue the Beast, which if we omit to do, he says, We lose our Property, and the Right passeth to the first Occupant. Others are of the contrary Opinion, maintaining, That we can by no other means appropriate the Beast, but by actually taking him, because many Casualties may hinder him from ever coming into our Hands. The Emperor Frederick made this Distinction in the Case (c): If the Beast were followed with the larger Dogs or Hounds, then he was the Property of the Hunter, not of the Chance-Occupant; and in like manner, if he were wounded or killed with a Lance or a Sword. But if he were followed with Beagles only, then he pass'd to the Occupant, not to the first Pursuer. If he was slain with a Dart, a Sling, or a Bow, he fell to the Hunter, provided he was still in Chase, after him, and not to the Person who afterwards found or seized him. According to the Constitution of the Lombards (d), he who found or kill'd a Beast, wounded before by another, was to carry off a Shoulder and the Ribs, and to leave the Residue as the Hunter's Right: though this Right to the Remainder continued no longer than the space of 24 Hours. We judge it may in general be affirm'd, That if the Beast be mortally wounded, or very greatly maim'd, he cannot fairly be intercepted by another Person whilst we are in Pursuit of him, provided we had a Right of passing through such a place: But the contrary is to be held, in Case the Wound were not mortal, nor such as would considerably retard the Beast in his Flight (1). Therefore when Meleager in Ovid (e), admits Atalanta to a share in the Glory of killing the Calcedonian Boar, it was not so much an Act of Justice, as of Love. But the Game which my Dogs kill when I did not set them on, doth not become my Property, till I have actually taken hold of it (f).

XI. The Jewish Customs, as Mr. Selden informs us (g), decided these and the like Points in the manner following: Fish or Beasts were not to be taken from the Repositories or Places of Store; Yet it was lawful to take Fish out of another Man's Net, whilst yet in the Sea, and Beasts out of another Man's Snare, if it were laid in a desert place. He that spread a Net in another's Ground might possess the Game he had caught, unless it were found by the Lord of the Soil, and challeng'd as his Right, by virtue of that Propriety. Fish that leapt into a Ship belong'd to the Master: Inasmuch as a Ship may be esteemed a place of firm and secure Custody, not of such as is passing and uncertain; the motion it hath, not proceeding from its Nature, but from the force of the Waters. It is worth while to examine that Law of Nerva (h) (2) on the same Subject, which determines, That we are properly the Possessors of the Fish in our Pond, not of those in our Lake: And so of the Beasts in our Close Park, not of those in our Woods and Forests, though surrounded with a Fence. Which Distinction Grotius (i) dislikes, because Fish and Beasts are no less secured in the larger Prisons of private Lakes, and well fenced Woods, than in the Closer, of Ponds and Parks. Yet Nerva's Assertion is indeed founded on very good Reason. For the Propriety both of wild Beasts and Fishes commenceth upon their being taken (3). Now the Fish preserv'd in our Pond, and the Beasts in our Park, were once actually taken by us, but not the Fish which swims in our Lake, nor the Beasts which run in our Woods, enjoying thus far their Natural Liberty, though perchance they are so encompass'd, as not to be able to wander without end. For to take these Creatures, and to beset them with an Inclosure for the more easy taking them hereafter, are different things; yet inasmuch as I alone have a Right to take them, I may therefore both hinder others from doing the like, and may challenge what I find in their Hands; so that as to this effect, it is all one as if I were strictly the Proprietor. And the Beasts thus surrounded at large, may so far only be said to enjoy their Natural Liberty, as that they never yet were caught by any Person; not as that all Persons without Distinction have a Right to catch them.

XII. We likewise acquire by Occupancy Things in which the Dominion they before lay under is extinct (4): And this happens if a Person either openly throws aside a certain Thing, with sufficient Indications, that he de-fires it should no longer be his own, but should lie free for the first Taker, without designing hereby to gratify any Man else: Or, if having at first lost the Possession against his Will, he afterwards gives the Thing over; either as despairing to recover it (i), or because the Recovery of it is not tantamount. For otherwise, a Man though he loseth the actual Possession, yet never forfeits the Dominion and Property of a Thing, (unless it be taken from him in way of Punishment, or by the chance of War;) but he still keeps a Right of regaining it, till such time as his Inclinations to that purpose have ceased, or may be presum'd to have ceas'd. Wherefore the Dominion of such Things as these cannot be acquir'd by Occupancy, so long as the Right of the former Owner still subsists (a). But since to make a Thing compleatly abandon'd or forsaken, Two Points are necessary; First, That the Person refuse to own it for the future; and Secondly, That he divest himself of the Possession, by leaving the Thing, or casting it away: If either of these Conditions be wanting, the Property is not evacuated. Thus if I throw a Thing by, yet without Intention to quit my Right in it, I do not prejudice my self by that Action. And on the other hand, though I am resolv'd utterly to quit my Title to a Thing, yet unless I actually cast it off, I am still the Proprietor (b).

Amongst the Things which by this means are brought under Dominion, we may reckon Wild Beasts, or any sort of Game, when escap'd out of our Hands, and repossess'd of their Natural Liberty (c). Grotius is not pleas'd with this Position of the Roman Laws, Because, says he, (d) the losing our Dominion over Wild Beasts, doth not immediately follow upon their Escape from us, but ariseth from this probable Conjecture; That by reason of the great difficulty of pursuing and recovering them, we may be presumed to have given them over. But the same Laws hint as much as this; for they tell us (e), A wild Beast is then suppos'd to recover his Natural Liberty, either when he is quite out of our sight; or when though he is within view, yet it would be very difficult to follow him. And again they determine (f), That what the Wolf takes from us, is so long our Property, as there is a possibility of recovering it (g).

By these Restrictions we must qualify the Argument laid down by Ziegler in his Remarks on Grotius (h); That since Wild Beasts are made ours by losing their Liberty, therefore by regaining their Liberty they cease to be ours; and, by consequence, the Dominion of them is judg'd to consist in Actual Possession. For a wild Beast is not suppos'd to have recover'd its freedom, so long as any Person pursues, with probable hopes of retaking it. As a Prisoner, though he be got out of hold, yet hath not clearly made his Escape, so long as the Officers are in search of him, and he remain in a place where 'tis possible for them to find him. As for what Grotius conjectures, that by means of some γρῶνίσματα, some Badges or Marks we may retain the Property of Wild Beasts after they have broke from our Custody, so that they shall not pass to the first taker: We are of Opinion, that this ought to be confin'd to those only, which by the Application of Men have been divested of their Native Ferity, and are therefore deservedly admitted to the same Rights as Tame Creatures. Hence if Tyrribus's Deer in Virgil (i), was thus distinguished by any proper Mark, Ascanius offer'd a fair occasion for the Commotions that follow'd. But those which are only kept in Parks, though they should happen to wear any such Note of Distinction, yet when they get loose into their Natural Liberty, it seems more agreeable that they should pass to him who first lays hold on them. For there is need of a most strict Guard, or a kind of perpetual Occupancy, for the retaining a Creature, which is by Nature impower'd to wander without Bounds, and which always struggles, and is uneasy under the Confinement of a Possessor; no Mark or Badge being in the least, Effectual towards the bridling this Natural Disposition (k). Therefore Juvenal makes the Informers about the Turbot argue very wrong, though very Ornamentally to his Design:

Depastumque diu vivaria Caesaris, inde
Elapsum veterem ad Dominum debere reverti.*
Sat. IV. 50, &c.

They'd swear,
The Fish had long in Caesar's Ponds been fed,
And from its Lord undutifully fled;
So, justly ought to be again restor'd.

As to the Case of Fugitive Slaves, the Roman Laws particularly ordain'd, That their

There is this Advantage, says he, in knowing the Leader, that he may not be caught with the rest; the Fisherman spares him, that he may deceive and mislead another Company. It is upon Record, that a certain Fisher, to do his Partner an ill turn, against whom he had some Grudge and Quarrel, took this Captain of the Shoal, whom he might easily distinguish from others: His Partner spying the Fish in the Market, brought an Action against the Taker, and, as Mucianus adds, recover'd Ten Pounds for Damage.

Masters should still retain such a Possession of them as is term'd Civil (1), (a Possession in Right though not in Act;) in Opposition to the Natural or Corporal; that it might not be in the power of the Slaves to deprive the Masters of so great an Advantage (a) (2).

This is certain, that if we lose the Possession of any thing else, against our Will; as suppose we drop a thing by the way, the Property doth not pass from us, or accrue to the Finder (3), 'till it appears we absolutely give it over for lost; which is usually understood by our forbearing to search or enquire after it. Hence, if a Man find somewhat which 'tis not probable the Owner should voluntarily reject, he ought to give fair notice, that upon a just Claim it may be reassumed. But if the Owner can't be discover'd, then 'tis but right the thing should be kept by him that found it. Yet Ælian (b) reports it as a Law of the Stagirites, ἀ μὴ κερτεθῆ μὴ λήμματα; Take not up what you did not lay down. And elsewhere (c) he tells us of the Biblicians, That if they light upon any thing in their way, they never touch it, unless they laid it there themselves: To do otherwise, they say, is not to find, but to steal. Amongst Solon's Laws there was one to the same purpose; ἀ μὴ ἔθῃ μὴ ἀνέλλῃ (d). And the Chinese, in Obedience to the Doctrine of Confucius, exactly observe the like scrupulous Nicety (e). The ancient Jews, as Mr. Selden informs us (f), held that the Law of Deut. 22. 1. belong'd to those of their own Religion, not to a Gentile; yet so as if such a Beast were utterly relinquish'd by the Owner, it became his who found it and took it into his Possession. They distinguish'd likewise between those things which were mark'd, and those which were unmark'd. The latter they presumed to be given over by the Proprietor, but not the former; unless he made express and open Declaration to that purpose. So again, they thought it unlawful to keep the former, till they had been twice or thrice publicly cried, but not the latter. For which use there was a Scaffold erected in the Suburbs of Jerusalem, from which the Cryer made Proclamation of lost Goods. But in case they belong'd to an Apostate, they did not look on themselves as bound to restore them. As for things lost by Gentiles, they judg'd it reasonable to deliver them again to their Owners, only on this Consideration, that by so kind and friendly a Treatment, they might purchase a like return of Humanity and Favour. Wherefore they concluded, that the Dominion of the Gentiles Goods did, by the Law of Nature, immediately expire, upon the Loss of them; but that the Restitution of the same Goods depended wholly upon the force of Civil Constitutions. Which false Opinion, as many others, flow'd from the Covetous Temper of that Nation, and from their extreme Hatred and Aversion to all the rest of the World.

XIII. Amongst the Things in which the Dominion or Property is extinct, the Civilians likewise reckon what they term Thesaurus, Treasure-Trove, or Money found, the Owner of which is not known (g). If therefore a Man either on the account of Fear, or for the better Defence and Security, shall have hid his Money in the Earth, it doth not fall under this Name of a Chance Treasure; and he that takes it, is guilty of Theft. As the Slave in Plautus's Aulularia, that carried off Buclion's Pot of Gold. But such Casual Treasure as we first mention'd, doth naturally and without the particular Interposition of Civil Ordinances pass to the Finder; that is, to him who first lays hands on it and removes it out of its place. Because a thing, the Proprietor of which is undiscover'd, is in Moral Estimation judg'd the same as if it were under no Property, or belonging to no Body, and consequently is the Right of the first Occupant. On which Point, nevertheless this Question will arise, whether a Person living in a place where the Laws adjudge such things to him that finds them, is bound, for the making his Title good in Conscience, to give publick notice of what he hath found, though it should appear to have lain hid a very considerable time? (For if it proves to have been lately hid, we doubt not but such a publick Discovery is always necessary.) In the Case proposed, it seems most reasonable thus to determine. If a Man dig up Money in his own Ground, he is not in Conscience obliged to discover his good Fortune, but may enjoy it in silence, till such time as another of his own accord makes Enquiry, and withal produceth probable Reasons, both of his hiding his Money at first, and of his omitting to speak about it till now. For here the former Owner from whom the Land or Tenement pass'd to the present, (the Finder of the Treasure,) cannot be presumed to have knowingly left a secret Store in a place, which he alienated and convey'd from himself. Again, he who hath hid any such Treasure in another's Ground without acquainting the Lord of the Soil, is judg'd to have slipt his Opportunity, and neglected his means of claiming and securing it; since there was at first good Reason for him to fear lest it should fall into other hands, which he ought to have provided against. But if the Ground belong to another, then the Finder seems engag'd by his Conscience, to enquire, at least indirectly, of him concerning the Matter: Because without this, it cannot certainly be known, but that the Money was laid there by the Master of the place, only for the greater Security, or by some Persons else with his Privy and Consent.

But as for Positive Laws, we find them in different Countries, very various on this Point. (a) Plato orders, (b) That neither Treasure, nor any kind of Lost Goods shall belong to the Finder, but that the Oracle shall be consulted in order to the disposal of them. Which, without doubt, was too scrupulous a Superstition; somewhat like the Humour of Chiungai the Chinese Philosopher, who, as Martinus observes, (c) Held it unlawful to touch any thing that was suspected, either to be in it self evil, or to have proceeded from evil, and unjust Men: For which Reason he refus'd to dwell in his Father's House, believing the Builders to have been wicked Persons; nor would take his Meat from the hands of his Parents or Brethren, fearing it might be ill gotten. It seems to have been the Law of the Jews, That Treasure found should pass to the Owner of the Land, as is gather'd from Matt. XIII. 44. (d) Spartian mentions a Decree of the Emperor Adrian to this purpose; That if a Man found Money in his own Land, he should enjoy it all himself; if in another's, he should restore it to the Owner of the Soil; if in a Place that belong'd to the Publick, one Moiety should go to himself, and the other to the Treasury. We read a Story of Atticus, Herod's Father, That lighting upon a vast Treasure in his House, he wrote to Nerva, desiring to know his Pleasure about disposing of it; the Emperor return'd no other Direction than this, Utere quæ invenisti, Use what you have found. And when Atticus in a second Letter complain'd, That the Sum was too great for his Occasions, and quite overloaded him, Nerva answered, Abutere invento, quando tuum est; Why e'en abuse it, and since Fortune hath made it your own, get rid of it how you can. (e) Philostratus Apollonius, (f) in a Contention about this Point between the Buyer and the Seller of a Field, orders Enquiry to be made, Which was the best Man of the Two? An Expedient which can never pass into a General Rule.

XIV. The Roman Lawyers, to the Class of Things acquired by Occupancy, add farther, the Goods of Enemies (g). For the right understanding of which, we are to know, that by a State of War, as all other Peaceful Rights are interrupted, so Dominion thus far loseth its Effect, with regard to the Adverse Party, as that we are no longer obliged to abstain from their Possessions, than the Rules of Humanity and Mercy advise us. In War therefore the Goods of one Party, in respect of the other, are render'd, as 'twere, void of Dominion: Not that Men do by virtue of the Right of War, cease to be Proprietors of what was before their own, but because their Propriety is no Bar against the Enemies Claim, who may seize and carry away all for his own use. As the bare taking hold of a Thing which lays void, is a sufficient ground for Dominion. Though indeed in the Case of War, those who come to make use of this Claim, and to take a violent possession, may very justly be resisted and repuls'd with equal Violence; as we see in dayly practice. We may therefore observe, That the Dominion of Things taken in War doth then at length gain its full strength and validity, when the Person from whom they were taken, renounceth his Pretensions to them, by consenting to a Peace.

Farther, And what is very particular, this Violent Seizure, in a Hostile Method, may likewise entitle us to a Sovereignty over Men: (1) Whereas otherwise, Men do not come under the Object of Occupancy, whether subject to a Lord, or enjoying their Natural Freedom; excepting only that one Ancient Case of Exposed Infants (h), who belong'd to those that found and preserv'd them. For Liberty, as well as all other Rights, is attended with this Effect, that it cannot pass without my consent, into the power of any other Man besides an Enemy. But now Occupancy in those Things which are capable of it, supposeth no consent; but to the completion of it, these Two Points only are required; First, The Act of the Occupant, in seizing on such Things; and Secondly, The absence of all Right on the part of the Objects, which might else hinder them from being acquired by this means. Hence when upon the decease of a Man who hath no Heir to succeed him, either by Testament, or by Law, all those Rights die with him which he held over Things, or Persons, the Things pass to the next Occupant, but the Persons recover their Natural Liberty. For we can hardly imagine, that there was ever one Instance of a Wretch so basely low-spirited, as that he would voluntarily desert his Freedom, and as it were, give it up to any one that would accept of the Resignation. Should Men in this Case, be never so much inclin'd to continue in a Servile Condition, yet, at least, they will reserve to themselves the power of chusing their own Master.

Indeed Grotius (i) seems to reckon Sovereignty amongst the Objects of Occupancy; whilst he tells us, That in Things which belong to no Body, there are two Rights which may be in this manner acquired, Sovereignty, and Dominion, as distinguish'd from Sovereignty. But this Assertion must be explain'd with great caution and dexterity. For Sovereignty in Proper Speech is applied only to Men; which except in War, and in the Case but now mention'd, cannot be obtain'd by Occupancy: Because he who is not Another's, is not therefore No Body's but His Own. But we improperly use the Term of Sovereignty, in speaking of Places or Territories; for then the Effect of it is only this, That no one can fix in such a place without the Sovereign's Consent; and they who come to sojourn there only for a time, are during that space obliged to acknowledge his Jurisdiction.

But now this Sovereignty is really nothing else but the Effect of that Dominion or Property which was before establish'd over the Place, and includes a Power and Command over Men, indirectly, and by consequence. Because what is Mine, none can take to his own Use, without my leave: And he that enters a Place belonging to me, is so far at least under my Rule and Guidance, as that I may hinder him from endamaging my Dominion, or may provide that my Right over the Place shall not suffer on his account.

C H A P. VII.

Of Accessions, or Additional Improvements, and how they are acquired.

MOST of those Things which are subject to the Dominion of Men, have this Common Affection, That they do not always continue in the same State, but abound with great variety of Increase. Some of them swell their Inward Substance to larger Dimensions, some receive External Improvements; others are attended with several Fruits and Advantages of a different kind from themselves; many rise very considerably in value, from the Fashion and Figure which Human Industry hath put upon them. All these additional Profits may be comprised under the General Term of Accessions, (1) and will, for the most part, fall under one of these Two Classes: Those which proceed purely from the Nature of the Things, without the assistance of any Human Act; and those which the Labour and Diligence of Men, doth either wholly or in part procure.

II. 'Tis a General Rule in this Case, that whoever is Owner of a Thing, to him likewise belong the Accessions of it: (2) Which evidently flows from the very Nature of Property, and from the End for which it was first introduc'd; inasmuch as the possession of many Things would be vain and useless, should the Fruits of them accrue to others; and the Common Peace of Mankind would be very little promoted, if other Persons might challenge these Improvements with the same Right and Title as the Proprietor of the Substance to which they adhere. It is needless therefore to derive the Dominion of Accessions from the Title of a Feigned Occupancy, by which we should seem through the intervention of a Thing belonging to us, to take possession of any after-improvement; or by virtue of which, a Thing already our own, should be supposed, on account of its pre-eminence, to make some other Inferior Thing cleave to it, as an Appendage.

III. The Increments, Multiplication, and Profits of any kind of Things are usually filed Fruits (3); except that the increase of Animals hath the peculiar Name of Fœtus, or the Breed. Fruits are most commonly divided into those of which the Thing it self is the proper Cause and Original, and those of which it is only the Occasion. The former are called Natural: the latter Legal or Civil. Amongst the Natural, (4) some arise from the bare Operation of Nature, without the Culture or Labour of Men: In others, we assist Nature's Strength, and render her more kind and fertile by our own pains, whether in a greater or a lesser proportion: On which account these are wont likewise to be term'd, The Fruits of Industry. As for Civil Fruits, we see Instances of them in Usury, Hire, Carriages, and the like (5). 'Tis observable, that Fruits of the former kind, so long as they are not separated from the Thing whence they proceed, are look'd on as Parts of it; (a) but when separated, they are consider'd as distinct Beings: But both kinds agree in this; That they belong to him who is Master of the Thing from which they flow.

IV. As for the Breed of Animals, it hath been generally determin'd, That they should follow the Venter, and so should belong to the Owner of the Female, not of the Male; (b) not only for this Reason, because the Male is for the most part unknown, but likewise, because the Young was once a part of the Female, as it never was of the Male; and because what the former contributes to the Birth, is much more considerable, than what proceeds from the latter; though we should allow them to be equal, when look'd on barely as Natural Causes: For the Question here is not whether the Existence of the Calf is to be ascribed more to the Cow, or to the Bull, but whether the Calf belongs rather to the Proprietor of one than of the other. Now the Male is obliged to little trouble, so that his Service in this respect brings very little or no damage to the Owner: But the Female whilst she carries her Burthen, is almost useless to all other purposes, and besides requires, at this time, more than ordinary Care and Charge in the keeping: Therefore, at least, the Owner of the Male cannot pretend to so much Merit as the Owner of the Female. Especially, since one Sire is sufficient for a great number of Breeders. Yet in case a Man keeps Males purely for this Use, 'tis but just he should receive some Consideration from others who shall desire to employ them (a).

V. It is likewise a Common Rule, that Things planted or sown shall go with the Soil; because they are not only nourish'd by it, but growing into a most strict Union, are made, as it were, parts of the same Body. For which Reason it is farther required, that they shall have taken root; they belonging till then to their first Owner. Yet Grotius (1) is of opinion, That this Appointment proceeds only from Positive, and not from Natural Law; since the nourishment of a Thing already existent being no more than a part of that Thing, the Lord of the Soil can only pretend to a part in the Right over it; which naturally speaking, cannot take away the Right of him who own'd the Seed, the Plant, or the Tree: And therefore in this Case the Thing must be held in Common by them both. But notwithstanding what is thus objected, the Roman Laws in giving the former Judgment, went on very good Reason. For they did not hereby design that the Owner of the Seed, the Plant, or the Tree, provided he acted with Honest Intention, should suffer an utter loss; nor do they forbid but that the Two Proprietors may, if they please, hold the Thing henceforth in common, according as the Use and Benefit of the Ground on the one side, and the Worth and Excellency of the Plant on the other side, shall assign them their fix'd proportions. But because they would compel no Man to hold on in a Common Possession against his Will, and because such Things as these are incapable of Division, therefore they take the Question to be, Whether it will not be more equitable to assign the whole Thing to one of the Two Proprietors, with this Burthen, That he shall be oblig'd to pay the other the value of what he receives from him? Now here, since it happens most frequently, that the Things we speak of being closely knit and fasten'd to the Earth about them, cannot conveniently be transplanted, or be any way preserv'd out of their place, it was thought fit to ordain in general, that Things set or sown should go with the Soil; yet so, as that the Lord of the Soil shall satisfy the other Party for his Seed, or his Plant, in case he acted like an Honest Man. Yet if a Person sows my Field with a meaner Grain, when I design'd it for one more generous, here I don't seem oblig'd so much as to pay him for the Seed; it being really a damage to me, that my Ground is like to afford so ignoble a Crop. But should the Plants admit of being removed, especially if they be more in value than the use of the Soil amounts to, it would, no doubt, be equitable that the Owner of the Plants should be allow'd to take them away, only paying the other for the use of his Ground (b).

VI. Most of what hath been here offer'd may likewise be applied to the Case of Buildings, raised either on the Ground, or out of the Materials of other Men. Indeed if the Structure be movable, 'tis certain the Lord of the Soil can claim no Right to it; provided it be remov'd, and satisfaction made him to the value of what his Ground suffer'd by it (c). If another builds a House with my Materials, it is commonly best for me to receive the Value rather than the Things themselves; since what is thus fitted to one Building, will not serve again for the like Use. But if the Materials are not prejudic'd by being thus applied, and I have occasion for them, and cannot conveniently furnish my self with other of the same kind, then I ought in Equity to be allow'd the privilege of seizing them for my own Service. And though this is forbidden by the Laws of the Twelve Tables, yet they relieve the Owner of the Materials another way, by granting him an Action for double their Value. (2) In Case a Man builds with his own Materials upon Another's Ground, if he knew what he did (3), it seems hardly possible but that he must have had a Dishonest Design; and it being presum'd that he purposed to steal the Ground, the Owner of it doth not seem oblig'd to pay the Price of the Materials, or the Hire of the Workmen; or to permit the other Party to pull down, and carry off what he brought thither. (d) If there was no Knavery in the Design, and the Building cannot be removed without being utterly demolish'd, the Roman Laws Enact, (4) That it shall go along with

(a) Add. Ziegler ad Grot. l. 2. c. 8. f. 18. & Felden ibid. (1) L. 2. c. 8. f. 22. (b) On which Point the Law of Solon is remarkable; He commanded (says Plutarch, in Sol. p. 91. Ed. Wech.) that every Person who planted the common kinds of Trees in his own Ground, should set them at five Foot distance from his Neighbours. But that he who set a Fig-Tree, or an Olive-Tree, should enlarge the distance to Nine Feet; because these not only cast a longer Root, but are very mischievous when they stand too near some others; either by drawing away the Nourishment from them, or by sending out a Steam offensive and hurtful to them. (c) Vid. l. 41. t. 1. D. rei vindic. l. 60. D. de A. R. D. (2) Vid. Instit. Lib. 2. t. 1. f. 29. Vid. D. Lib. 47. t. 3. (3) Vid. Instit. Lib. 2. t. 1. f. 30. (d) *Lex Longobard. l. 1. Tit. 27. the Soil; yet so, as that in case the Builder be in Actual Possession, the Lord of the Soil shall pay the Price of the Materials, and the Expence of the Work (a). For though the Pile which is raised be for the most part of greater Value than the Soil and Surface on which it stands, yet they judg'd it inconvenient, that an Immoveable Thing should cleave as an Appendage to another, which, at least, if taken to pieces, is movable. Yet still, if the Owner of the Ground can conveniently be without the Spot on which the Building is erected, and cannot so well purchase the Building it self, it seems most reasonable that upon receiving the Worth of his Ground, he should leave the Building to be enjoyed by the other (b).

VII. But when the Roman Lawyers extend this Rule, That Things built and sown shall go with the Soil to Papers and Parchments (1), we cannot subscribe to their Opinion. As if when I with a good and honest Intention have wrote somewhat on another Man's Paper, I must be oblig'd immediately to resign it to him, only receiving some Consideration for my Pains in writing. But rather, since commonly, the Writing is of more worth than the Paper, 'tis much the fairest Method, that the other shall rest satisfy'd with being paid for his Paper: Especially, if we reflect on what some have added, not without Reason; That Paper being used, doth, as it were, die and perish; and that therefore Writing is of a quite different nature from Building. For the true and proper Essence of Paper seems to remain no longer than it continues clean and fair, capable of admitting any Characters. When 'tis once fill'd, it passeth in the Name of a Book, a Letter, a Roll, or the like. Therefore written Paper, is in this respect, lost and dead to me, that I have no longer the power of committing to it what I please. And hence, if I do but receive the Value of it, I have no cause to complain, since I can furnish myself with new, which will serve my Occasions as well.

VIII. They are more in the Right, when they determine (2), that the Table shall go along with the Picture; the latter being usually of far greater Value than the former; and it being easy for a Man to part with so common a thing, upon receiving its Price. Yet this very reason shews, that in some cases Equity will direct a contrary Decision. As suppose a Vulgar Dawber, whose Skill never carried him beyond a Sign-post, should have laid his vile Colouring upon some precious Wood, which we should gladly rescue as soon as possible from the Injury it suffer'd: Or if some awkward Figures should be cut in Plates of Gold or Silver, or in Pearls and Gems. As it would be an unparallel'd Impudence for a Rascal that rubs his Brush upon my Walls, on that account to claim my House. Nay farther, since this Labour was perform'd purely for his own Humour, he can hardly require to be paid for the Work, unless perchance the Owner of the House be in so good Circumstances, as that we may think he would willingly have put himself to such an Expence (c) (3).

IX. The same Lawyers declare (4), that Purple applied to, or engrafted on another's Garment, shall go with the Garment, however the former may exceed the Value of the latter. Now this may be understood two ways; either that a Person shall interweave among his own viler Thread some purple Yarn belonging to another, or that he shall fit another's Purple Cloth to his own Garment. In the former Case there is scarce the least doubt, but that the Cloth thus made ought to be adjudg'd to the Owner of the Purple. For that without which another thing cannot exist, and which is, as it were, the Natural Ground to support and uphold it, is not always to be look'd on as an Accession to that other thing (5); but we ought by all means to take the Value of each thing into the Account; so that if they are equal in all other respects, that which is more precious shall draw to it that which is less. Indeed if we speak of the Physical Concomitancy or Adherence of things, it is necessary that Thing should go along with another which cannot be without the other; or that the Adjunct shall follow the Subject. But in assigning the Property of things, where we are chiefly to consider the Price, and the Use of them, and how easily a Person may bear the Want of such or such a part of his Possessions; this Reason cannot always prevail.

As for what Grotius (d) affirms in this matter, That for the greater part to swallow up the less, is natural only in Fact, not in Right; we allow it under the following Sense. In Fact what is stronger may draw to it self what is weaker; but 'tis not always Rightful or Just, that a strong Man should carry off the Goods of his weaker Neighbours; or that a Person should lose a thing of his own which is less, if it happen to be join'd with somewhat of another's which is greater. For he who hath but the Twentieth part in a Field, is as much a Lord and Proprietor, as he who hath the other Nineteen. But indeed the Question we are now upon is not strictly, whether he who hath the greater part in a thing, ought on that Score to gain the less; but what Expedient may be found out to decide the Business, in case Two Persons happen to be Joint Proprietors of a thing, which they are unable or unwilling to hold in Common, or to divide. Now here certainly the entire thing ought to be adjudg'd to one of the Parties, upon Condition that he satisfy the other to the Value of his Share. And which of the Two Persons ought, in this case, to carry the whole thing, is to be determin'd from the Price and Excellency of one Share above the other, and from considering which of the Men is in the greatest want of that for which they contest. Thus suppose a Man to have us'd my Purple in a Garment for himself, though possibly the Purple be of much the greater value, yet 'twill be my best way to leave him his Garment safe and whole, upon receiving Satisfaction: For should the Garment be taken to pieces, the other Party must needs be endamaged; and where's my Advantage in receiving my Cloth when reduced to Rags? And as for the whole Garment, this being already fitted to the Body of another, is commonly disproportion'd and unserviceable for mine. So indeed in all the Compass of this Subject, it is more easy to judge what's fit and equitable from the Consideration of particular Cases, than from any general Decision.

X. As for Specification (1), or the turning a thing into such a Form or Shape, we are first of all to observe, that it cannot strictly and properly be ranked amongst the Originary Ways of Acquisition: For since in the Course of Nature nothing can be made but out of some Matter before existing, we ought to enquire whose that Matter is. If it were our own, then upon the introducing of a new Shape, our Dominion still continues. If it were no Body's, then we should obtain the Dominion of it by the present Act of Occupancy. But if it were another's, then the Question lies, Whether 'tis now to be adjudged to the Owner of the Matter, or to the Author of the Form? On which Point the old Masters of the Roman Law being divided (2), at length they came to this middle Resolution; That if the Form could be reduc'd to the first Rude Mass, then the thing should go to the Owner of the Matter; if not, to him who gave it the new Shape and Figure. Some have thought this Distinction to be founded on most evident Reason; Because, say they, when the Shape cannot be thus un-made, the thing seems to have utterly perished, and some new Being to have risen in its place: Wherefore it ought, in this Case, to be adjudged to him who caused it to exist under this new Form: Whereas, when the Figure may be reduced to the first Lump, then the thing is suppos'd still to exist, and not to have perish'd at the Arrival of the new Form, and consequently not to have chang'd its Owner. Others, on the contrary, are of Opinion, That the whole Business turns on this Issue, which of the Two, the Matter or the Form, is highest in Value. (a). In our Judgment, neither of these Determinations can with Equity be apply'd to all Cases; but the other particular Circumstances ought likewise to come under Consideration and Regard. Thus suppose a Man hath made Wine, Oyl, or Bread out of my Grapes, Olives and Corn, or hath taken my Honey and Wine to mix in a Compound Liquor, why should he have a Right to the Forms thus produced rather than I, only because they cannot be restor'd to their Original Matter? Therefore, if the things of which we are speaking, will admit of Division, they ought to be parted according to the Value of the Matter, or the Labour in working out the Form. Yet in case the Owner of the Matter hath Occasion to enjoy the Thing entire, we think that his Claim ought on all Accounts to be preferr'd to that of the Fashioner. Thus, if a Man casts or shapes a Work out of another's Metal, where the Form is much more precious than the Matter, 'tis but fair that however capable the Thing is of being brought back to its Principles, yet it should be left in the Possession of the Fashioner; provided he either restore the like Metal in Quantity and Kind, or pay the Just Value of it. But a contrary Decision seems most reasonable, if I had design'd that Metal for the very same Work, of which I stand in great Necessity, and cannot procure new Metal for that Purpose. For here Equity will favour the Owner of the Matter, tho' the Form or Make should, perchance, far excel in Value.

Others conceive, that in the case before us, we ought farther to enquire, whether the Power which the Matter had to receive a particular Form was near or remote: If the former, they think the Owner of the Matter ought to be preferr'd; if the latter, the Fashioner. For Instance, That if a Ship be thus made out of the rough Wood belonging to another, then it shall go to the Builder; but if the Timber were before fitted and prepared for the building a Ship, then the Ship shall go to him who own'd the Timber. That, if a Man works my Wool into a Garment for himself, he shall keep it when he hath done; but if he cuts a Coat out of my Cloth, I have a Right to challenge the Coat, and to refuse any Equivalent: That, a Medicinal Composition, if the Ingredients were before perfected and prepared, shall go to the Owner of those Ingredients; if not, to the Author of the Composition. But neither will this Distinction alone be always agreeable to the Rule of Equity: For if I hold any such Matter in my Possession, whether rude and unwrought, or whether fitted or disposed to receive a Form, which I either keep for sale, or else have in such abundance, as to be still furnish'd for my own Occasions, there's no reason why I should not leave such a Thing

(1) Mr. De Courtin defines Specification to be the Introduction of a new Form in a Matter belonging to another.

(2) Vid. Instit. l. 2. c. 1. f. 25.

to the Fashioner of it, upon his refunding the Price of the said Matter. But if I have design'd any Quantity of Matter to my own particular Use, and have no Convenience of procuring the like, then the Want which I am in, turns the Favour of my Sentence on my side, though perhaps the Matter was only in potentia remota, had only a distant Capacity, not an immediate Fitness for this Work (a). Nay, though a Man should frame a Thing partly out of his own Matter, and partly out of another's, yet even this doth not in all Cases, make it indubitably certain, that the Thing ought to be assign'd to him that made it, on this Reason; Because the Shape and Figure is not only owing to his Pains, but he likewise contributed part of the Matter: For, it may be, his Pains were of little worth, and likewise his part of the Matter inconsiderable, so that the Matter belonging to the other Person exceeds both. And again, there are some things which take up a certain Quantity of Matter; so that in any degree to lessen it, renders it unserviceable, if not absolutely, yet however to that particular Design. In this case Judgment is to be given for him who stands most in need of the Thing thus framed.

As for what remains, Grotius's Assertion (b) is universally true, That since things consist of Matter and Form, as their Constituent Parts, if the Matter belong to one, and the Form to another, there naturally follows a Community to each, according to their respective Proportions: Just as a whole Body composed by the mixture of two Parcels of Matter of the same kind, is common to the two Owners (c). But when a thing can neither conveniently be held in Common, nor divided, then either positive Laws or Equity must determine which Party shall resign the Whole to the other, upon receiving the Value of his Share (d). It is still in all Cases to be enquired, Whether the Person who bestows a Shape on another's Matter, doth it with an Honest or with a Dishonest Design? For he who acts thus out of a Knaveish Principle, can by no means pretend that the Thing belongs to him rather than to the Owner of the Matter, though all the former Reasons should concur; that is, though the Figure should be most Valuable, though the Matter should, as it were, be lost and swallow'd up in the Work, and though he should be in very great want of what he had thus compacted. For the greater part of the Two doth not draw to it self the less, barely by its own Virtue, or on its own Account; but there is required farther some probable Ground and Plea in the Owner of that part which exceeds, on which he may build his Claim. Hence, if a Man out of wilful and design'd Fraud, puts a new Shape on my Matter that he may by this means rob me of it, he neither gains any Right over the Matter by this Act, nor can demand of me a Reward for his Labour, any more than a Thief who digs through my Walls can desire to be paid for his great Trouble in making a new Door into my House; or than one can desire a Fee, who breaks an Imposthume otherwise Incurable, with a Blow that he design'd for my Death; or than Autolycus could have ask'd a price for painting the Horses he first stole. And all this doth not proceed from any positive Constitutions, but from the very Dictate and Appointment of Natural Reason (e), though Nature doth not determine any particular Penalty in the Case. For, to have exercised such a Villany gratis, is not properly a Punishment: And, on the other hand, 'tis most just and reasonable, that I should not be oblig'd to pay a Man Wages for endeavouring to do me a Mischief.

XI. What the Ancient and Modern Lawyers have so laboriously deliver'd concerning Increment by Rivers, depends, for the most part, not so much on any Constant and Natural Reason, as on the positive Ordinances of particular Nations: And therefore, we may be allow'd to use more Brevity on this Subject.

The Two Chief Enquiries made in the Case before us are, First, Whether the Rivers by thus secretly forsaking their Banks, do add to the Dominion of whole Territories? And Secondly, Whether they improve in the like manner, private Estates?

The former Question is of greater Moment, inasmuch as it may often prove the Occasion of great Controversies between Nations; it being usual for Rivers to lie as the Common Boundaries of different States. Now when such a River hath any way alter'd its Course, the Point in Dispute is, Whether the Limits of the Seignories are likewise chang'd, and whether the Additional Land goes to them whose Banks it augments? Here we are first of all to suppose a Distinction between such States as are limited (1), or encompass'd with Artificial Bounds, (with which we may reckon those that are parcel'd out by Measure, as by the number of Acres, being as to the present Business, the same,) and arcifinian, such as are naturally fenced against Invaders, with the Boundaries of Rivers and Mountains. After this we are to enquire, Whether the Neighbouring People of the Two Opposite States left the River between them, void of particular Dominion, and common to the Use of both; or whether they agreed to fix their respective Limits in the midst of it, so that half should belong to one People, and half to the other? And Lastly, 'Tis to be consider'd, Whether the whole River belongs to one People, so that the Limits of their Dominions reach to the Bank of their Neighbours? If then both the States are bounded in the manner first described, by Artificial Enclosures or by Measure, which immediately touch each other, without any void Space between, tho' the River should change its Course, yet the Territories will remain of the same Extent: Nor can there here be any room for the Case before us, since whatever Space should thus happen to be left, already belongs to one or to the other State. If the River in the middle were left void and common, then the Ground added to the Bank or the little Islets which start up, shall go to those who first take them into Possession: Yet 'tis most convenient, that both the former and the latter should be occupied by that People to whose Banks they are most nearly seated. If the whole River belong to a single State, the Islets rising in it shall belong to the same State only; but as for what is gotten from the River by the Opposite Banks, it seems most reasonable that it should belong entirely to the other People. But it most commonly happens, as 'tis most agreeable that the Lands reaching to the Stream on each side, are suppos'd to be fenc'd only with these Natural Bounds; and that consequently, the End of each Dominion is to be conceiv'd in the midst of the Channel: For here the Water, as it plainly separates and distinguisheth the respective Lordships, so it affords to each County a kind of Natural Bulwark. Yet still it is requisite in this Case, that the River do not, as it were, make a common Custom of drowning its Banks, and of cutting it self out a new Channel every Year. When therefore two Neighbouring Nations possess Lands thus bounded by Nature, (which in a doubtful Case is always presumed) the River by gradually changing its Current, changeth likewise the Limits of the Dominions, and whatever Addition it makes to either side, belongs to those on whose Banks it falls; provided, that this Alteration be made by small degrees, and that the River do not, at one sudden Rupture, forsake its Channel, and force a new way (1). For the gaining or losing of Insensible Parts, or any such Change as entirely leaves the old Shape and Figure, suffers a thing to remain in all Appearance the same as it was. And the Conveniency of a Natural Boundary, is too great to be slighted and forsaken upon a small Damage. But if a River, deserting the Channel it once fill'd, shall have broke up another Passage for its whole Current; and the People through whose Lands it now runs, do not think the Advantage of a Natural Boundary to be of so great Consequence, as that for the sake of it they should resign so considerable a part of their Territory, then the Borders shall continue as before, in the middle of the forsaken Channel. For as a Stone is used for a Boundary, not on the account of its Nature, but of its particular Position; so a River concludes and separates different Countries, not in its vulgar Notion, as 'tis a Bulk of Water gather'd from certain Fountains and Rivulets, and from other Streams of note and size, and then distinguish'd by a particular Name; but as it runs in such a Channel, and hath such Banks to encompass and confine it (a).

XII. As to the Lands of private Persons in this Case, we are of Opinion it ought first to be consider'd, whether the River on which such a particular Estate happens to lie, divides the Territories of two distinct Governments; or whether it only passeth through the Dominions of one: And then, whether the River be publick or private. In the former Case it depends absolutely on the Pleasure of the Government, either to leave such Increments in private Hands, or to challenge them for the common. For at first it generally happen'd, that such or such a People seiz'd on this or that Tract of Land by the Great, and afterwards parcel'd out to each Man a particular Possession in it, usually contain'd under a certain and definite Measure. As therefore what remain'd of the Territory after this Allotment to private Persons, was still the publick Possession of the State; so whatever happens to be added to any particular Share, is likewise suppos'd to accrue to the Publick. Yet inasmuch as the adjoining Fields frequently suffer great Damages from the Rivers by Floods, and because the Increments we are speaking of, advancing by slow degrees, seem to be of little Consequence to the publick Revenue; therefore many Governments have thought it a reasonable Favour and Bounty, to grant these Improvements to the Persons on whose Lands they happen to fall. And there is the more Equity in this Constitution, in case the respective Persons were wont to keep up the Banks at their own Charge. This Right is presum'd to accompany any piece of Land assign'd to a private Person, not by any determinate Measure, but in gross; though perchance in the formal Delivery of it some kind of Measure might be express'd (b): And 'tis the same Case, when in assigning the Bounds of any Land, the Neighbouring River is mention'd at large. But if this Increment be very considerable, and far exceeding the Measure of the private Possession, then it shall be adjudg'd to belong to the Community. As for the Islets which arise, these no private Man can claim to himself, without the express Grant of the State; because being plainly separated from the particular Demefn, they can on no account be esteem'd a Part or Increment of it. And their being seated next to such a Possession, is no more an Argument that they ought to pass to the particular Proprietor of it, than that any other Man should challenge a part of a Street, or a publick Place, only because it lies just by his Door.

If a River separates the Particular Lands of Persons subject to the same State, then, since it can add nothing on one side, but what it took from the other, 'tis by all means reasonable, that the Increment shall go to him on whose Land the Damage is committed. Thus the Roman Laws (1) rightly ordain'd, That in case the violence of the Current adds a piece to my Land which it hath torn from yours, it shall remain your Property as before. (Which Judgment will more especially hold good in floating Lands, such as Strabo (a) mentions in the Fens of Euphrates, built upon Hurdles of Reeds, and moved with Boat-Poles into their former Seat, when the Water had carried them off.) But if it hath stuck long upon my Banks, and the Trees which it brought with it have there taken Root, from that time forward it shall be deem'd an Acquisition to my Estate. Whence 'tis clear, that the Owner of the lost Fragment ought to have brought it back again to its former place, before it was incorporated with my Land, if he intend to resume the Property of it. When 'tis uncertain what and how much hath been wasted from another's Soil, the sufferer is hereby hindred from putting in his Claim to the Increment; which yet (according to Natural Law) doth not accrue to him who owns the Ground where it fastens, but to the People who are Sovereigns of the River. For 'tis in the highest manner agreeable to Reason, that not only the Water of a Common River, and the Things contained in it should be publick, but likewise the Channel, and the Banks, and whatever Improvement either that or these happen to gain. For it seems very improper to say, That the Channel, consider'd in it self, is a part of the adjacent Land, but that it is look'd on as Publick, so long as it's cover'd with the Publick River; which being once removed, it becomes Private according to its Primitive Nature: As if 'twas only a Burthen or Service laid on the Grounds of particular Men, that they should grant the River a passage through them.

If a River forsakes its Channel, or any part of it, and cuts out a new way, since the latter is taken from the opposite Land, the former deserted Channel ought in Equity to be adjudg'd to the Owner of the Land which now suffers, to comfort him for his Loss: And in case the River forsake likewise this new Passage, the Ground shall then return to the Ancient Proprietor, and not to those who possess the Country about it. But whatever is determin'd in those Cases, of the Increments left by the Current, and of the alteration of Channels; this, no doubt, is but just, that the Burthens which before lay on any Ground, should be less'n'd, in proportion to what it loseth by such an Accident. Which Point, as (b) Herodotus informs us, was settled amongst the Egyptians by a particular Law.

It is no less equitable, that Land drown'd by a Flood should belong to the former Owner, either when the Water is gone off without trouble, by one violent outlet, or by slow degrees, or when his Pains and Labour have cut out a passage for it. But 'twill be ask'd, To whom shall the new Bulk of Water belong, till such time as the Land by draining shall be recover'd? Here we judge it necessary to enquire, Whether the drown'd Land hath pass'd into the Form of a Lake or a Fen, or whether it is added to the Channel of a Publick River? In the former Case, the Lake or the Fen shall for ever appertain to the Owner of the Ground; and in like manner in the latter Case, for so long time as he shall entertain any design of reducing the Current to its former Banks. As for Private Rivers, which give me in one place as much as they rob me of in another, the Matter is clear beyond dispute. But what if a River belonging to my Private Estate shall make it self a new Channel through the Ground of another Man, shall that part of it which covers my Neighbour's Ground belong to me, or to him? In our Opinion, Judgment ought to be given for the latter. Yet still I retain a Right of turning the Current to its proper Place. But if I refuse thus to bring back the Current to my own Demesns, I cannot oblige the other Party to pay for the Water, nor so much as pretend that it ought to be Common to us both in that Part. For those Things which are our own barely on account of their being contain'd within our Limits or Space, and which therefore seem Accessions to the said Space, when they once happen to get out of it, are either to be recall'd by our Care and Diligence, or else to pass out of our Propriety, and to be reckon'd henceforward the Natural Increments of the New Space to which they are removed. But in all these Cases, the Positive Laws of different Governments may variously determine, as shall appear convenient (c) (2).

But if it be done in Lands that have been meted out, and assign'd in Portions to distinct Owners, then the Possessor shall lose nothing; because every one knows the exact form and dimensions of what was allotted for his share in the Hundred to which he belongs.*

Concerning the Lands which border on the Po, Cassius thus determines; Whatever the Water washeth away in its ordinary Channel the Possessor shall lose: Because he ought to defend his own Bank, without prejudicing other Mens Property. But if the Flood fall down with a greater force, so as to alter its Channel, every Man shall regain his own measure: because 'tis manifest the damage happen'd not through the neglect of the Possessor, but through the violence of the Torrent. If, in this Case, the Water form an Islet, it shall be his Property from whose Land it was taken: But if it was borrowed from out of several Estates together, each Person shall receive his own. *Comp. ## CHAP. VIII.

Of Right over other Mens Possessions.

I. Such is the force of Property or Dominion, that the Proprietor alone hath power to dispose of his own Goods; and all others are bound to abstain from them. Yet inasmuch as the Division of Things amongst Men was not introduc'd with this Design, that all Communication of Goods should thereupon cease; it hence comes to pass, not only that we are often by the Law of Humanity engag'd to grant others the Substance or the Use of our own Possessions, but likewise that others may acquire a Right to them either Perfect or Imperfect, and consequently may procure by a good and just Title some Benefit or Advantage from our Peculiar.

We shall here observe in short, how many ways this may happen; the whole Subject being so largely explain'd by the Expositors of the Civil Law (a).

II. The chief Rights over the Things of others, accruing to Persons who are not the Proprietors, are, by some, reduc'd to these five: The Right of holding in Fee; the Right of Ground-Plots; the Right of Possession upon an Honest Presumption; Pledges, or Mortgages, and Services.

III. The Right of holding in Fee (1), which is granted to another by the owner of an Immovable Thing, upon condition of paying such a reserv'd Acknowledgment, impowers the Tenant in Fee, not only to use and enjoy the said Thing after the fullest manner, but likewise to dispose of it; though not without some little restraint as to the Point of Alienation. The particular Contract by virtue of which this sort of Right is immediately settled, can be rank'd neither under Buying and Selling, nor under Letting and Hiring; since it doth not confer an Absolute Property on the other Party, and yet a much greater degree than in ordinary Leases; but especially since the Reserv'd Acknowledgment is (commonly speaking) far less considerable than the Rent of Vulgar Tenants. As, the Rules observ'd, either by Common Law, or by particular Agreement in the renewing of this Contract, in the paying of the settled Rent, in the Alienation of the Fee, and in the continuance of it, the Civilians afford us large Information.

IV. He that either upon paying such a Fine, or engaging for such a certain Rent, hath obtain'd the Right of a Ground-Plot, (2) may enjoy the same, and make any disposal or conveyance of it, as much as if he were the first Proprietor; and consequently may claim the Lordship, tho' not of the Soil it self, yet, of all that is built upon it. It was otherwise in the former Case; where even Profitable Dominion of the Soil belongs to the Tenant of the Fee: The Reason of introducing such a Right was this; That Persons were willing to admit Strangers upon their Land, yet so as not to lose any thing in the Bulk and Dimensions of it. Therefore they made a Grant of the Surface, reserving the main Soil to themselves, and requiring a moderate Annual Rent to be paid on this Consideration (b). If the Surface be lost, as suppose, if the Buildings fall, or are consum'd by Fire, the Right of the Ground-Tenant expires, so that the Lord of the Ground may again dispose of it as he thinks fit.

V. The Right of Possession upon an Honest Presumption, (belonging to those who with a good and sincere Intention receive a Thing of Another's from a false Proprietor, yet upon a Just Title, and such as would otherwise be sufficient to convey the Real Dominion to them,) is thus far equivalent to Strict Property, that such a Possessor may challenge all the Fruits and Profits as his Own, may dispose of the Thing as he pleaseth, and defend his Possession (nay, and ought to be maintain'd in it by the Laws (c),) against all Claimants, except the Just Lord. And this Possession, after a certain Term of Years, will give the Possessor an Irrevocable Dominion, and such as shall hold good even against him who was at first the Lawful Proprietor. On which Point we shall hereafter enlarge (3).

Now this Right was first set on foot for the benefit of Human Commerce, and the peace of Society and Government; to the intent that he who endeavours to obtain a Thing upon a good Title, and with an Honest Mind, should not afterwards be unreasonably oppress'd, or incommoded; as he must needs be, were all other Persons, for such a space, allow'd to disturb him in his Hold; or were he bound upon the True Proprietor's challenging the Thing, to refund likewise the Fruits and Profits which he had consumed: Or, Lastly, If his Possession were always to hang in an uncertain fluctuating Condition. As indeed it is a Rule not only enacted by Civil Constitutions, but likewise founded on Natural Reason, that every Man shall be left to enjoy what he hath got with Honest Intention, till such time as the Claimant shall have demonstrated a stronger Right than Possession (4). For what Trouble and Disquiets might be every Day brought on any Person, if upon Suit of every Petitioner, he should be oblig'd to relinquish what he fairly holds, and to prosecute the other Party in order to a Recovery (a)? The Case of Pledges or Mortgages will hereafter be explain'd (1).

VI. Services, in respect of the Person to whom they are due, are so many Rights of receiving certain Profits or Advantages from Things which belong to others, or of abridging the right Owner in the use of what he possesseth, so that he shall not be able to apply it to all Purposes. But in respect of the Person who is to pay them, they are so many Obligations to grant another somewhat out of a Man's own Possession; or, for the Benefit of another, to forbear using his own Property in such a particular manner (2). Services in respect of the Object towards which the Payment of them is directed, are divided into Personal and Real (3): Not as if the Benefit of each did not ultimately terminate in the Person, but because some Profits of this kind accrue to a Man, only on Account of his possessing some certain Estate (b). Which Distinction others express in this manner: Advantage arising from other Mens things, either come to a Person directly and immediately, on the score of his being such a Person, or else mediately, by the Intervention of somewhat which he holds as his Property, and to which this Service is owing.

VII. In the List of Personal Services are commonly reckon'd those which follow, Use and Profits, Use, Dwelling, and the Works of Servants. Use and Profits is a Right of enjoying freely what belongs to another, yet so as not to impair the main Substance (4); or, a Right of receiving all such Advantages from another's Property, as can arise from it without injuring the Principal. For, though in the ordinary Course of Nature, he who is Lord of the Thing is also Lord of Fruits, yet there is nothing to hinder, but that these Two may be separated, and the Dominion or Property lodg'd in one Person, whilst another hath a Right to all the Benefits. And this may be ordain'd and appointed, either by the Standing Laws of any Government, or by the Occasional Sentence of the Judge, as when a Thing held before in Common, cannot conveniently be divided any other way (5): Or by the Act of private Men, as by Testament, or by Compact (6). Only there is one Case which seems to require Service by the bare Notion of Nature and Reason; and that is, That the Father shall have the Use and Profits of all Goods which fall to the Son in his Minority (7). It is evident that Use and Profits can be appointed properly in those things alone which afford some outward use of themselves distinct from their Substances, or which are not consum'd by being enjoy'd; provided they are really Capable of yielding any Service, Ornament or Delight. But there can be no proper room for the like Tenure in Things which are no way serviceable but in being spent: Inasmuch as the very Body and Substance, and consequently the Propriety of any Thing is presumed to belong to him, who hath a Right to waste or consume it at his pleasure. Yet 'tis a Rule in the Civil Law, That Money and other Consumable Things may be turn'd by Will (c) into this kind of Tenure, and be given in Legacy; In which Case the Money or Things are so made over to the Legatee, as to be his own; but under this necessary Condition, That he give Security to the Heir to restore the like Sum, and the like Things, or the Value of the Things, when the Term of his Grant is expired. So that the Security here given to the Proprietor, doth as it were supply the place of the real Substance.

He that holds the Use and Profits of a Thing hath a Right to claim all the Advantages proceeding from it, as well Natural as Civil. Yet the Roman Laws excepted (8) the Issue of a Maid-servant; probably on this Reason, That the design of granting another the use of our Servants, respected their Work only, and not their Offspring. As for the other Natural Fruits, they become the Tenants of Use and Profit, by taking or gathering them: That is when he hath separated them from the Body or Substance, and laid them by themselves. Whence it follows, that the Fruits or Profits, if not yet separated, belong to the Proprietor; and in case the Tenant for Use and Profit dies before he hath gather'd them, they cannot be challeng'd by his Heir: Though, if it appear that any Pains were spent, or any Industry imploy'd (9), in bringing the Fruits to Perfection, it will then be equitable to admit the Heir to a Participation of them; so far, at least, as to compensate the Pains of the Deceas'd, and to hinder him from labouring in vain. Civil Fruits belong to the Tenant for Use and Profit, till the time is laps'd (10), for which the Grant was first made.

Farther, As he who holds a Thing in this manner, ought to use it like an honest Man (11), or as becomes a good Husband, and so apply it to that particular kind of Advantage, which either the Nature of the Thing, or the Will of the Proprietor requires; so is he likewise bound to guard, maintain, and keep it safe and whole; (1) as also to pay Taxes, Dues, and other Burthens, ordinary and extraordinary, at least such as do not exceed the main Profits (2). For all these Troubles, as well as that of Culture and Improvement, necessarily fall on him, who desires to reap the Benefit and Gain: Nor is it presum'd that any Person would lay so grievous a hardship on himself, as not only to grant another the Profits of his Goods or Estate, but likewise to reserve the Burthens to be discharg'd at his own Expence.

This way of holding is said to expire at the decease of the Tenant; (3) because, commonly speaking, at the first making such a Grant, the Merit of the party was consider'd, which cannot descend to others. And inasmuch as 'tis a great Burthen upon a Man to have the Fruits of his Property pass still into other Hands, therefore the Words in these Grants are to be interpreted in the straightest manner; so that if the Form ran thus, to Him and his Heirs, it shall not be extended to the Heirs in a second Descent (4); since the Property of a Thing, if for ever excluded from the Use, is utterly insignificant: (5) In which Sense we are to take Cicero's Definition, Id cuiusque proprium est, quo quisque fruatur atque utitur (a). That's truly the Property of every Man, which he useth and enjoys. Hence, if a Legacy only for the Use and Profits was left to a Publick Community, which in other respects may be perpetual, yet the Roman Laws (b) order'd, That the Grant should expire at the end of a Hundred Years: As it must cease before, if the State or City be dissolv'd or raz'd by the Violence of an Enemy. (c) From the same grounds it proceeds, that a Tenure of this kind cannot be alienated; (6) because at that rate the Proprietor's Claim might be for ever shifted off, and the Thing might pass to one whom he would look upon as an Intruder into his Rights and Possessions. A Grant of Use and Profits was likewise, according to the Roman Laws, made extinct by the Two higher degrees of the Capitis diminutio, or Disfranchisement of a Citizen. (7) For as they were unwilling to let this Burthen lie on the Proprietor, after the party in whose favour it was at first appointed could receive no benefit from it; so they judg'd it by no means convenient, that a Person who had forfeited the Privilege of a Free Subject, should be still capable of holding such a Right over the Goods of those who were true and Lawful Members of the State.

To proceed; this Right, by virtue of some Publick Law, or of some Private Covenant, may in a certain period of Time, be lost by disuse, (8) (which alters many Things for the worse;) or by using it in a different manner from the Rules prescrib'd; (9) or by impairing the Thing, either through design'd Wickedness, or gross Neglect. The Right is likewise extinct, if the Thing happen to perish (d); nor doth it revive, tho' the Thing be renewed or repair'd; by reason of that strict Interpretation which this Affair demands. For Instance; If I build a House in the same place with another which I lost by Fire, it is not judg'd to be the same as the former. And indeed, since the Work must have put me to considerable Charges, it would be very hard if I must raise a Building which on my side will turn to no account.

Lastly, If either the Proprietor make over his Right to the Tenant, or the Tenant resign to him, (10) the Use and Profit expires; since a Man cannot receive Service from what's his own (e); or, because this, and all other Services do properly denote a Right over somewhat that belongs to another. But when a Person useth his own Possession, and receives advantages from it; this he does by virtue of his Dominion, and wants not a new Title or Commission (f).

VIII. Use, as they term it, is when a Man receives from a Thing belonging to another, only the daily and necessary Service, the Substance remaining as before. And this is of less extent than Use and Profits, the Person to whom it is granted being only allow'd to take so much Advantage from the Thing, as is sufficient for himself and his Dependants; which allotment is measur'd according to his Dignity and Condition. Thus for Instance; As he who hath obtain'd the Use of another's House may dwell in it with his own Family; so he cannot fairly receive either a Guest of long continuance, or an Inmate who shall lodge there without being a Member of the same Domestical Society; in case the Proprietor himself dwells likewise under the same Common Roof: (but 'tis otherwise if the Grant runs for the sole Use of the Entire Tenement (g). Nor can he, according to the Regular Course, transfer the Use to another; it being a matter of very weighty consideration, and of great difference, who a Man takes to cohabit with him (11). As to the preservation and reparation of the Thing in which any Person hath thus obtain'd a Use, it seems most agreeable to Equity, that if such a Use be once granted, there remains no farther Fruit or Benefit to the Proprietor, then the User shall be obliged to keep the Thing safe and sound. If the Profit accruing to both be equal, they shall maintain or repair the Thing at joint Charges (a). But if the Use be inconsiderable in comparison with the Profits which the Owner still reserves to himself, in this Case, 'tis easily presum'd, that he intended not to charge it with any Burthen.

IX. Dwelling, in the Civil Law, is a Right by which a Man receives all the Advantages commonly proceeding from the letting out the Houses of others. (1) This is of a narrower compass than the Use and Profits of the same Houses; the latter taking in likewise the Benefit arising from the reception of Goods, and many the like Causes. And yet it is of a wider extent than the bare Use; inasmuch as the Person who hath obtain'd it, may let out the respective Buildings to other Tenants, instead of inhabiting them himself.

X. By the Right of Servants Works, is receiv'd all the Benefit arising from the Labour of Another's Servant. (2) Which Right the Roman Laws make more contracted than the Use and Profits of the same Servant; because he is capable of bringing in Advantage by other Means besides his Work.

XI. Real Services, due to any Person on account of some Estate or Possession, are, in general, so many Rights, by virtue of which my Neighbour's Estate is charg'd with yielding some certain Advantage to mine. The Civil Law divides them into Services of City Estates (3), and Services of Country Estates. By Country Estates, are meant Lands, and Inferior Buildings, erected only for the convenience of Agriculture, and preservation of Cattle. Under the Term of City Estates (4) are comprehended all Buildings design'd for the reception of Human Inhabitants, for the exercise of Commerce, and the like Uses, though seated at any distance from the City. The occasion of establishing all these Services was generally taken from Neighbourhood; a Relation which may justly be thought to border very near on that of Friendship (5). For, inasmuch as it contributed highly both to the Profit and the Pleasure of Men, that many of them should join their Dwellings and Possessions, which Convenience could scarcely subsist, should each Person go about to exclude another from the Use of his Property in every degree; therefore Neighbours were wont to settle it amongst themselves, That no Man should use his Own Things to all purposes, and in all respects, lest others should thereby be reduc'd, as it were, to Hardships and Straights; but that each Person should allow others such a moderate use of what he himself possess'd, as they could not want, without great prejudice to their Affairs (b). On the other side, 'tis a General Rule to be observ'd in the challenging these Services, that they be not carried too far, and that they be us'd with Modesty, so as to cause no Trouble or Uneasiness to those that live about us (c).

The particular Services of City Estates are reckon'd (for the most part) as follows. The Services of bearing a Burthen, (6) by which any Neighbour is bound to let my House rest upon his Wall or Pillar. The Consequence of which is, That the Person who owns me this Service, shall be likewise engaged to repair the said Wall or Pillar, because otherwise, if the Support should fall, the Service comes to nothing (d). The Service of letting in a Beam, (7) by which I am allow'd to carry on a Rafter or Beam, or any other Piece which joins my Building together, till it enters into my Neighbour's House, and is there fasten'd.

The Service of jutting or shooting out, (8) which impowers me to extend any kind of Building over the House or Ground of Another Man, yet so as not to make it rest upon the said House or Ground: As in Balconies, Pent-Houses, and the like. The Service of raising a Building higher, (9) by which we are bound, though to our own Inconvenience, to give another leave, for his Benefit and Advantage to raise his House; which we might otherwise, forbid or prevent.

The Service of not raising a Building higher; by which a Man, for the Profit and Convenience of the adjoining Tenements, is constrain'd to keep his House low, or not to raise it beyond such a fixt Height.

The Service of not hindring Lights; by means of which my Neighbour can attempt nothing towards the lessening or obscuring the Lights of my House (a).

The Service of Prospect (2); by which my Neighbour is bound to let me look freely into his Estate, and cannot deprive me of that Benefit.

The Service of not hindring Prospect; by which a Man is tied up from doing any Thing in his Estate, which might interrupt a free Prospect on any side, especially towards any delightful place.

The Service of receiving Dropping Water (3), denotes an Obligation to suffer any such Conveyances, to empty themselves upon our Ground, tho' to our Burthen and Trouble.

The Service of not receiving Dropping Water; denotes an Obligation, not to turn the same little Spouts or Gutters, which are already useful to our Neighbour, into a new Course for our own Advantage.

The Service of receiving the River (4); by which my Neighbour is bound to grant passage to the larger Currents which flow (like a River) through my House in Pipes or Canals.

The Service of not turning away the River; restraining my Neighbour from diverting any such Channel or Stream which issues out of his House, so as to hinder it from passing through my Estate, to my great Benefit.

Lastly, We are to refer to the same Head; The Service (5) of employing Sinks and Kennels; of pouring out any Thing upon a Neighbour's Ground, and whatever there are besides of the same kind.

XII. The Services of Country-Estates; or which are due to Lands and Hereditaments employ'd in Rural Affairs, are commonly reckon'd in this Catalogue. Passage (6); the Right of a Path for Men to walk through my Neighbour's Ground into mine, for the Benefit of the latter. Carriage; the Right of driving Beasts or Wains. Road, or Way; the Right of going, walking, driving; as likewise of carrying, leading, bearing and drawing any Thing which makes for the Advantage of my Estate. Water-Course; the Right of bringing Water through my Neighbour's Field, for the Benefit of my own; whether I use this Water for the Ground, or for the Beasts, or only to free my Land from an unnecessary Burthen and Flood. 'Tis the Nature of these Services, that they cannot be granted in part, being of no use unless Entire. For, as the Civil Law observes (b) in one of these Instances; A Road, or Way is then wont to be finished, when it reacheth, either to a Town, or to some High and publick Way, or to a Ferry, or to some other Farm of the same Lord. Therefore it would be vain and useles to obtain passage only thro' half another's Ground, if we were not allow'd to go farther. Water-draught; the Right of fetching Water from a Spring, or other place, for the necessary Occasions of our Ground: Which Grant is presum'd to include also another, of free passage to the Spring, or Well. Waterage for Cattle; a Right to drive the Beasts which feed in our Ground, to drink at our Neighbour's Pool (c). To the same Head belongs, The Right of feeding our Cattle on another's Pasture: Concerning which Right it hath been observ'd, That the Lord of the Ground which is charg'd with this Service, is not hereby hindred from feeding his own Cattle in the same place, provided he do not overstock it, so as to intercept the Right of the other Party. And so too, he who hath the Right of Pasturage, ought not to bring in Diseas'd or Scabby Beasts, which might communicate the Infection to others.

Lastly, To these are added, The Right of burning Lime, of digging Sand, of cutting Stakes, of felling Wood, and of hewing Stone; as they turn to the Advantage of Country Estates (d). All which have been by others explain'd more at large (7).

(1) Ibid. leg. 4. (a) Of the Claim to this Service rigorously insisted on, we have a famous Instance recorded by Zonaras, Tom. 3. in Theophil. and by Michael Glycas, Annal. Tom. 4. (2) *D. CHAP. IX.

WE are now to consider the Derivative Ways of Acquisition, by which Dominion or Property already establish'd, passeth from one to another: Which, before we proceed particularly to examine, it may be convenient to premise somewhat about the transferring of Property in general. The Power and Privilege then, of alienating our own Possessions, or of conveying them to others, ariseth from the Nature of full Property (1): For since this enables a Man to dispose of his own how he pleaseth, it seems the very Principal part of that Ability, that he may, if he thinks convenient, transfer the Thing to another, by which means he may either procure to himself something more serviceable, or at least may have an Opportunity of obliging a Friend by his good Turn.

II. Now as the Conveyance of Rights and of Things is transacted between two Parties, the one from whom, and the other to whom they pass (1); so in those Methods of Acquisition which flow from the Force and Vertue of Property, the Concurrence of Two Wills is required, the Giver's and the Receiver's (2). For Alienation doth especially denote, that the Thing passeth from the Proprietor, with his free Consent, and is not taken from him by meer Violence against his Will. Again, To make a Thing change Masters, it is necessary likewise that the latter agree, as well as the former; it being inconvenient, that a Thing, which as to its Natural Substance, exists separately from me, should be, as it were, join'd and united to me, unless I embrace it with my own Consent and Choice. But in Cases where the Property is said, of Right, to pass to Men without their Knowledge, as in Inheritances, there the Law is presumed to make an Acceptance by way of Fiction, in favour of the Heir. Of which this is an Evidence, that the Heir may refuse the Inheritance; and unless, either in Person or by Proxy, he takes Actual Possession of it, he is not affected by those Obligations which arise from it, or are charg'd upon it.

III. Farther, since Alienations ought to be made with the Consent of both Parties, and since it is inconsistent with Human Society, that bare Internal Acts should be allow'd a Power of producing Rights to hold Valid and Effectual with regard to other Men; therefore 'tis required on both sides, as well on the Giver's as on the Receiver's, that they declare their Consent by sufficient Signs, that others may be fully assur'd of it: Such as are, Nods, Gestures, Words, Writings; to which, in some places are added, Solemn Profession before a Magistrate, Publick Registering, and the like.

IV. It is evident, moreover, that when a Translation or Alienation hath been perfectly and unconditionally made, the Alienator retains no manner of Right, or Title, to the Thing which was before his own. Which Consequence, though it be naturally implied in every Act of this kind, yet 'tis usual in Solemn Renunciations and Surrendries, expressly to declare, That neither we our selves, nor our Heirs will hereafter make any Pretention or Attempt upon what we have now given up; and that if any such Motion happens, it shall be null and void: Because when we have once made a Thing anothers, we cannot, to any purpose, claim the disposal of it again. Yet frequently after a Thing hath been alienated, the former Owner reserves some kind of Claim, or a sort of Chance-Right, which in Case of some particular Event, now unknown, exerts its force. And this, either because in the Act of Alienation it was thus expressly covenanted; as is the Practice in Sales with Liberty of Refusal (3), in Things alienated under an Exception or Condition (4), and when only a useful (5) Diminutive or imperfect Property is transferr'd, as happens in the Grant of Feuds, and of Copies and Leases: Or because the Alienation includes a Tacit Condition, which Condition coming to pass, the Right of the former Owner to the Thing thus convey'd revives; whence arise those several Actions in Civil Law, of Falſe Debt; of Things given upon a certain Cause, which Cause did not follow (6); of the Recovery of Spousal Presents (7) upon not proceeding to Marriage; of Recovery of Dowry upon Divorce or Separation (8).

Vulcan, in Homer (a) upon his taking Venus in Adultery, challengeth the Ææva, the Presents he made his Father-in-Law, in prospect of the Match. 'Tis a Rule in the Alcoran, That if a Suiter put away his Spouse before Consummation, she shall retain half of what he gave her, unless she chuse to throw him back all.

V. But the chief Point usually controverted on this Subject is, Whether or no in the transferring of Property the Law of Nature requires Delivery? For others have already well observ'd, That Delivery cannot rightly be plac'd amongst the Ways of acquiring, since 'tis only an Act intervening in the Conveyance of it. Grotius (b) is of Opinion, That according to the Law of Nature, Property may be transferr'd by bare Covenant; and that Delivery is only requir'd by a Civil or Positive Ordinance, which being receiv'd by many States, is through mistake styled, The Law of Nations. On the other hand the Expositors of the Roman Laws declare, That the Dominion of Things cannot be bare Covenants, though thus much should be expressly intimated in the Transaction; but that Delivery is still requisite. The Reason of which Necessity they take to be this; That Dominions first took their rise from Natural Possession, and that therefore in passing them away, such an Act must intervene, by which the Natural Possession of the Thing may be immediately obtain'd. Some have further remark'd, That in Originary Acquisitions, as suppose in Occupancy, or first Seizure, the Title or Cause, and the manner of acquiring fall in with each other. But that in Derivative Acquisitions these Two are ever distinct: Delivery and Acceptance being the manner of transferring Property, or rather the Acts which occur in transferring it; whilst Donation, (1) Buying, and Selling, &c. are the Titles or Causes upon which the Conveyance is made. Though we have already shewn, that bare Occupancy is not a sufficient Title for Dominion, (2) but that it must in all Cases be grounded on some precedent Covenant. Others take a Middle Judgment in the Point; and as they deny that Delivery is by the Law of Nature Necessary, so they maintain, That 'tis, however, agreeable to Reason; Inasmuch as I cannot exercise Dominion over a Thing, unless I apply it, as it were Corporally to my self; which can be done only by Delivery on the one side; and by Actual Seizure on the other.

VI. In our Judgment, the Matter may be clearly resolv'd, by observing, that Dominion is capable of Two different Considerations; either as it denotes a bare Moral Quality, by virtue of which we understand that a Thing belongs to some Person, and that it ought to be subject to his Disposal; or as it implies farther, some degree of Natural Power; by which we are enabled to put immediately in Execution any purpose that we have made concerning the said Thing. Or what amounts to the same, Dominion is sometimes consider'd as abstracted from Possession, and sometimes is conceiv'd as united to it; this being, as it were, the final completion of Property; upon the arrival of which it fully exerts its direct Effects. For the better Illustration therefore, of the Point, it will not be inconvenient to say somewhat of Possession in General.
